One of the greatest overturns in our political history was the falling apart of Mr. Farley and President Roosevelt. The chairman was the genius of two campaigns, but gradually the President let him down. He was for several years Postmaster General, and he was a successful and admired administrator. When the third-term agitation arose, Mr. Farley put himself squarely against the idea. He was, consequently, minimized and even assailed. Through all of this he has remained a stanch Democrat and is still looking out for the welfare of his party. His freedom from political posts and all alliance with the administration make him a leader of the informal sort. It is certain he retains a great influence and it is inevitable that he be listened to with close attention and great respect.

Treasury Breaks Black Market in Liquor—Customs, Intelligence, Narcotic Divisions, and Secret Service Report Activities for Last Fiscal Year

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the enforcement agencies of the Treasury Department in their annual report of activities for the last fiscal year show an excellent record. These agencies always show fines and additional taxes exceeding by many millions their annual appropriations. This last report, like previous reports, indicates millions have found their way into the Treasury as a result of their outstanding work.

Under the permission granted me, I include, as part of my remarks, a statement just issued by the Chief Coordinator of Enforcement, Hon. Elmer L. Irey. It follows:

Treasury's Alcohol Tax Unit, smashing at the black market in liquor during the last 8 months of the 1944 fiscal year, brought 548 cases to United States attorneys with recommendations for criminal prosecution, Elmer L. Irey, Chief Coordinator of Enforcement, today reported to Secretary Morgenthau.

These cases involve 1,174 individuals. Before the close of the year, June 30, grand juries had indicted 485 persons in some 200 cases, and convictions had been obtained in the courts of 175 persons. Liquor, otherwise legal, worth $700,000, had been seized in connection with black market investigations.

Stewart Berkshire, head of the unit, said that reports from the industry and from agents in the field indicate that liquor sales at over-the-ceiling prices have been effectively curbed at the wholesale and manufacturing levels where the Treasury has controls.

The Treasury agents worked closely with the Office of Price Administration in the offensive against the black market.

The last 6 months of the fiscal year saw an upward trend in seizures of moonshine stills and mash, compared with the extremely low figures of the earlier war months, but such violations continued well below prewar levels. During the fiscal year, 6,801 stills were seized, compared with 5,654 in 1943. Virtually all such illicit operations were small scale affairs, and 94 percent of them were in 14 Southern States. Greater availability of sugar is believed to have contributed to the increase in moonshine operations.

With an average of fewer than 1,900 agents employed, the 6 Treasury investigative agencies accounted for 10,500 convictions of violators of laws within their jurisdiction during the fiscal year. The agencies are the Intelligence and Alcohol Tax Units of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the United States Secret Service, the Bureau of Narcotics, and the investigative divisions of the Bureau of Customs and the Foreign Funds Control.

As a result of their activities, there were potential financial returns to the Government of $61,500,000 in the form of fines, penalties, and value of seizures, taxes and penalties recommended for assessment, and offers in compromise.

Enforcement work incident to the prosecution of the war continued a major function of the Treasury agents. The Customs Service exercised strict scrutiny of merchant shipping, of imports and exports, and of individuals arriving in and leaving the United States.

E. J. Shamhart, Deputy Commissioner of Customs, reported that a sharp increase in small-scale liquor smuggling attempts partially offset fewer seizures in other lines, and total confiscations of smuggled commodities were 9,640, compared to 10,80? in the 1943 period. Liquor seizures made up 7,110 of this total, but there was no evidence of organized, large scale rum running such as flourished some years ago. Liquor seizures in 1943 fiscal were 3,920.

Quantities of narcotic drugs seized by Customs and Bureau of Narcotic agents declined compared with 1943, and 9,796 ounces to 4,436, and marihuana seizures also dropped sharply. There was, however, a slight increase in arrests for offenses against the drug laws, from 2,571 in 1943 to 2,629. H. J. Anslinger, Commissioner of Narcotics, reported illicit drugs continued extremely scarce, and prices high. Persia, India, and Mexico were the main sources of smuggled drugs. Mexican authorities are cooperating in efforts to stamp out the traffic over our southern border.

The Foreign Funds Control Compliance Section, under T. H. Ball, continued to ferret out assets of enemy nationals concealed in this country, and, working with the Bureau of Customs, built a wall against the entry of possible Axis loot, especially currency and objects of art.

The Intelligence Unit, of which W. H. Woolf is chief, investigated more than 1,000 cases of suspected tax evasion during the year, involving probable ultimate additional receipts to the Government of nearly $46,000,000. Of 87 criminal-tax evasion cases brought to trial, 85 resulted in convictions; while 100 percent convictions were obtained in 28 additional cases involving other offenses. Federal judges generally handed down stiff sentences for wartime tax evaders.

Chief Frank Wilson of the Secret Service reported that losses to the public from counterfeit bills and coins dropped to another all-time low of only $27,362. The annual loss ran as high as $1,000,000 a year prior to 1937.

The Service found its work cut but for it in the field of safeguarding Government checks from thieves and forgers, with the total of such checks issued during the fiscal year exceeding 300,000,000. Educational methods similar to those used in combating counterfeiting contributed to keeping the number of forgery cases down to a moderate increase, with 1,691 arrests in this field, compared to 1,004 in the 1943 period.

In cooperation with investigators of the Office of Price Administration the service arrested 192 persons for trafficking in counterfeit War ration stamps, and reported 149 convictions for these offenses during the fiscal year.

The Service met successfully the security problems involved in the historic trips of the President to Canada, Cairo, and Teheran. Its uniformed force had under its protection a total of nearly $500,000,000,000 in money, stamps, and Government securities.

Do We Want a Monopoly on Transportation?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, railway transportation in this country has been the subject of much legislation as a result of the efforts of the American people to protect themselves from monopolistic practices of the carriers. The advent of the automobile, with the coming of truck and bus transportation, and now the airplane has practically eliminated this monopoly and given rise to other transportation problems.

There is submitted for the consideration of Members of the House, a letter from Publisher Eldridge Haynes and my reply thereto:

MODERN INDUSTRY,
New York, N. Y., August 9, 1944.

The Honorable COMPTON I. WHITE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Should industry favor the establishment of unified transportation companies? Modern Industry's Debate in Print, a regular feature of this industrial magazine with more than 50,000 readers among management men in 31,500 plants, covered the pros and cons of this timely question in the June 15 issue.

The readers of Modern Industry, given an opportunity to have their say on this question by means of a post-card ballot, voted as follows:

	Percent
No	70.2
Yes	29.8

Donald D. Conn, executive vice president of Transportation Association of America, wrote in favor of unification. His opponent was John V. Lawrence, managing director of American Trucking Associations.

Breaking down the total vote by regions, opinion across the Nation lines up in this way:

	(Percent)
	Yes	No
New England	7.7	92.3
Mid-Atlantic	27.7	72.3
North Central	35.3	64.7
South	40.1	59.9
West	29.3	70.7
Pacific Coast	18.7	81.3

If you'd like to receive tear sheets of this debate, please let us know. And we shall also welcome your comments on this issue.

Cordially yours,

ELDRIDGE HAYNES,
Publisher.

Mr. ELDRIDGE HAYNES,
Publisher, Modern Industry,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. HAYNES: Answering your inquiry concerning my views on unified transportation, there is an old saying "Competition is the life of trade." I might add that a stable national economy is an adjusted national economy.

I know of no practical way to bring our national economy into equitable adjustment other than by free play of fair competition. The business trend that has eliminated competition has thrown our national economy out of adjustment, a trend that must be curbed.

Unified transportation will restrain competition and intensify the maladjustment of our national price structure. Such a policy is detrimental to the national welfare. To have free enterprise and keep open the door of opportunity to the American people, we must eliminate artificial monopoly by fostering fair competition.

Sincerely yours,
COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DAN R. McGEHEE
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. McGEHEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I want to pay tribute to one of the greatest Democratic leaders that this country has ever produced. A man who kept alive the Democratic organization in the State of New York for many years just as the South has done for 80 years.

During this long period as the political tide ebbed and flowed, the Democratic Party many times reached a very low status, and the man I am paying tribute to and a few other men of the North, together with the solid South, continue to keep unfurled the Democratic banner and march forward with it in every political battle.

It is a source of regret to all good Democrats that this man saw fit to withdraw his official position of leadership in the party. The one I refer to is the Honorable James A. Farley, of New York.

Jim Farley should be today the leader of the Democratic Party, because he is a Democrat and not poisoned with New Dealism and every other "ism" that is foreign to the principles and doctrines of true democracy.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with my remarks, I desire to include an editorial from the Nashville Tennesseean of Wednesday, July 12, 1944. This editorial expresses the uniform feeling and sentiment of all good southern Democrats relative to the life work of Jim Farley for the Democratic Party.

The editorial follows:

GREAT DEMOCRAT

The voluntary withdrawal of Jim Farley from a position of official leadership in the Democratic Party, after all these years of untiring, unselfish service, can only be a source of genuine regret to good Democrats everywhere.

Jim Farley is and has always been a big man, a fine and capable leader; the best organizer either party has known in a generation, and a man whose personal traits of character have endeared him to the thousands who could feel they knew him well.

"A man who always would act according to his own conscience," is the tribute paid Mr. Farley by another former national chairman, Edward J. Flynn, at the testimonial dinner upon the occasion of his retirement from the New York State chairmanship. And that expresses only inadequately the admiration all good Democrats feel for this man.

Mr. Farley is a man of deep-seated convictions on political principles. But even among those within the party, who entertained opposing principles, there is ungrudging acknowledgment of his superior qualities as a man and of the party's debt of gratitude for services freely and smilingly rendered over a period of 35 years.

Jim Farley was for all those years and still is one of history's great Democratic leaders.

Problems Facing Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, Congress reconvened August 1, after its summer recess, to face a number of serious and complicated problems. Heading the list are those of contract termination and reconversion, jobs for the returning veterans, and disposal of surplus Government property.

The Government owns thousands of military and naval establishments throughout the country, with their attendant equipment. It owns war plants geared to the production of vast quantities of war matériel, and war matériel only. And, when the victory has been won, all this property must be disposed of, as must the factories, unless we are to have State socialism, or communism, and an end of private business, of opportunity for the individual.

When the war has been won, our servicemen, numbering into the millions, will be returning, seeking jobs. We must plan so that those jobs will be ready for our boys.

As everyone is aware, the greater percent of our factories and industries is devoted entirely to war production. Accompanying the success of our military and naval operations will be the necessity for terminating war contracts, converting to civilian production. That cannot be accomplished overnight. And, during the transition period, workers will necessarily be idle. The effect upon our civilian economy of that period of idleness may well be disastrous.

The Special Committee of the Senate and House on Post-War Economic Policy and Planning have made an investigation of these comprehensive subjects and a bill has been introduced providing for the disposal of surplus Government property and plants. The House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which committee I am a member, is giving consideration to that bill.

It takes no effort of the imagination to realize the enormity of the task confronting Congress in determining upon a course of action which will most adequately meet the needs of all our people. Millions upon millions of dollars worth of Government property cannot just be "dumped" upon the market without adversely affecting regular production and market trends as well as employment. Millions and millions of returning veterans cannot be permitted to seek vainly for jobs. Some provision must be made for their absorption into our economy without displacing other workers.

Every Member of Congress would be glad to have suggestions as to how the curtailment of jobs which will follow the cessation of war orders can best be avoided. Everyone wants to avoid unemployment but just how it can be done still remains a problem because, with our ever-increasing debt and interest charges, payment of wages, even if possible, to those out of employment, as proposed by unemployment compensation bills, is no solution. That would give temporary relief, act as a sedative, but would not cure nor end unemployment.

Some remedy must be found through the cooperation of labor, employers, and Government. Congress is seeking the solution. The cancelation of many of the restrictive, paralyzing Government rules, regulations, and directives will help.

War Record of American Citizens of Indian Blood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, the record made in this war by our citizens of Indian blood is a record that we are all proud of. The Japs know what the war cry of the Sioux means—they know what the unerring aim of these warriors means.

The hereditary enemy of the Sioux, in North Dakota, the Gros Ventres, the Mandans, and the Arikara are equally as valiant in our armies across the sea. To let the public know the mental attitude of these Indian warriors, I quote a full letter from Bennie Black Hawk in Italy to his sister. This letter was delivered to me by Bennie's mother, Mrs. Ernest Black Hawk, Van Hook, N. Dak.:

ITALY, May 19, 1944.

DEAR SISTER: Got your letter the other night, and I'm really glad to hear from home again.

How are you and mother getting along at home? And the rest? Fine I hope. For my part I'm still O. K. over here in Italy.

I am back from the front for a rest, but will be going back up again soon.

I heard from Ivan and Sammie and Charley Parshall; they're all O. K.

If I don't get knocked out I am going to try and stick to the fight until the war is over. And still got the Japs to knock the hell out of it; after we finished Germans.

Today I am sending you some things I picked up in one of the towns we took over.

Now it's getting pretty hot here in Italy—bombs bursting all around us—but we are pushing the Germans back fast.

No further statements about the war, the regulations are pretty strict.

The paper you are getting from home tells you more than we can from here.

Hope to hear from you again.

Your brother,

BENNIE.

What the Centuries Say Against the Hours

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD a very moving and inspiring sermon delivered in the First Baptist Church of Tampa, Fla., on Sunday morning, April 30, 1944, by Dr. Roland Q. Leavell, whom Senators will remember as having on one occasion officiated as Chaplain of the Senate.

There being no objection, the sermon was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT THE CENTURIES SAY AGAINST THE HOURS

(Sermon delivered by Dr. Roland Q. Leavell, in the First Baptist Church, Tampa, Fla., on Sunday morning, April 30, 1944)

Text: "By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to bear affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward." Hebrews xi: 24–26.

Some people are more concerned about where and how to spend the day than where and how to spend eternity. Spiritual nearsightedness is more tragic in the long run than physical blindness. Emerson said, "Religion is believing what the centuries say against the hours." To be sure, this is not all of religion, but true religion should lead one to take the long view of things. True religion should keep one's ears open to the teachings of history, and one's eyes open to the realities of the future, while one's hands and heart are directed to the duties of the present.

The author of Hebrews, writing in the eleventh chapter, saw people of his own day in the heat of the battle of temptations and persecutions. He inspired them to take the long look toward the heights of future attainments by telling them about those of the past who had attained through faith. Moses was the greatest man of all time before the days of John the Baptist and Christ. It has been said of him:

"By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave,
In a vale in the land of Moab,
There lies a lonely grave;
But no man knows that sepulcher,
And no man saw it e'er,
For the angels of God upturned the sod,
And laid the dead man there.

"This was the truest warrior
That ever buckled sword,
This the most gifted poet
That ever breathed a word;
And never earth's philosopher
Traced with his golden pen,
On the deathless page, truths half so sage
As he wrote down for men."

—Cecil Frances Alexander.

Why was he the greatest of antiquity? It is because he took the long look to the future rather than living merely for the present. He listened to what the centuries said against the hours. He chose exile with the children of God rather than power over the people of Egypt; he chose affliction in doing the will of God rather than the pleasure of a sinful society; he chose the reproach of Christ rather than the treasures of Egypt. He listened to the centuries rather than the hours.

Like Moses, every one of us will have both a desert and a crown, but the order in which we take them makes a vast difference. Moses could have had a crown for the day, but he would have had a desert during all the centuries of the unfolding future. He chose the desert for the day in order to be crowned for all time and eternity. He had respect for the recompense of the reward of righteous living. It behooves us today to get some eternity in our living. As we listen to what the centuries say against the hours let us hear three outstanding truths which are taught.

I. MORAL RIGHTEOUSNESS IS HAPPIER THAN THE PLEASURES OF SIN

1. Sin always leads to sorrow. The hours say, "Take a social drink"; the centuries clamor for sobriety. The hours say, "Drink will bring joy"; the centuries say, "It brings inevitable pain." The hours say, "Drink and have friends"; the centuries say, "Drink leads to loneliness and friendlessness." The hours say, "Drink and get rich in business"; the centuries say, "Drink is a sure forerunner of failure and poverty." The hours say, "Use the Sabbath day for worldly pleasure"; the centuries say, "Use the Lord's day for worship of God and spiritual development." The hours say, "Live in sensuality"; the centuries say, "Devote yourself to purity in all things."

2. Honesty is better than policy. Benjamin Franklin said, "Honesty is the best policy"; L. Q. C. Lamar said, "Honesty is better than policy." The hours say, "Get while getting is good"; the centuries say, "Get only that which is for our good." The hours say, "Questionable gain displays shrewdness and cleverness"; the centuries say, "Honesty is the greater cleverness."

We are told that Mark Twain was engaged with a partner in a business which failed because of his partner's incompetence or dishonesty. If any man ever had a right to claim the bankruptcy law and avoid paying the debts of a business, surely Mark Twain did in that business in which he owned only a small proportion of the stock. However, he knew he had a moral obligation to pay. He could have avoided much poverty and sacrifice for the hour, but he would have suffered immeasurable loss through the centuries. He took a trip around the world writing a number of books and articles and used all of the money to pay the debts that were incurred by his partner. Today, as the century after Mark Twain's life is speaking, it declares that he displayed the greater cleverness by his complete honesty.

3. Crime does not pay. When we see the Dillingers and Al Capones of crime in the heyday of their power revelling in the preeminence and pleasures of their ill-gotten gain, we are tempted to say that they have chosen the way that pays best. Time tells in the tragic death of Dillinger and in the complete destruction of health, mentality, and fortune of Capone. When a short-sighted man like Mussolini sees the Japanese overrunning and exploiting Manchuria, he believes that that is the wiser way. In turn, the nearsighted Hitler sees Mussolini overrunning Ethiopia, so he follows in his footsteps to overrun the little countries of Europe. The unthinking man is tempted to say that the way of the aggressor and the dictator is the better way. The long look of the centuries shows us a debauched Alexander, a suicidal Hannibal, a murdered Caesar, an exiled Napoleon, a disgraced Mussolini, a beleaguered Hitler, and a Japanese Government tottering on the brink of complete collapse. The centuries tell us of the folly and failure of the principle of ruthlessness, selfishness, and crime.

4. Truth is stronger than falsehood. A mother who had caught her little son in a falsehood asked him what the Bible says about a lying tongue. In the typical philosophy of the short-sighted and dishonest of view of things, he said, "A lying tongue is an abomination unto the Lord, a very present help in the time of trouble." He, too, was listening to the hours instead of the centuries. Truth, unvarnished and unadulterated, always pays.

Once I met Alonzo Stagg, who for 45 years was the athletic idol of the students of the University of Chicago. He was loved as much for his character as for his coaching. Some months ago a successful business man told of an incident in a baseball game when the University of Chicago was defending its title. A Chicago man was on second when the batter knocked a single. The man on second raced around, cut the third base sack, and was rushing toward home plate. Stagg ran out swiftly, waved his hands and yelled frantically, "Go back, go back to third. You cut third by a yard." The runner answered, "But the umpire did not see me." Stagg continued his frantic waving and screaming, "That makes no difference. Go back. You cut third by a yard. Go back." Chicago lost the game, but Stagg won a character by his truthfulness. This present-day successful businessman determined there to play the game of life honestly as long as he lived.

It is the old story of the difference between the waves and the tide.

"On the far reef the breakers
Recoil in shattered foam,
Yet still the sea behind them
Urges its forces home;
Its chant of triumph surges
Through all the thunderous din—
The wave may break in failure,
But the tide is sure to win.

"The reef is strong and cruel;
Upon its jagged wall
One wave, a score, a hundred
Broken and beaten fall;
Yet in defeat they conquer,
The sea comes flooding in—
Wave upon wave is routed,
But the tide is sure to win.

"O mighty sea! Thy message
In changing spray is cast;
Within God's plan of progress
It matters not at last
How wide the shores of evil,
How strong the reefs of sin—
The wave may be defeated,
But the tide is sure to win."

—Priscilla Leonard.

Truth, as well as the tide, is sure to win.

II. UNSELFISH SERVICE IS MORE PROFITABLE THAN SELFISH GAIN

The hours said to Moses, "Choose the court of Pharaoh"; the centuries said, "Go to the desert by the will of God." The hours said, "The wealth of Egypt is yours"; the centuries said, "The reproach of Christ is eternally glorious." The hours said, "Look out for number one"; the centuries said, "Unselfish service is the pathway to glory."

Again, it was Emerson who said, "See how the masses of men worry themselves into nameless graves, while occasionally some great soul forgets himself into immortality." Many years before Emerson, Jesus said, "If any man would be great among you, let him become the servant of all."

1. Moses' choice of unselfish service was immortally wise. The centuries have proved that his service was more profitable than selfishness. The literature of the hour was the literature of Egypt; the writings for the centuries came from the golden pen of Moses when he wrote the immortal first five books of the Bible, and the glorious ninetieth Psalm. The nation of the hour was the pagan nation of the Egyptians, but the centuries have proved the power of the people of God under the leadership of Moses. The music of the hour was the sensual songs of the Egyptians; the music of the ages is the "song of Moses and the Lamb" to be sung even in the glory of the hereafter.

2. Unselfish service is the higher selfishness. It is impossible to render an unselfish service to others without receiving a double recompense of reward. Following the Boxer revolution in China many nations of the world exacted a heavy indemnity from the Chinese people. The others kept their booty, but the United States of America returned her indemnity to China by building a big school in Pekin and furnishing scholarships for Chinese students to attend American universities. The territory gained by France and Germany has been lost by them. The money kept by England has long since been dissipated. The international friendship cemented between American and the Chinese is priceless in value to us today.

Jesus demonstrated the heavenly truth that unselfish service is the pathway to greatness, and his experience shouts down to us through the centuries, "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it" (Matthew xvi: 25). "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: who, being in the form of God, thought it not a thing to be grasped to be equal with God: but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of man: and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore, God also hath highly exalted him and given him a name which is above every name" (Philippians ii: 5-9).

"Speak, History, who are life's victors? Unroll thy long annals and say,
Are they those whom the world calls victors—who won the success of a day?
The martyrs, or Nero? The Spartans who fell at Thermopylae's tryst.
Or the Persians and Xerxes? His judges or Socrates? Pilate or Christ?"

III. SPIRITUAL GODLINESS IS MORE GLORIOUS THAN MATERIALISTIC ATHEISM

Again let me remind you, the hours said, "Take the treasures of Egypt;" the centuries said, "Choose the reproach of Christ." The philosophy of the hour always counts on the bird in the hand of present day possessions being worth two in the bush of faith for the future. The philosophy of the centuries leads us to order our life today with due respect for the recompense of the future reward for our faith.

1. Materialistic atheism never produced greatness. Neither sheer materialism nor its attendant atheism has ever produced a great group of men, or a great age of literature, or a great contribution in art or music or sculpture. Materialism and atheism do not build asylums and hospitals nor advance education and civilization. Those who are willing to share the offense of the cross and are anxious to walk humbly with God are those who live glorious lives of victory and usefulness. Hear the voice of the centuries today and choose Christ. Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, young people. If you are wise you will take the long look. Selfishness and ungodliness have never produced any happy old people. You need faith in Christ which alone can bring you spiritual godliness.

Religion is often defined with platitudinous phrases about indefinite concepts. The dictionary realistically defines it thus: "Religion is an awareness or conviction about a Supreme Being, which arouses love, gratitude, and the will to serve and obey." Today I would urge you to take God into account, to find Him through faith in Jesus Christ, and let godliness be the dominant dedication of your life as you live in obedience, service, and love.

2. Godliness gives amazing returns in the life that now is and promises a heavenly recompense of reward in the life that is to come. The ungodly people of the Bible are not the liars and thieves and murderers and such vile people of wickedness. Such people are spoken of in the Bible as the wicked people. The ungodly people may be clean and law-abiding citizens, paying their debts and living faithfully in their homes, but they leave God out of their lives. They never pray, they play golf instead of worshiping on Sunday, they give no time to Bible study, they make no contribution to the missionary enterprise, and they never lead a soul to Christ. The most glorious and profitable life known to man is one characterized by loving God with the whole mind, heart, soul, and strength, and loving one's fellow man as himself.

3. Are you convinced? Are you taking the long look? Are you willing to take Christ by faith today? Can you, and will you, now maturely decide to put your hand in the hand of God and walk toward the darkness of the future, counting that better than a light and safer than a known way? Today, hear what the centuries say against the hours. Take the far look of faith. Get some eternity into your life. Trust God and walk with Christ.

Speech by Hon. Abe Murdock, of Utah, Nominating Hon. Elbert D. Thomas, of Utah, for Vice President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago on July 21, 1944, the distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] was honored by having his name placed in nomination for the high office of Vice President of the United States. The nominating speech was made by another distinguished colleague of ours, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], who in his usual felicitous and happy manner paid deserved tribute to the fine qualities of heart and mind which have endeared the senior Senator from Utah to all Members of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the nominating speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The man whose name I shall place in nomination for the high office of Vice President of the United States of America has already attained eminence as a Member of the United States Senate. He was elected to the Senate the same year Franklin Roosevelt was elected President, and he has since risen in the Senate to a position of influence and prestige surpassed by no one—equalled by but a few.

His Senate committee memberships have been important ones. From them he has gained knowledge, training, and experience, with which to meet the military problems of the remaining years of this war, with which to meet the problems of diplomacy and international relations of the post-war years, with which to meet the problems—social, economic and political—which here in America we have yet to solve, if the hope and promise of this land to mankind are to be fulfilled and the comman man is to rise to full stature.

He is ranking member of the Senate Military Affairs Committee. He and the other members of that committee have shaped the war legislation, which has lifted this Nation from a nearly fatal disaster, to the position of the greatest military giant in the world today.

He is also a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. How fateful a role that committee plays in the lives of men, women, and children all over the world—with war and peace, life and death, at stake—we are all too well aware. All who are here remember how after World War No. 1, a few "willful men" without vision in the minority party on that committee sabotaged a peace, and for petty, personal and partisan reasons, brought the world again to the misery, terror, and destruction of war.

These two committee memberships have given Utah's senior Senator experience and training in the military tasks necessary to be done during the remaining war years, and training and experience for far-sighted statesmanship, even more necessary, during the post-war years, in dealing with the complex relations between our country and the rest of the world.

The people of this land are united as never before on the demand of our commanders for the unconditional surrender of the enemy, and the people are equally, if not more firmly, united on their own demand for cooperation with our allies, and the other nations of the world, through international organization, to assure for our sons and daughters a lasting peace. Our Senator has devoted a lifetime of study, travel, writing, and teaching, as well as his 12 years in the Senate, to that end.

His tact, good humor, and resourcefulness, his wide experience and scholarship, have gained for him the esteem of his associates in the Senate. He knows its business; he has the good will and support of its Members; he has often presided over it.

He is chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. Workers of all classes haven't a more intelligent or more courageous champion in public life. He has exposed factory espionage and labor terrorism; he has advocated full employment and increased standards of living. Realizing that most workers are not members of either of the two great labor unions, he urges higher wages and standards of living for them, including the white-collar workers.

His work in the Senate reflects his high regard for the place of education in American society. He is the author and sponsor of the Federal aid to education bill to provide equal educational opportunity, and he is the author and sponsor of the educational provisions of the legislation known as the G. I. bill of rights, providing opportunity for returned soldiers to resume or pursue their education and training.

He is a Jeffersonian Democrat; he is a Jacksonian Democrat; he is a Wilsonian Democrat; but, better than all of these, he is a Franklin Delano Roosevelt Democrat.

The humanitarian in the White House, whose great-hearted works for the welfare of mankind, for aid to the aged, the sick, and afflicted, the unemployed, the unfortunate, and the sorely pressed will endear him to the hearts of men and women all down through centuries to come, has disciples among all liberal-minded men.

Not by any means the least of these is Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS, scholar, author, soldier, statesman, liberal humanitarian, whom I am privileged and honored to nominate for the office of Vice President of the United States.

Fourth of July Address at Milwaukee by Hon. Alexander Wiley, of Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a talk delivered by me on July 4 over Station WISN, in Milwaukee, Wis.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We celebrate today the one hundred and sixty-eighth birthday of our beloved Nation.

In the year 1776, on the 4th day of July, the representatives of the several States in Congress assembled, formally declared the independence of our land, so that we might forever here in America enjoy "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." I repeat these words, "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"—they are words of dynamite to tyranny.

In the second paragraph of the Declaration the Members of the Continental Congress stated that "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind" required them to declare the causes for their action.

Because the Continental Congress set forth their reasons so clearly we can profitably review them here today—particularly as they apply to our land as we again face a turning point in our history.

To begin with, the Continental Congress asserted its belief that it was a self-evident truth that "all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Those are golden words. Life and liberty were threatened in 1776, and life and liberty are again menaced today.

"Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." How complete a definition of American ideals has been compressed into so few words.

In the lands which have fallen under the shadow of dictator control, these words are only a hollow mockery. In Japanese-controlled portions of China and in Nazi-terrorized Norway, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Low Countries—everywhere the Japanese and German war lords have marched—everywhere in these lands life is cheap, liberty only a dream, and the pursuit of happiness only a cherished memory.

We waged war in 1776 because we believed that governments should derive the just powers from the consent of the governed. We believed that freemen were entitled to liberty as a natural heritage from their Creator.

We still hold that belief today, and that is why we are at war with those forces which would ruthlessly ravage all liberties and all freedoms.

Over a century and a half has passed since men of conviction first wrote this immortal charter of human liberties, and during that time the doctrine of human liberty spread to many lands and many people. But in our generation it met with the resistance of an organized barbaric tyranny.

Because we seek to keep faith with our ideals of human liberty we are again at war.

During the Revolutionary War we were poorly equipped in every sense but one. We had no money and Congress had no authority either to levy taxes or to borrow. We faced the largest navy in the world. We had only a few small vessels. We faced an army that was well trained and had everything necessary for comfort and military efficiency. Our colonial volunteers were unskilled and sometimes undisciplined. They were poorly supplied and fed. Very few of our men had uniforms. Enlistment terms were very short.

But with all these shortcomings, we had had one tremendous fighting force on our side. We had the knowledge that we were right. We had the conviction that our cause was just. We had the comfort of an ideal of human freedom. We had the driving force of a burning desire for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We had a deep and reverent faith in the beliefs for which we fought—and we had a devout confidence in a divine Providence. We were spear-heading one of the great movements of the race, in a pivotal period in history.

These things we had then—and these things we have today.

It is true that today we fight a war of machines—but it is also true that war is still a battle of men and ideals.

It is with these men and with these ideals that we are most concerned today. It is our sacred obligation to keep faith with the men of the Revolutionary War and with the men of this war and with the men of every war where freedom has ever been at stake.

It is our sacred trust to keep faith with the ideals which made us a free land and which have served as guiding polestars ever since. Freedom and liberty are not mere catch words to our fighting men. They are flesh and blood realities for which men die and have died ever since the beginning of time.

Our fighting men give life to liberty on the battlefronts. We at home must give more than lip-service to the same ideals.

Because our beliefs in freedom and liberty and the pursuit of happiness are deep-rooted in the hearts and minds of every American, we can look to the future with hope and assurance.

In 1776 this day was the birthday of liberty. Today all over this land it is our fervent hope that this year or next year will again witness a new birth of liberty—a liberty for oppressed peoples everywhere from the whiplash of tyranny and oppression.

One hundred and sixty-eight years have passed since the first Fourth of July. In this land we have—since that day—witnessed more material progress than any other land since the beginning of time. Along with the material progress and the material change we have, however, retained the basic ideals which made this a great country.

In other lands there has also been material progress in the corresponding period, but there has too often been little spiritual growth. That made dictatorships possible.

In this land on this Fourth of July we can again renew our faith in the pledges of the founding fathers. We fight for those ideals today and it is our prayer today that soon we may enjoy them in an era of peace.

We, on this birthday of a nation, pray for adequacy, individual and national adequacy, so that we may loyally and efficiently meet the demands upon us and transmit unimpaired the great freedoms of America to the generations that follow.

Hon. James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial on "Jim Farley's Resignation," written and published by former United States Senator Walter Walker in the June 14 issue of his newspaper the Grand Junction Sentinel. Mr. Walker is one of the most forceful and dynamic country editors in the Nation and his brief appraisal of the leading Democrat in America is right down the groove. Many Members of Congress will want to read it.

I intended making this request before the recent recess of Congress, but owing to a technicality and a misunderstanding, it was not acted upon.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JIM FARLEY'S RESIGNATION

It goes without saying that the resignation of James A. Farley as chairman of the largest and most influential Democratic State committee in the Nation has been one of the chief subjects of comment and speculation in political circles.

For 14 years, Jim Farley has been New York's State chairman, and 2 years previous to that long continuous service he was its secretary. No abler man ever held a similar post in any one of the 48 States. Triumph after triumph of the Democratic Party in the Empire State in the last decade and a half were due in a large degree to the tireless efforts, the impeccable character, the attractive personality, and the amazing organizing ability of James A. Farley. His resignation did not come as a surprise, but it did call forth widespread regret, and this regret was not confined by any manner of means to those who saw eye to eye politically with this man who not only distinguished himself as a leader in New York State but who made a record in many ways unmatched, and to the credit of himself, his party, and his country, as Democratic national chairman and as Postmaster General.

Clearly, concisely, and with the sincerity and honesty that have always marked Jim Farley's career and activities, he set forth his reasons in a brief statement. Without Mr. Farley's having made any effort to make it so, that statement is a masterpiece among political announcements in its simple language and its genuine nature.

There was no comfort to those who hoped to see the great political leader bolt his party in the answer he made at a press conference to a reporter who asked him about his future political activities. He said, "It is only natural for a fellow who has always been a Democrat to be interested in the success of the Democratic Party."

There isn't any political designation, honor of assignment that the Democratic Party could have given or could give to Jim Farley that would be too big for him. His remarkable ability will be missed in New York State party organizations and in national political party organizations.

Jim Farley, still one of the most popular figures in the political, public, and business life of the Nation, will continue to wield a tremendous influence in national affairs.

The Republican Party and Isolationism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by a very wise citizen of this great country to the editor of the Christian Science Monitor, a great newspaper, upon the very pertinent subject Can We Again Trust the Republican Party, If Dewey Is Elected President, Not To Return to Political and Economic Isolationism After the War Is Over? I commend to my colleagues the reading of that very able letter and profiting by its counsel.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 31, 1944.

EDITOR, CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Can we again trust the Republican Party, if Dewey is elected President, not to return to political and economic isolationism after the war is over?

In the Harding-Cox campaign the Republican Party promised on its word of honor to give us a better league of nations than the the one Wilson offered. The party made more positive promises in this respect then than it does today. Harding said that he would give us a league. Hoover said that the Republican Party had given us its word of honor to establish a league. And Root, Hughes, Taft, and many other Republican leaders, more outstanding than any of the men the party has today, made speeches saying that the surest way to secure a league of nations was to vote for Harding.

But the Republican Party chucked the League out of its plans as soon as Harding was elected. The Republican Party double-crossed the country in the Harding-Cox campaign and returned to political isolationism. That party finally wrecked us with economic isolationism, also in Hoover's administration, when it passed the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill.

As a result of the duplicity of the Republican Party, every man and woman who voted for Harding in 1920 voted also for World War No. 2, and voted away the lives of thousands of our boys in a second world war which could have been avoided.

The promises of the Republican Party regarding our international relations after the war is over are not as forthright as they were in the Harding campaign. The party does not give us its word of honor this time to work wholeheartedly with other nations in establishing permanent world peace and trade. As Willkie says, Dewey can do anything he wants to do, for or against international cooperation, under the planks in the Republican platform. And the set-up of the Republican Party today is as bad as it was in the Harding campaign. Its candidate for President is a so-called honest Harding who was an isolationist up to shortly before Pearl Harbor. The control of the policies of the Republican Party today is still largely in the grip of isolationist leaders, just as it was in the Harding administration.

Again, in any case, hundreds of thousands of voters are going to be double-crossed if the Republican candidate for President wins. The party must either double-cross the isolationist and members of the subversive America first movement on whose votes it is hoping to win, or double-cross the patriotic Republican voters who are for full cooperation with other nations in preserving world peace.

Judging by the Republican Party's record in the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations, and by its record in the Senate and House of Representatives the past 4 years, it would again be the Republicans who favor international cooperation who would be double-crossed if Dewey is elected. The overwhelming majority of Republicans in the House and the Senate voted against lifting the arms embargo, the Selective Service Act, lend-lease, and every other measure Roosevelt advanced to prepare us for war and to enable the British and the Russians to survive the German onslaught. If the Republican Party had been in power the Germans would have won the war. And what good are Dewey's promises anyway regarding international cooperation when we know he would be obliged to overcome the unalterable opposition of Republican isolationists and reactionaries in the House and the Senate to fulfill them?

Can we again trust the Republican Party with the lives of our boys of another generation and with the problem of preserving lasting world peace?

Sincerely yours,

BRAD STEPHENS.

Our Chance for Lasting Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. O. EASTLAND

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Our Chance for Lasting Peace," by Hon. Littleton Upshur, editor of the Greenwood Commonwealth, of Greenwood, Miss.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR CHANCE FOR LASTING PEACE

The two most pressing domestic problems after the war will be jobs and taxes. And they both hinge on the profitable operation of private industry. That raises the question, Where will our industries find their markets?

In the future, with air transportation shrinking the globe to little more than a 24-hour trip to any point, our markets must be world-wide. Therefore, we must have a foreign trade policy that will enable us to sell, as well as buy, from our neighbors. Recognizing this condition, the statement of the newly organized Committee on International and Economic Policy, of which Winthrop W. Aldrich is Chairman, calls for a multilateral trade agreement for the United Nations, creating an international economic charter to define the rights of traders and investors in foreign countries. It endorses unconditional most-favored-nation treatment, rejects regional preferential agreements and exchange restrictions, and states that if governments strengthen their policies of production and restriction to achieve security "in a contracting world economy * * * the end of that road is a third world war."

On this statement of fundamentals, Harry D. Gideonese, president of Brooklyn College, says: "This is an excellent doctrine, elementary free enterprise economics and sound political thinking. The repudiation of the trade-agreements program at this juncture would be a national tragedy. After the war there will be a crying demand for America's mass-production goods and farm products from every country in the world. If we maintain a liberal policy regarding imports, this demand can create thousands of post-war jobs in this country, utilizing industrial and agricultural capacity which otherwise would be idle.

"But to export, we must be willing to import. Hence, the renewal of the trade-agreements program is essential for maintenance of employment and business activity at a high level after the war. Moreover, in the Atlantic Charter the United States is pledged to the long-run principle that all nations, great and small, should have access on equal terms to the trade and raw materials of the world.

"Every country, therefore, if it wishes to promote the expansion of world trade, which is a fundamental condition for the establishment of a durable peace, must show greater willingness to accept the goods of other countries. In other words, the lowering of tariffs under the leadership of the great trading nations is an essential means of realizing the program of economic and political cooperation endorsed by the United Nations."

How Truman Won Over His Enemies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "How Truman Won Over His Enemies," by Willard

Shelton, from the Chicago Sun of August 13, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW TRUMAN WON OVER HIS ENEMIES

(By Willard Shelton)

One of the interesting stories about Senator TRUMAN, the Democratic Vice Presidential nominee, is the way he overcame the hostility, and gained the admiration, of the St. Louis afternoon newspapers in his own home State. If this column seems personal, it is because I was writing editorials for the St. Louis Star-Times during that period and had the benefit of sitting in front of the teacher in what might be called the Truman school of applied democracy.

Boss Tom Pendergast, in his Kansas City heyday, never had more vigorous enemies than the St. Louis afternoon papers. Both are liberal, both are antimachine, and they fought the boss at every chance. When a Democratic Governor, Lloyd C. Stark, became convinced that Pendergast was personally crooked and went after him in 1939, the newspapers seized the opportunity to set the State aflame. A bill removing control of the Kansas City police from Pendergast was reluctantly passed by a State legislature which did not dare defy the eruption of public opinion.

STARK CHALLENGES TRUMAN

How does this involve HARRY TRUMAN? Well, Mr. TRUMAN had been sent to the Senate in 1934 with Pendergast's blessing, and his term was expiring. And in 1940, naturally enough, Lloyd Stark decided to challenge Mr. TRUMAN.

Missouri's liberal newspapers found the situation somewhat difficult. The Truman-Stark contest was complicated by the entrance of a third candidate, Maurice Milligan, the prosecuting attorney who had sent Pendergast to prison. Worse than that, Senator TRUMAN'S record was embarrassingly difficult to attack.

It was all very well to say that to destroy the Pendergast organization root and branch, every beneficiary should be defeated. But Governor Stark himself had originally been a beneficiary. And Maurice Milligan, who had no reason to love Mr. TRUMAN and had enormous investigatory powers, was unable to find a stain in the Truman record.

The Truman record, in fact, demonstrated not only unassailed personal integrity. His Senate career had been almost unexceptionable.

The Star-Times, despite these doubts, opposed Mr. TRUMAN in the primary, and I wrote many of the editorials against him. The Post-Dispatch opposed him. But neither of us could find any arguments except that vague Pendergast connection.

NEWSPAPERS EAT CROW

Mr. TRUMAN was renominated, and it was not long until the newspapers which had fought him were publicly eating crow. For he suddenly emerged, as chairman of the special committee investigating national defense, as the most useful single Member of the United States Senate.

I don't know what Lloyd Stark might have done in the Senate, but I know that TRUMAN'S patience, his fairness, his capacity to lead some of the ablest members of both parties, made his committee a great center of light revealing errors in a difficult period of the war conversion program.

He is credited with saving a billion dollars by his investigations, and many more billions by the simple fact that his committee was operating. More important in fixing the man's stature, I think, is the fact that, though a personal New Dealer, he never concealed unpleasant facts merely because they gave ammunition to the President's enemies.

This was the final factor which shifted liberal Missouri newspapers and taught some of us, at least, that selfrighteous opposition to "machines"—though the bad ones must be fought—is not a sound standard for judging every candidate. It wasn't you see, with HARRY TRUMAN—to whom a lot of people have made handsome apologies.

Proposed Washington Hospital Center

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILLARD E. TYDINGS

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Hospital of the Future," published in the Washington Evening Star of August 13, 1944, and an editorial entitled "Hospital Project," published in the Washington Post of August 14, 1944. Both editorials relate to the bill recently introduced by me in conjunction with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, relative to the construction of a modern hospital center in Washington.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Sunday Star of August 13, 1944]

HOSPITAL OF THE FUTURE

While the two are not directly related, the significance of Senator TYDINGS' bill proposing construction of a modern, adequate hospital for Washington is better understood when it is studied against the background of recent testimony of Surg. Gen. Thomas Parran of the United States Public Health Service before a Senate committee.

Dr. Parran, with many other distinguished physicians and laymen, sees a great awakening of public interest in all matters pertaining to health. He predicted a post-war demand for hospital care, as well as other forms of medical and health service, which seems certain to exceed anything we have known in the past. We must plan soon to meet these demands. We should plan now to evaluate the adequacy of our health facilities.

Senator TYDINGS' bill is a tangible move of great importance in anticipating the demand. It gains in importance by the nature of the support behind it. It is the direct result of many months of planning and study by Washington physicians and laymen concerned with the city's voluntary hospitals. The nucleus of the plan is the enthusiastic willingness of two of the city's largest voluntary hospitals—Emergency and Garfield—to combine their resources in the operation of what should be a model hospital plant, retaining only enough of their individuality to preserve their endowments, and welcoming the voluntary affiliation of other Washington hospitals.

The need for a new, modern, and adequate hospital for Washington requires no elaboration. The physical plants are not merely inadequate, but in many cases the original faults of poor planning have been magnified by obsolescence of equipment and an inability to operate without recurring deficits. But as Dr. Parran pointed out the mere building of more facilities is not the whole answer. "Along with the new facilities must go the ability to purchase care and the professional skill to furnish the service." The adequacy of hospitals of the future will not be measured merely in terms of bed space. Economies through scientific planning of facilities, joint use of maintenance services, and sound business management, together with the growth and perfection of prepaid medical insurance to relieve the hospitals of the expense of so-called charity cases, must bring the cost of hospital care within the reach of all who need it.

The community aspect of the hospital proposed in the Tydings bill is accentuated by the make-up of the board of the proposed hospital corporation, which includes representatives of the United States Public Health Service, the community chest, and the municipal government, along with the boards of Emergency and Garfield. Such administrative control would assure operation of the hospital in conformity with the over-all health needs of the community, while preserving what Dr. Parran refers to as "the present large capital and human investment in voluntary hospitals (which should be) protected and utilized to full capacity."

The Tydings bill offers a vehicle for general support, already indicated by the co-sponsorship of Senator BILBO and Representative RANDOLPH, chairmen of the two District legislative committees and Chairman D'ALESANDRO of the Health and Welfare Subcommittee of the House District Committee, and by the preparatory work of public-spirited citizens and physicians of Washington whose ideas have been given expression by Senator TYDINGS. Here is hopeful evidence of a real start in preparing for the sort of hospital care that the future will demand, and that Washington must provide.

[From the Washington Post of August 14, 1944]

HOSPITAL PROJECT

The bill which Senator TYDINGS has introduced jointly with Chairman BILBO of the Senate District Committee and which Representatives RANDOLPH and D'ALESANDRO will sponsor in the House has at least the virtue of reducing the proposal to construct a modern hospital center here to relatively concrete terms. In our opinion, it has a number of other virtues. One of these is that it ties the hospital center project in with two of the city's existing hospitals and leaves the way open for affiliation of other hospitals with the proposed center if they should decide to coordinate their activities with its junction.

As we understand the proposal, the medical center would be a combination of public and private enterprise. The Federal Works Administration would be instructed to acquire a site and construct the necessary buildings. But the Government would not undertake to manage or operate the center. Its business affairs would be carried on by a nonprofit corporation to be known as the Washington Hospital Corporation and the active operation of its medical facilities would be entrusted to Garfield and Emergency Hospitals. Both those institutions, as well as the District Commissioners, the Community Chest, and the United States Public Health Service would be represented on the proposed center's board.

Probably many citizens will dislike this mingling of public investment with private operation, even though no question of profit making arises. It must be readily admitted that the arrangement is not ideal. But the real question is whether a reasonable alternative is at hand. Difficulties might arise if the District attempted to operate such a medical center for the entire population along with its hospitals serving principally those who cannot pay their own way. On the other hand, there seems to be no prospect of raising private capital for such an undertaking. With large incomes almost taxed out of existence, endowments for hospitals as well as colleges and other semipublic institutions are sharply curtailed. And when no private funds for such purposes are available, the Government must necessarily step in and meet the public need. In the case of hospital care it is particularly imperative that public funds be supplied when that becomes necessary to safeguard the health of the people.

Consequently this bill seems to us to merit prompt, thoughtful and sympathetic consideration by Congress. It is not regarded by its authors as a finished product. Rather it represents a compromise approach to a difficult and important problem. We hope that its critics will be content to improve the plan and not to resist a necessary community project.

The Recent Powhatan Mine Disaster

REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL R. LEWIS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, many modern industries in which men earn a living for themselves and their families, and which in this time of war produce the raw materials for fabricating the weapons of war, are extremely hazardous. Coal mining is one of the most hazardous and intrinsically dangerous of industries and few industrial workers face more varied and ever-present dangers than the coal miner.

Death rides with him into the darkness of the mine and follows at his heels while he works in the dim light of the lamp on his cap and sometimes—all too many times—it catches up with him, usually suddenly and without warning. Sometimes it catches him in a blinding flash of light caused by a short circuit from the high-voltage trolley wire strung just below the roof of the entry through which he walks and within reach of his head or hand. Sometimes it catches him with a rumbling string of empty coal cars and leaves his body crushed and dismembered between the rails over which the coal is hauled. Sometimes it suddenly catches him in a narrow place in the entry and crushes his life out between the coal cars and the rib or side of the entry. Or sometimes it crushes him between the clashing steel bumpers of the cars. At other times it may suddenly and without warning drop upon him with crushing weight as the roof, coal and rock, over his head gives way and buries him under tons of debris; or it creeps upon him stealthily in the air he breathes loaded with the poisonous gases found in many mines; or sometimes an accidental spark or the backfire from a miner's shot ignites the coal dust and sets off an explosion that may travel hundreds of feet down an entry or haulage-way.

Mr. Speaker, on July 5, 1944, death came to 66 men who worked at the coal mine of the Powhatan Mining Co., at Powhatan Point, Ohio, in my county of Belmont and in my district. Some of them were miners and some were members of a surveying crew who were surveying the mine.

Details of what occurred may differ but reports agree that a sudden fall of stone broke the electric trolley wire which, being thus short-circuited, set fire to the coal, trapping some 65 men back of the fire. Heroically desperate but futile efforts were made to extinguish the fire. In a heroic attempt to save the trapped men, George Emery, mechanization foreman of the mine, in some manner got beyond the fire and was himself trapped.

When it became apparent that the fire could not be put out, work was immediately started at the direction of Roy W. Fox, mine superintendent, to drive an entry around the fire through the solid coal to the men who were trapped beyond; but when this effort seemed about to succeed suddenly the fire broke through the intervening coal and the rescue entry itself became a burning inferno. The fire was then beyond control and it was finally reluctantly decided to seal the mine as the only means of extinguishing it.

But even then it was still hoped to save the trapped men. Some of the men were experienced miners and knew how to brattice themselves against fire and the poisonous gases which it produces and it was hoped that they would thus seal themselves in their entry beyond the reach of the flames. In this hope it was suggested by Adolph Pacifico, vice president of district No. 6 of the United Mine Workers of America, that a hole be drilled from the surface of the hill overlying the entry where the men were trapped into the entry through which fresh air could be pumped and food and water could be supplied to the men until the fire became extinguished. This was done, but when the drill hole reached the entry no signs of life could be found. Apparently all had perished.

The names and residences of the men who thus lost their lives in one of Ohio's greatest and most tragic mine disasters are as follows:

Ambridge, Pa.: Andrew Punko.

Bellaire, Ohio: John Burda, Edward Dennis, Henry Johnson, Wilson McFadden, Lester Marling, Hampton Mathews, Tie P. Miller, Fletcher Reives, Charles Stevens, Melvin Smith.

Bridgeport, Ohio: James Jobb.

Cameron, Ohio: Edward Pletcher.

Captina, W. Va.: Glen M. Wingrove.

Clarington, Ohio: Glenn Cook, Henry Hawley, William Hawley, Charles Nelson, Boyd Taylor.

Glencoe, Ohio: James Gibson, Harry McGilton, Dwight Mellott, Virgil Preston, Andrew Sichi, John Yablonski.

Jacobsburg, Ohio: Russell Caldwell, Mike Chimley, Myron Wright.

Neffs, Ohio: John Johnson.

New York, N. Y.: Dain Bragg.

Powhatan Point, Ohio: Floyd W. Aberegg, Jacob Bellville, Charles Brown, Odell Brown, Wilson Brown, Alex Cieslewski, Sherman Cordery, Clinton Corwin, George Emery, Earl R. Gibson, Adam Gursky, Raymond Jackson, Roy Jennewin, Dale Jones, Charles Kacir, Wilbert Knuefener, Samuel Larkin, Denver Lee, James McConaughey, Ralph McGonagle, Robert Munas, Virgil Newkirk, John Stewart, Mattia Simonetti, Pete Utka, Ned VanGosen, Avrel Vaught, Ralph Vilkoski, John Warsnick, George Wisor.

St. Clairsville, Ohio: Frank Reick.

Shadyside, Ohio: Dorsey Hartline, Mike Harvey, Dewey Munas, Tony Wach.

Wheeling, W. Va.: William Zemmik.

Mr. Speaker, without the mining of coal our modern civilization could not exist, and our tremendous war effort would never have come into being. This disaster—for such it was—reminds us that the occupation of a coal miner is an extremely hazardous and honorable occupation and is one that is absolutely essential to the well-being of each one of us and to the very existence of the civilization of which we are so proud.

Mr. Speaker, while it will be impossible, under the rules of the House, to chronicle the deeds of individuals who helped in the rescue work, this should be said of them: Each one of them has in his soul the stuff of which heroes are made, and it should also be said of the men who were trapped in the mine behind the fire and who lost their lives that, had they been on the outside of the mine and others trapped, they, each one, would have shown those same qualities of fortitude and heroic courage displayed by the rescuers and would themselves have heroically volunteered for the rescue work.

Out of this terrible disaster let us hope and pray that new safeguards may be evolved for the men who daily risk their lives in the mines that we may be warmed and the wheels of industry may not stop, and that the Nation, now engaged in the death struggle of war, may not lack the weapons to conquer a speedy victory.

To the members of the families of these brave men whose death has saddened whole communities in eastern Ohio, let us express our sorrow and our deepest sympathy; and for that purpose, Mr. Speaker, let us pause a moment in the deliberations of the Congress of the United States in honor of the memory of these men of the mines and as an expression of sympathy for those who have been bereaved.

Editorial on the Recent Powhatan Mine Disaster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL R. LEWIS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I have taken the floor for this short time to present to the House an editorial written by a newspaper man of my district, Mr. W. H. McWilliams, of St. Clairsville, Ohio, known to newspaper readers as "Hi Waters."

This editorial was written on July 8, 1944, and was inspired by the terrible mine disaster which took the lives of 66 men in the burning coal mine at Powhatan Point, Belmont County, Ohio. This editorial, inspired by the tragic deaths of so many men, must have given some measure of comfort to their relatives and friends and, in my opinion, expresses an attitude toward death which we all might well adopt.

The editorial is as follows:

There's hardly anything in this life which is more uncertain than life itself.

And in this big world of ours—which is getting smaller and smaller—one of the most important things is when and how we leave it. There's no question, of course, who leaves it because everybody does that sooner or later.

We come into this world with just a minor flutter of interest and that generally is localized to the immediate family and small circle of friends who slap the father on the back, get a cigar in return, and a more or less embarrassed nod from the mother.

We rate considerable more of interest while we are growing up, going to school, entering business or the trades and, in turn, raise a family. If we are very fortunate—depending on how you look at it—we get national attention because we become President, Congressman, or dog catcher.

But all in all, outside those whose names are in headlines every day or week, the world never hears of us until we get up from life's party and walk out into the golden horizon of the hereafter.

If we do it in a sensational manner, we get lots and lots of attention. If we just casually saunter out after being around for numerous years, nobody practically notices our departure. But, as I said before, it's by far the most important thing we do—from a public standpoint—and will always be that way until this old world gets tired herself and disintegrates in the starry heavens where she has rotated so long.

Down at Powhatan on July 5 some 66 citizens of that community walked out of this life in a most unexpected manner and without any previous warning, notice, or intention. Those men, miners, did what every one of us will do later on and at times not now known. We will do it, likely, singly and individually and will not cause near the commotion as we would do were we to walk out all together. But we will leave just the same.

The above few paragraphs represent the things I would say to the survivors of those brave Powhatan miners who were victims of a sudden and unexpected accident deep in their coal mine, were I called upon to preach their funeral sermon.

I could think of a few things to say which I would regard more soothing than by pointing out that everybody on this planet, sooner or later, will have to depart from the party of life and that it is just a part of a broad plan to get all of earth's people into a permanent location.

A person does a lot of thinking back in the hollows of Cats Run with the majestic moon looking down on the silent trees and the towering hills and upon the throbbing sorrows of men. A person gets to speculating that you're pretty small fry putting your 2 cents' worth against the forces of Nature.

Down there in that darkened corner of sorrow men from all walks of life had gathered to help—if they could. There were preachers, storekeepers, auto dealers, insurance agents, farmers, and bankers. Probably the most experienced brains in the coal industry from both sides of the table were there and doing everything they could.

The most sensitive instruments known to science and the most modern inventions of the skilled minds of man were put to use trying to outflank a quirk of fate that had happened far under the verdant trees that spotted—like stubby whiskers—the face of Nature.

As the tops of the hills grew gray with early morning light and the night's dew shimmered and brightened as if Nature herself were weeping tears of remorse, men still labored on, and you couldn't help but feel warm that men had become, overnight, neighborly and helpful and compassionate.

The men who are today lying under the hills of that wildly beautiful spot back of Powhatan and who walked out so unexpectedly can be thankful in the new life, that an entire community and State and Nation had paused a moment in their mad rush of existence to drop a tear at their dramatic departure—to pay respect to their memories.

And the survivors of those 66 can be thankful that their loved ones have only moved on a piece leaving behind them the satisfaction of a job well done; that they performed their parts in life's struggle in this particular sphere with worthiness; that they left in valor; that they are now in repose from the most uncertain thing in this life, which is life itself.

Post-War Lend-Lease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial entitled "Post-War Lend-Lease," which appeared in the Boston (Mass.) Post, August 8, 1944:

POST-WAR LEND-LEASE?

The report that Britain is requesting a continuance of lend-lease after the war, and that the request is being seriously considered in high administration circles, will probably surprise most of our people. Even more surprising are the grounds upon which this request for more billions in aid is made.

In the first place, British officials urge that continued lend-lease after Germany quits is absolutely necessary if Britain is expected to play the part expected of her in the Pacific war. We might ask here what is meant by the part Britain is "expected" to play in the war against the Japs?

We should assume that Britain would strain every resource to get back Hong Kong, Malaya, Singapore, Burma, and Borneo, all British possessions. Japan has no territory belonging to the United States except the Philippines, to which, long before the war started, we had agreed to give complete freedom in 1945.

But the implication is that the Jap war is our war and that we expect Britain to help us defeat the Japs because we are helping her beat Hitler. This certainly was the implication in the pledge thrice given by Churchill on notable occasions that Britain would "fight side by side" with us until the Japs surrendered. Why, unless they thus implied that it was our war, was any such pledge necessary?

In the second place, it is urged that Britain faces a serious economic situation because of her war losses. She has lost over half of her foreign investments, in considerable part because of the Japanese conquest of her Far Eastern possessions. Also, that Britain's position as mistress of the seas has declined and it may be years before she can regain her pre-war status unless the United States should turn over the bulk of the big new merchant marine built here during the war.

Finally, the British officials point out that their Government has pledged itself to raise the living standards of their people. But the only way, apparently, that this pledge can be kept is for us to give them the money to pay for the things they must buy. We might point out here that our Government has pledged itself to raise the standard of living for our people, and to provide billions to tide our returning veterans over until they can get new jobs.

Throughout all the discussions over this extension of lend-lease, it is stated the British have rejected all suggestions that such post-war assistance should be on the basis of direct loans. No, they say; their war debt is already too big, ignoring the fact that ours is bigger even in proportion to population.

As it is expected similar claims for continued post-war lend-lease aid will be made by Russia, France, Belgium, Holland, and other countries, it is no wonder that the American officials who are reported to favor the British request fear that the proposal will meet with a lot of sales resistance in Congress.

Natural Gas Versus Anthracite

REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestion by Sidney S. Swensrud, vice president, Standard Oil Co. of Ohio, regarding the change-over of the Big Inch pipe line and the 20-inch pipe line from oil to natural gas in the post-war period, and, in view of the devastating effect of this change-over on the coal industry, both bituminous and anthracite, there is an urgent need to study the pros and cons of the proposal before the matter becomes formalized as a specific proposition.

Mr. Swensrud, before the A. I. M. M. E., February 24, points out the following: First, that the pipe lines would probably not compete with tankers in the post-war period; second, with a large unserved market at one end, a large supply at the other end and a potentially idle combination of pipe lines between, the possibility of using the war emergency lines after the war for natural gas service obviously seems worth considering; third, that a potential market exists for one hundred to one hundred and twenty billion cubic feet of gas per year in the New York-New Jersey-Philadelphia area which is now served with manufactured gas of 530 B. t. u. value at an average price of around $1 per thousand cubic feet; fourth, that natural gas could be delivered in the holders for local distribution at a cost estimated from 20.3 to 22.8 cents per thousand cubic feet; fifth, that manufactured gas of 530 B. t. u. is now costing the gas companies from 16 cents up to 24 cents per thousand cubic feet; sixth, that there are adequate reserves of such natural gas sufficient to furnish fuel for this new market for many years. Converting to natural gas of 1,000 B. t. u., this would be equivalent to a range of about 30 to 45 cents per thousand cubic feet as a manufacturing cost.

Since the market for most of this gas is planned for residential space heating, it constitutes an immediate threat to the jobs of thousands of miners and to the anthracite industry in its most vital primary markets. Since gas is "laborless" to a degree that exceeds any other fuel, it is obvious that coal cannot compete in this market against natural gas at low cost.

A post-war destruction of the primary markets for anthracite coal would be accompanied, undoubtedly, by the loss of many thousands of jobs for miners, the bankruptcy of many mining companies, and the destruction of invaluable natural resources.

It is undoubtedly a matter of important public concern that such a devastating blow should be permitted by the Federal Government.

The report of the Federal Anthracite Coal Commission, appointed by the President "to investigate ways and means for improving economic conditions in the anthracite coal-producing regions"—April 21, 1942—made the following statement:

Since 1933, $169,238,000 has been spent for Work Projects Administration and $142,434,000 for other types of public assistance in the five important anthracite counties. This amounts over the period to $268 per capita, as compared with only $183 per capita for the rest of Pennsylvania, and $142 per capita for the United States as a whole. In December 1941, 10.7 percent of the population of these counties was on public assistance or Work Projects Administration as compared with 5.8 percent in the rest of Pennsylvania. Together with Civilian Conservation Corps and National Youth Administration funds, total relief expenditures since 1933 approach one-third of a billion dollars. The Federal Government has a major interest in reducing these disproportionate relief costs in the anthracite area by a positive long-term approach to the economic and social rehabilitation of the area. This would be far less costly than supporting a large permanent population on relief.

Mr. Speaker, since the relief expenditures in the anthracite-producing region far exceed the total cost—estimated $165,000,000—of both the Big Inch line and the 20-inch line, it is obviously against the public interest to convert these war-emergency lines to natural gas in view of the inevitable results in terms of total Federal expenditures.

It is evident that the Federal Government cannot be asked by one industry to take a position in favor of the compeitive advantages of that industry against another industry. However, it is entirely proper that the anthracite industry should make the strongest possible appeal to the Federal Government to prevent competition from the oil or gas industry which would bring about an unfair competitive relation as a result of public expenditures for the carrier pipe lines built for the war emergency. Such a move by the Federal Government would be tantamount to subsidizing a laborless fuel in order to destroy the anthracite industry whose cost is roughly 70 percent labor. Almost all authorities are in agreement that employment is the major problem in the post-war period. Converting the emergency pipe lines to natural gas with the subsequent destruction of employment in the anthracite and bituminous and railroad industries which would inevitably follow would constitute a specific defeat of the Nation's effort to secure maximum employment in the post-war period.

According to Dr. A. C. Fieldner, Technological Chief of the Bureau of Mines, the proven reserves of natural gas in the United States, as of January 1942, were 85,000,000,000,000 of cubic feet. Dr. Fieldner states that production of natural gas in 1941 was 2,800,000,000,000 of cubic feet or 30 years' supply at the present rate of production.

The United States Geological Survey gives a slightly higher figure, namely, 100,000,000,000,000 cubic feet of proven reserves with 35 to 50 years of life at the present rate of production.

Estimated reserves of bituminous coal run as high as 3,800 years at the current rates of consumption, while anthracite is estimated at about 175 years.

Mr. Swensrud, vice president of the Standard Oil Co. of Ohio, in his paper entitled "A Study of the Possibility of Converting the Large Diameter War Emergency Pipe Lines to Natural Gas Service After the War," makes the following statement:

The quantity which might be moved through the lines, here under consideration, of say 110,000,000,000 cubic feet a year, would constitute less than 4 percent of the total and annual consumption of the country. If both of the war-emergency pipe lines were converted to natural gas, and operated at an average throughput of say 110,000,000,000 cubic feet a year, then in 10 years they would have moved approximately 1,100,000,000,000 cubic feet, or about 1 percent of the present known reserves of the country. It seems apparent, therefore, that there is no real question of availability of gas for conservation of the lines so far as total quantities are concerned.

Perhaps the most powerful argument against converting the emergency pipe lines into natural gas centers around the question of overall fuel conservation.

From the standpoint of the anthracite industry, Mr. Swensrud's proposal that 130,000,000,000 cubic feet a year of natural gas be brought through the primary anthracite market constitutes a threat which cannot be taken lightly. With such a large percentage of current anthracite production coming from marginal properties (estimated at 15,000,000 tons per year) and with such a high percentage of direct labor costs—estimated at 60 to 70 percent of the total cost per ton—it seems inevitable that the sudden influx of low-priced natural gas would shut down many companies. The preliminary calculation would indicate that 110,000,000,000 cubic feet per year would displace from five to seven million tons of annual production of coal.

Since the market proposed for the gas is admittedly designed to enter the residential space-heating field, anthracite's most profitable market would be directly affected; that is, the space-heating sizes. The abandonment of valuable coal reserves which would result from the bankruptcy of marginal companies would constitute a loss of valuable natural resources which would probably never be retrieved. It is likely that many mines with years of reserves ahead of them would be allowed to flood and cave to a point where they could never be subsequently mined on a profitable basis.

Here is widespread destruction of a natural resource which has shown itself to be of the utmost importance in the national fuel economy.

The scavenger salvaging of the remaining low-cost coal with the abandonment of any marginal areas would result, and bootlegging would undoubtedly start up at an accelerated rate, with the consequent destruction of more markets and still more valuable coal properties in the anthracite region.

Anthracite mine labor is highly specialized and not easily adapted to other work. Miners and their families are rooted in the soil where they own houses and their children attend schools for the most part in localities where there is no other industry to offer employment in case the mines shut down.

The war emergency pipe lines built with the public-tax funds, partly paid by the anthracite-producing companies, should not be permitted to become a competitive weapon with which the anthracite industry can be destroyed. It is doubtful whether airplanes built for war purposes will return to compete with private air lines, and many other similar cases could be cited. The Surplus War Property Administrator, Mr. William A. Clayton, issued a statement of policy on July 13 which is here quoted in part:

The objective is to establish a pricing policy that will put surplus machines back into production as quickly as possible, creating post-war jobs, stimulating national income and wealth and at the same time be recovering for the Government as much of its investment as possible.

While this statement refers only to surplus machine tools now in Government possession, it provides an indication of the point of view which can be expected from Government quarters. The Defense Plant Corporation, which owns the pipe lines under consideration, and the Petroleum Administrator for War, who operates the pipe lines during the war emergency, would probably be subject to similar policies as laid down by legislation now under consideration.

Assuming that these policies will prevail, it is evident that the destruction of a commodity that provides so many jobs as anthracite should not be brought about through public action which would supplant such a fuel with natural gas which provides, relatively speaking, no jobs at all.

Speaking from the public point of view on a national basis, the strongest argument against the exporting of natural gas from Texas and Kansas by pipe line will probably center around the synthesis of gasoline from natural gas.

Informal estimates of the Bureau of Mines indicate that gasoline can be synthesized from natural gas—costing from 5 to 7 cents per thousand cubic feet—by the Fischer-Tropsch method—at a cost ranging from 7 cents per gallon to 14 cents, maximum. Synthesis of gasoline from coal, on the other hand, is estimated to cost at least 14 to 15 cents per gallon.

Thirty million dollars has recently been appropriated to develop pilot plants and methods for synthesizing gasoline from sources other than petroleum due to the declining petroleum reserves. It seems obvious that the gasoline should be made at the source, where it can be bought for about 5 cents per thousand cubic feet, for the reason that it requires an estimated 10,000 cubic feet of gas to make 1 barrel of gasoline—42 gallons. Using Mr. Swensrud's figure of 22 cents wholesale gas laid down in Philadelphia, it is apparent that it would not pay to transport the gas and synthesized gasoline at Philadelphia as compared to transporting the finished gasoline from the plants in Texas.

There is considerable agitation in Texas and Louisiana against exporting such a valuable cheap fuel which might otherwise attract new industries to new localities within their States. This sentiment presents a real opportunity for the protection of the coal industry against natural gas.

The Nation as a whole should be alert to the threat to the employment in the mining industry, the railroad industry, and the retail fuel industry—three very large employers of labor—at a time when post-war employment is a matter of grave concern to the Nation.

Employment and Income Statistics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. MURPHY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. MURPHY, Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following compilation by the Department of Labor:

In 1929, 31,149,000 American men and women were at work on nonagricultural employment.

In 1930, the number had dropped to 28,996,000.

In 1931 it had fallen to 26,125,000.

In 1932 it reached the low level of 22,921,000.

There was a turn for the better in 1933 when the figure rose to 23,060,000.

There was a further rise to 25,449,000 in 1934.

The trend continued in 1935 when the total reached 26,599,000.

In 1936 it rose to 28,809,000.

In 1937 the number was 30,627,000.

There was a drop to 28,663,000 in 1938, but by 1939, the number of wage earners increased to 30,353,000.

In 1940, there was a further increase to 31,784,000.

In 1941, representing the year before we went to war, there was a rise to 35,668,000.

In 1942 with the war-production program under way, the number increased to 38,447,000, and last year it reached 39,728,000.

So much for employment. Now let's take a look at what happened to average weekly pay rolls in manufacturing industries over the same period.

In 1929, these amounted to $209,495,000.

In 1930 they dropped to $169,586,000.

In 1931 they declined to $128,632,000.

In 1932, as in employment, they reached the low watermark of $88,652,000, but pay rolls, too, began to rise, in 1933 reaching $95,087,000.

It continued in 1934 to $122,454,000.

In 1935 it reached $140,590,000.

In 1936 it rose to $162,751,000.

In 1937 the advance was to $194,381,000.

It was decreased to $148,881,000 in 1938, but there was a quick recovery to $180,584,000 in 1939.

The trend continued in 1940 with an advance to $206,776,000.

This continued in 1941, and the figure reached $302,530,000.

In 1942 the average weekly pay rolls in manufacturing reached $437,505,000.

Last year they totaled $571,306,000.

And now let's see how the farmers made out over this period:

In 1929, the net income of farm operators from farming amounted to $5,878,000,000.

It sagged to $4,340,000,000 in 1930, and to $2,894,000,000 in 1931.

Again, as with employment and manufacturing, pay rolls hit the bottom in 1932, amounting to $1,872,000,000.

Here, too, recovery was first registered in 1933 when farming income went up to $2,265,000,000.

It amounted to $3,099,000,000 in 1934.

It rose to $4,522,000,000 in 1935, and to $4,731,000,000 in 1936.

In 1937, it reached $5,352,000,000, with a drop to $4,332,000,000 in 1938.

Again in 1939, it showed an upturn when the figure reached $4,566,000,000.

It increased to $4,699,000,000 in 1940, and totaled $6,694,000,000 in 1941.

In 1942, the total reached $10,116,000,000, and last year it was $12,306,000,000.

So much for the Nation's wage earners and farmers. Now, let us take a look at what corporations did over this period:

In 1929, after taxes were deducted, these profits amounted to $7,972,000,000.

By 1930, they were cut to $1,279,000,000.

In 1931, they went into the red to the tune of $3,225,000,000.

In 1932, as in employment, pay rolls, and farm income, the corporations also hit the bottom, their deficit amounting to $5,462,000,000.

In 1933, this loss was cut to $2,390,000,000, and in 1934 corporations were out of the red, showing profits of $129,000,000. These increased to $1,672,000,000 in 1935.

In 1936, they went up to $3,898,000,000.

In 1937, they were $3,897,000,000.

There was a drop to $1,515,000,000 in 1938, but here, too, recovery was quick, and, in 1940, their profits amounted to $4,847,000,000.

In 1941, there was a large increase to $7,331,000,000.

In 1942, profits were $8,535,000,000.

Last year they were $8,963,000,000.

Strongest Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial entitled "Strongest Front" which appeared in the Lawrence, Mass., Evening Tribune, July 22, 1944:

STRONGEST FRONT

With the renomination of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and the selection of Senator HARRY S. TRUMAN, of Missouri, as his Vice Presidential running mate at the Chicago convention that ended Friday night, the Democratic Party will present its strongest possible front in the election next November that will be one of the most vitally important in the Nation's history.

His past record at the polls clearly makes President Roosevelt the most formidable standard bearer the Democrats could put in the field for Chief Executive, while his brilliant and successful leadership in the war to date and the present unfinished status of the conflict establish him unquestionably as the logical candidate for the party to submit to the Nation's voters at this time. In addition to keeping his hand firmly on the helm in directing affairs on the home front, from the war's beginning the President has been the Commander in Chief of the American armed forces in fact as well as in name and the extremely favorable progress thus far has been due in large part to the general strategy that has been planned by him in close cooperation with our military and naval commanders and the leaders of the other United Nations. Although the present outlook is favorable and the end of the war seems in sight in the not too distant future, a lot of difficult work remains and the United States needs the invaluable aid of President Roosevelt in finishing the job properly, just as it also requires the incomparable efforts of Generals Marshall, Eisenhower, and MacArthur, Admirals King, Nimitz, and Halsey, and all our other great commanders. In the great task of bringing the war to a successful conclusion and in effecting a permanent peace, this country needs the leadership of its ablest and most experienced citizen and President Roosevelt meets those qualifications fully. The Nation is most fortunate that he is able and willing to serve and he merits highest commendation for continuing like a good soldier, even when his natural personal inclination might lead him to want to retire to quiet private life after the 12 trying years through which he has just passed.

This year's choice of a Democratic candidate for Vice President was tremendously important because of the widespread belief even in high Government circles that, if reelected, President Roosevelt may not serve out his full 4-year term, but may resign after the war ends, either to head the American delegation to the peace conference to make certain of the right result there or for health reasons. In that event, of course, the Vice President would become President and anticipation of that possibility, however remote, called for the selection at the Chicago convention of a man wholly capable of sound guidance of American destinies in the difficult post-war world.

A superb choice was made in the nomination of Senator TRUMAN, because his brilliant record as a Member of the United States Senate and the ability, initiative, sincerity, and courage he has shown as chairman of the so-called Truman senatorial committee in investigating war expenditures stamp him as a man of Presidential caliber. With the Missourian as his running mate, the American people can vote for President Roosevelt with the fullest confidence next November, in the full knowledge that his reelection will guarantee continuance of the highest type of national leadership as long as he serves thereafter, while in case of retirement for any reason his mantle will fall on the shoulders of a man eminently well qualified to fill satisfactorily the highest office within their gift.

Rural Electrification

OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an address delivered by the able gentleman from Virginia, Hon. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, before the annual meeting of the Shenandoah Valley Electric Cooperative, on the subject of rural electrification.

As I have said, time and time again, this rural electrification movement is the greatest thing that has ever been done for the farmers of this country, and we expect to keep up the drive until we reach every farm home in America.

I wish every Member of the House, and every farmer in America, could read Mr. ROBERTSON'S address. The results in his own district must give him a thrill of pride, especially in view of the fact that he has been one of the most consistent supporters of rural electrification in this House.

Take the results in Bath County, Va., which was practically without any rural electrification at all 6 years ago, when with the help of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] I put through my amendment for the first $100,000,000 for rural electrification. As a result of that legislation, today 95 percent of the rural homes in Bath County are electrified; and the chances are that it will soon be made 100 percent. What has been done in Bath County, Va., can be done, and must be done, in every other county in America.

I am particularly proud to insert this address of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], for the reason that while he was helping the farmers of Virginia in supporting our rural electrification program, he was also helping the farmers of Mississippi, and of every other State in the Union.

Mr. ROBERTSON'S address follows:

The best and soundest help to an individual is to help him to help himself. Rural electrification gives that type of help and hence its unqualified success as a part of the Government program to aid agriculture. It has been a program I have been proud to support.

About 20 percent of the Nation is dependent upon agriculture for a livelihood, but agriculture does not receive for its services a pro rata share of the national income. That unfortunate situation became apparent before the death of Thomas Jefferson more than 100 years ago and has continued ever since. The two major factors creating that income disparity has been the use of hand labor on the farm compared with the use of machinery in industry, and the sale of basic farm products on a free market and the purchase of farm supplies on a protected market, supplemented by the actual or the equivalent of private monopolistic price control. During the past century the history of agriculture has been high, or relatively high, prices during a major war period followed by a disastrous slump. The slump that followed World War No. 1 commenced in 1922 and lasted for 20 years, with the exception of the temporary inflation of the stock market boom between 1926 and 1929. That experience must not be repeated. The present Government promise of 90 percent of parity for 2 years after this war is at best just a stop-gap cushion to a precipitous decline in farm prices. For the long pull a broader and more adequate program is indicated. The goal, as I see it, is full production at prices that will cover the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. To sustain full production there must be foreign outlets for surpluses above domestic requirements; for instance, 40 percent of cotton, 30 percent of tobacco, and 20 percent of wheat and apples. No industry in America is dependent, for full production, upon a foreign outlet for more than 10 percent of its production. And a factory owner can shut down when his market disappears, but the farmer cannot.

To compete in world markets as well as to sustain the present volume of domestic consumption of farm products when the national income drops from $150,000,000,000 to a much lower figure, the Government should aid farmers to reduce the costs of production through the use of more and better machinery. In such circumstances power on the farm is a necessity and not a luxury. The rural electrification program has done much to meet that need, but much remains to be done.

In the 50-year period prior to rural electrification, urban communities fully enjoyed the blessings of electric power and light, but that advantage of a scientific age reached only 10 percent of our farmers. Since the inception of the rural program in 1935, R. E. A. has built 392,000 miles of line and other electric facilities, extending electric service at reasonable cost to over 1,000,000 farm families and other rural consumers, and 400,000 additional rural homes are in reach of lines already built. That's a 400-percent increase in service to rural homes, yet only 41.9 percent of all rural homes. Within the potential reach of rural electrification are 5,000,000 rural homes and some of them are in our proud State. In Virginia, 114,000, or about 30 percent of the rural homes, are now being served, while 234,000 rural dwellings are without any source of electric service. While there is a cooperative in eastern Virginia larger than any in our section, I am proud of the fact that the Seventh District leads the State in the percentage of rural homes being served. Rockingham County leads the procession, with Bath a close second. In 1938 Bath was the lowest in the entire State in rural electrification. Now 95 percent of rural homes in Bath are served, as compared with the State average of 30 percent.

The Shenandoah Valley Electric Cooperative is a million-and-a-half-dollar project with a system of 1,235 miles serving 3,711 members. The cooperative also serves 6 hatcheries with a chick production of 500,000; 3 lime-grinding plants producing 35 tons of agricultural lime per hour; food-processing, low-freeze, and cold-storage plants; a sawmill; a large manganese plant; and a machine shop called Shenandoah Valley Defense Cooperative. All of those commercial plants are contributing to the war effort, and in the post-war era will give jobs to returned soldiers. Without the cheap electric power they would not exist.

The major purpose, of course, of the rural electrification program was to aid the farmer, although the importance of the development in rural sections of small industries is a valuable byproduct. Benefits of the program to the farmer can appropriately be listed under the two heads: "Monetary Gain" and "Social Gain."

1. MONETARY GAIN

(a) Grinds feed for all farm stock.

(b) Ten to 20 percent increase in egg production by poultry house lighting.

(c) Ten percent saving on feed by electric brooding and lighting and 2 weeks less finishing time for broilers.

(d) Marked increased efficiency in dairying through electric milking machines, sterilizers and coolers, cream separators and churns, and light in winter months in dairy barns.

(e) Saving in fences through the use of electrified fences.

(f) Electric hay driers especially valuable in curing alfalfa and pea hay.

(g) Workshop, grinding mowing blades and repairing farm machinery.

(h) Pumping water for household use, farm stock, and irrigation.

(i) Labor-saving devices in the home such as washing machines, vacuum cleaners, electric irons, churns, ranges, hot-water heaters—in a word, the full equipment of a modern city apartment designed to be operated by the housewife without servant help.

(j) The development of summer homes for city people.

2. THE SOCIAL GAIN

(a) Radio and prompt news coverage.

(b) Adequate lighting, including study lights for school children and lighting for schoolhouses and churches.

(c) Sanitary facilities made possible by pressure water systems.

(d) Deep-freeze and locker units for winter consumption of fresh fruits and vegetables as the means of a better balanced rural diet and the conservation of perishable foods.

(e) The stimulation of community pride and the accentuation of the advantages of farming as a means of life by reducing the drudgery and inconveniences involved. The time saved to farm mothers in not having to fill oil lamps and clean lamp chimneys, churn by hand and not having to bend for hours over washboards can now be devoted to the improvement of family relations and to community enterprises.

Again I say it is a sound program and one I have been proud to support. Cooperative temporary delinquencies in Government loans have amounted to only $215,576 in a total program of $379,592,354, while prepayments to R. E. A. now total $15,229,507. Against good collateral, plus a good moral risk, the Government has furnished working capital to cooperating farmers, and through unity they have found a new strength. Their sons will come back from the war to a cleaner, greener land.

Speedy Help Urged for Warsaw Poles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES S. DEWEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. DEWEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of August 15:

SPEEDY HELP URGED FOR WARSAW POLES—LONDON SAYS STALIN PLEDGED HIS AID—PLANS FOR BOMBING OF NAZIS SENT TO MOSCOW—PATRIOTS' POSITION GRAVE—POLISH OFFICER STATES UPRISING WAS TIMED TO DIVERT ENEMY ARMOR FROM RED ARMY

LONDON, August 14.—The Polish underground army, which is striving desperately to hold the city of Warsaw against the savage fire of German tanks, heavy artillery, armored trains, and gunboats, has begun to receive token deliveries of Allied arms, but Polish political leaders in London, agonized by the destruction of the city and the slaughter of its citizens, asserted today that help must be given on a much vaster scale if the besieged patriots are to be rescued.

It was disclosed that Premier Stalin as well as the British and American High Command in London had promised to send aid to the ill-armed Polish forces and that detailed plans for the delivery of arms and the bombing of German strongholds had been dispatched to Moscow.

With a red-lined map of Warsaw before him, a colonel of the Polish Army described today how the rising of General Bor's underground forces in Warsaw 2 weeks ago today had been designed specifically to frustrate a counterattack by four German armored divisions against Red Army forces closing in on Warsaw from the east. "This was a very great help to the Russians," he asserted.

Jan Stanczyk, Polish Minister of Labor and vice president of the Polish Trades Union Council, explained why the uprising began when it did.

General Bor, commander of the Polish home army, he said, had been empowered to strike "at a moment that would be considered opportune."

Toward the end of July, Mr. Stanczyk said, the Germans ordered the evacuation of the city, including its factories, and began mass executions and arrests. The uprising was ordered, he continued, to frustrate this slaughter and to hamper the Germans in their counter-attack against the Red Army.

A Moscow statement said yesterday that the attack had not been coordinated with the Red Army.

To move the four German armored divisions from the west to the east across the Vistula River, the Polish colonel explained, the Germans had to use the three bridges crossing the river inside the city. The Polish plan was to deny these crossings to the Germans, and at 5 o'clock on the afternoon of August 1 they opened their attack to occupy the central sections of the city dominating the avenues leading to the bridges.

Expecting an early Russian assault, they disregarded their shortage of arms and ammunition and lack of heavy weapons. At first their tactics succeeded. All three bridges were blocked.

The first German counter-attack succeeded in opening the route to the most southerly of the bridges, Poniatowski Bridge. Until August 6 it was the only crossing of the river controlled by the Germans.

On that day the Germans began literally to burn their way to the Kierbedz Bridge, the middle one of three, setting fire to the buildings along its approaches. After 2 days the enemy opened the way.

Then on August 9 the Germans brought up two armored trains on the loop railway linking all Warsaw's railway stations and blasted a path to the third, and most northerly, bridge, which bears both a railway line and a motor road.

In between these routes, however, the Poles still hold large sections of the city, and on August 11 the Germans started to attack the old town of Warsaw between the northern and central bridges. An artillery barrage from the Praga district on the east side of the Vistula, plus fire from gunboats in the river, poured into the underground army's positions.

All this time the underground forces were sending frantic appeals to London for arms. "We are without any material or moral support," said one message, which remarked that the only aid given had been a speech from London.

On orders from Premier Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, complete instructions were sent to Moscow for dropping a Russian liaison officer in Warsaw, for delivering arms and for giving air support to the Poles. As early as August 7 a Russian captain in Warsaw relayed a message through London with similar instructions and appeals for contact with the Russian Army.

Meanwhile, last Thursday German planes dropped leaflets containing a surrender ultimatum to the Warsaw patriots.

A Look at the Record

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I submit a letter written by me and printed in the New York Herald Tribune this morning:

A LOOK AT THE RECORD—MR. TABER WRITES ON GUAM, MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS

To the New York Herald Tribune:

Almost never have I paid any attention to communications to newspapers, but my attention has been called to an article on the editorial page of your issue of Monday, August 14, 1944, which is so filled with misinformation or deliberate false statements that I feel that attention should be called to it. It was signed by Edward Dexter.

Some of the statements in the letter are a part of the deliberate false statements which have been made by the candidates and speakers and propagandists of the Roosevelt administration. Others indicate simply a lack of knowledge of what has been going on. No deliberate statement is made as to how I voted, but the fact that I am the ranking Republican on the Appropriations Committee in the House and that I would be chairman is referred to so that inferentially I assume that Dexter was striking at me.

I shall list some of his statements and call attention to what he has said so that there may be an end to some of these false statements appearing in your paper:

1. He states that Republicans voted, 135 to 15, against strengthening the defenses of Guam. That is a deliberate false statement. The question of strengthening the fortifications of Guam never was brought up. This was covered in a report filed by Senator WALSH of Massachusetts, the Democratic chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, in the Senate, on June 7, 1944, in which he tells the country that Mr. Roosevelt never submitted to the Congress any question of fortifying Guam, and the Congress never passed upon that question.

2. Dexter states that the Republican Party voted, 122 to 5, against the military appropriations bill of 1939. That is not true. What happened was this:

The Republicans in Congress, realizing the serious nature of our military situation and that we had no planes designed or planned which would be of any value to build, attempted to cut down the number of airplanes that might be built and at the same time increase the funds for experimental purposes by $10,000,000. The Democrats voted against this amendment. They have repeatedly been making statements that Republicans had voted against military appropriations when they were the ones that voted against the military appropriations. The sequel was this: None of the 5,700 planes that the Democrats appropriated money for was ever built because there were no designs to build them on, and the Congress in the latter part of 1939, after the war in Europe had started, voted $10,000,000 for experimental purposes that the Republicans tried to vote in January and February, 1939.

3. For my own part I have voted for the Selective Service Act and for exery extension of it, just as I have voted for every preparedness measure.

4. We did have an embargo act; we did have a neutrality act, which was passed with the support of President Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt approved it in 1935 and 1937. Some of us didn't vote for it and some of us believed that we should get out of the mess without violating international law. That did not appeal to Mr. Roosevelt, and that caused many votes against his way of doing things.

I am wondering if it is not about time that some of these people stopped trying to base their opposition to Republicans coming into power entirely upon false statements. Is it not time for the people of the United States to wake up and realize that, instead of being forward looking where preparedness was concerned, the Democratic Party, under President Roosevelt, has been backward looking and that a Republican administration means a more vigorous representation of America?

Letter to My Constituents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a letter to my constituents in Louisiana:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

Dear friend, it has been my privilege and honor to be your Congressman for the past 2 years, representing and serving you in the Nation's Capital. You placed your faith and confidence in me when you sent me here and I feel that I have kept that faith and confidence. My record of hard work, efficiency, and accomplishments speaks for itself. I have worked shoulder to shoulder with our two Senators, namely, Senators OVERTON and ELLENDER, in the interest of our great State. It was Senator ELLENDER who led the fight for Federal aid to the school lunch program in the Senate, while I was one of those who worked so hard for this legislation in the House.

The members of the armed forces look upon me as their champion in Congress. While it is physically impossible for me to explain my accomplishments in this letter, I want you to know that I performed thousands of tedious tasks in getting word to parents about their sons who were either wounded or captured, straightening out and untangling thousands of allotments, aiding and assisting in securing trucks, school busses, farm equipment, machinery and a hundred and one other things of a similar nature. These were all extremely tedious tasks. However, they were of great benefit to you people. I shall continue in the future to do these things just as I have in the past.

By voting for and electing me in the first primary over my opponents, you will give me added prestige and power and I will be able to do even more for you in the future than I have in the past.

Feeling that my efforts, work, and records of achievement are deserving of another term, I am taking this means of asking you for your vote and support in my reelection on September 12.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. MORRISON,
Member of Congress.

Camp Bedilion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. P. W. GRIFFITHS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a resolution of the Marietta (Ohio) Chamber of Commerce in appreciation of the naming of a training camp by the Navy Department of the United States of America honoring the memory of the late Commander Robert W. Bedilion, United States Navy:

Whereas the Navy Department of the United States of America, by naming the training camp at Port Hueneme, Calif., Camp Bedilion, honored the memory of Commander Robert W. Bedilion, a respected citizen of our city, who gave his life in the services of his country on September 7, 1943; and

Whereas the citizens of Marietta City, Ohio, are deeply appreciative of the honor bestowed in memory of Commander Bedilion, and justly proud of this deserved recognition: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of Marietta, Ohio, and on behalf of the citizens of the city, express to the Navy Department of the United States of America its sincere and grateful appreciation of the recognition given Commander Robert W. Bedilion; be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary cause a copy of this resolution to be forwarded to his Excellency, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America; to Hon. James V. Forrestal, Secretary of the Navy Department; and to Hon. P. W. Griffith, United States Representative from the Fifteenth District of Ohio, with the expressed hope that the same may be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; to Mrs. Martha Daker Bedilion, of Alexandria, Va., the bereaved wife; to Augusta K. Bedilion, of Marietta, Ohio, the sorrowing mother, and that this resolution be spread upon the records of our organization.

Adopted May 12, 1944.

MARIETTA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
GEORGE WHITE,
FRANK J. MCCAULEY,
D. T. SCHOONOVER,
WILL P. MCKINNEY,

Surplus Property Disposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER G. ANDREWS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following short article by Thomas P. Scanlan, editor of the Surplus Record of Chicago, Ill.:

Now that the greatest production job of all time is so nearly mastered, the task of redistributing the most tremendous surplus of materials, plants, and equipment the world has ever known confronts the American people. How it will be handled with the least possible effect upon our national economy has not yet been definitely decided. It is a problem that will tax the best brains in the land and even then the solution can only be arrived at through trial and error.

For a year Congress and other governmental bodies have been making surveys and studies of various plans which have been submitted by farsighted businessmen and associations who, while not relaxing in their efforts to speed our ultimate victory, have found time to give thought and study to the economic future of the country. Some idea of the amount of effort put into the surplus war property problem may be evidenced by the fact that more than 40 bills have been introduced into Congress containing plans for the disposition of war goods and equipment which must be absorbed by the public and industry or be dumped on the scrap pile.

The questions in the minds of business and labor and the farmer, too, are: How is the regulation for surplus disposal going to affect me? Will I be able to buy a jeep for 10 cents on the dollar? Shall I wait until the Government starts to sell off some of the billion dollars' worth of late-type machine tools to reequip my shop? This man expects to be able to buy modern machinery at one-fourth of what it would cost new. And there will also be with us the opportunist who expects to buy a completely equipped manufacturing plant for a song.

Well, from our observation post, nobody is going to steal anything from Uncle Sam this trip. Government and business are determined that this will not happen again—the promoter is persona non grata in all of the recommendations for surplus disposal which have been submitted. Self-interest groups have two strikes on them already.

Now let's get down to the practical way of looking at this job. We have called it "the greatest merchandising task of all time." Compared to selling $15,000,000,000 worth of War bonds, the best securities in the world, the job of selling twenty-five billions or even $75,000,000,000 (you guess) in merchandise—shoes and socks, needles and pins, bacon and eggs, planes and tanks, lathes and planers, motors and generators, plants and buildings, and probably a million and one separate and distinct items which are ordinarily distributed by ten thousand and one industries and divisions of trade—becomes a surplus problem of colossal size. We repeat, it is the greatest merchandising task of all time.

Probably we are becoming too alarming, or these statements may sound like the proverbial cry of wolf, but we have observed during the past 25 years how difficult it is to dismantle and dispose of even a single industrial plant or auction off a hardware store without giving the stuff away. The time, market, publicity are all important factors.

We hark back to a war plant which was scientifically and intelligently dismantled and sold after World War No. 1. It was the largest munitions plant in the world in 1918 and cost Uncle Sam (that's you and I) $90,000,000. This plant was practically new when the war ended. Within a square-mile area it contained the complete processing equipment and power plant necessary to manufacture powder from the base ingredients to the shipping containers. The people who handled the dismantling and disposal of this vast plant took some 10 years to finally dispose of all the equipment and buildings, and only some $15,000,000 gross were realized after all this time. They were experienced people in this kind of work and spent thousands of dollars in advertising and research to seek out markets and in reconverting special equipment, in careful dismantling and the salvaging of every possible stick of lumber and nail. And after all of this time and effort, they were able to realize only a little over 15 cents on the dollar gross.

Ask any crane or boiler manufacturer or builder of chemical or electrical equipment how much it costs to sell his highly publicized new products and you will find out that the job of reselling a war plant is in no way comparative. In the first place, there is mental objection that the war-plant equipment is second hand; secondly, the buyer expects to purchase it at a fraction of the original price. Add to these facts the necessity of describing, cataloging, and dismantling the plant, cleaning and checking the equipment for broken or missing parts, and rigging it for shipment. Also, dozens of other obstacles arise because the machine did not come from the original builder.

This case is only one of thousands of plants which were not as successfully liquidated after the last war. One might say someone benefited by the bargains which were made available, but are we not still paying for the last war?

Probably you are saying to yourself after reading this preamble: "So what? What is this guy driving at?" Simply this: The United States Treasury has paid out some $200,000,000,000 in gearing up for this war. Probably half of this sum has gone into plants, materials, machinery, and what not. Much of this is salvageable. If our surplus property agencies can recover for the Treasury 50 percent or only 25 percent of this money, even that represents fifty or twenty-five billions going back into the Nation's cash register.

We all know that this surplus disposal job is not one for boondogglers or amateurs. True it needs intelligent Government supervision, but most of all it needs careful planning, scientific marketing, economic control, test campaigns, advertising, selling by every single method and means which Sears, Roebuck, Marshall Field, General Motors, Warner & Swasey, A. & P., and other great concerns would use in merchandising their products or wares.

Every merchant and manufacturer in America should lend a hand in this gigantic merchandising job and every merchant and manufacturer and engineer who puts his money and ingenuity into it should receive the proper compensation for his effort. The experienced foreign market experts should be consulted. The knowledge and background of the advertising expert should be counseled. The experience of the technical reconversion engineer should be utilized. In fact, all who can contribute their brains or muscle to the beating of swords back into plow shares should be put to work as soon as the wheels of industry begin to hum in civilian production.

The responsibility lies primarily in the hands of those who have this vast job to do and it is up to industry and business to not only see that it is directed properly but also to take an active part in it.

It is an accepted fact that this Nation was built upon the system of free enterprise. If we hope to preserve it, business and labor will have to be vigilant. We mentioned just compensation for those who through knowledge and experience assist the governmental agencies in finding markets for war surplus. Even before our declaration of war, thousands of patriotic citizens gave freely of their time and energy to accelerate the production program. In the reallocation and disposition of the war surplus the Government will be placed in the position of competing with private enterprise. This makes it almost mandatory that if business contributes to the merchandising of these gigantic surpluses that it be justly compensated in dollars for the effort put forth.

In summation, who is better qualified to do this job than American businessmen. Most of them, large and small, learned through cold hard experience. The butcher, the baker, the department store operator, the automobile dealer, the machinery dealer, the merchandising counselor, the auctioneer, the mill supply man, and hundreds of others too numerous to classify are the people of whom we speak. Tell me where you will find a better group the world over who can handle this job more intelligently and energetically.

Sound International Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, among the many informed and thoughtful people of this country that are devoting their attention to the solution of the international money problem we are indebted to two prominent citizens of the State of Iowa, where there is no silver- and gold-mining industry to influence their judgment, for the proposal of a sound monetary program embodied in the form of a resolution which is submitted herewith for printing in the RECORD. Mr. Titus is an able writer on the money subject and it will be my privilege to present further correspondence and articles by him on the international money issue:

SERIES OF WHEREASES AND SUGGESTIONS BY G. M. TITUS OF MUSCATINE AND EX-SENATOR VAN ALSTINE OF POCAHONTAS COUNTY, IOWA, ON THE POST-WAR MONEY PROBLEM

1. Whereas a sound monetary standard is essential to the stabilization and welfare of all people; and

2. Whereas for many years the world used both gold and silver as its basic money at a ratio of 16 to 1, with comparatively slight variation; and

3. Whereas England and the United States demonetized silver in the years 1870, 1873, and 1874; and

4. Whereas a cubic box forty feet in dimension could contain all the gold of the world at the present time, thus rendering inadequate the amount of gold to properly transact the business of the world and thus rendering it important for the world to return to international bimetalism; and

5. Whereas the emergency conditions of the world war have practically eliminated the traditional use of either gold or silver as a basis of monetary values; and

6. Whereas practically all the monetary gold is now held by the United States and a very few of the other nations; and

7. Whereas about three-fifths of the people of the world use silver for practically all ordinary business transactions; and

8. Whereas we believe that the use of both gold and silver is absolutely essential to the adequacy, safety, and stability of a well-balanced basis, for world monetary standard of values; and

9. Whereas the assistance given member nations renders it possible for member nations to acquire a surplus of products, the board of governors of the international bank shall, from time to time, warn all member nations of such possibility and thus avoid a decrease in price of any commodity and a resulting depression.

Now, therefore, we respectfully recommend for your consideration: That gold and silver be duly adopted and established as a basis for our monetary standard of value and that the relative content of each metal in the standard be determined by the present and prospective commodity value of said metals, and taking into account the anticipated effect of this act on such commodity values to the end that parity in the purchasing power of gold and silver be established;

That each participating nation shall certify to the international bank its established monetary unit, the amount and fineness of the gold and silver therein, and any prospective change in the content of such monetary unit shall be published and made known to the international bank at least —— months before such change shall take effect.

That in case any such participating nation neglects to give such notice of intention to change the content and fineness of such monetary unit, then the international bank may, at its option (or shall) notify such nation of such omission, neglect or failure, and inform such nation that unless the conditions and requirements of this act are fully complied with, the privileges and the connection with the international bank may, at the option of the said international bank, be withdrawn from such delinquent nation.

That any nation failing to maintain the amount of gold or silver in its metallic money as established by such nation and approved and published by the international bank, shall thereupon forfeit its membership in and all privileges of its connection with the international bank.

That said international bank shall maintain proper facilities for testing the gold and silver content of basic money offered by any nation and shall refuse to approve or accept any basic coinage not complying with the established standard of such nation.

The international bank shall be established on a nonprofit basis with the privilege of making only such charges as shall be necessary to cover the expense of properly conducting its business and provide for reasonable reserve for possible losses.

That if, in the judgment of the board of governors of said international bank, the time should come when a dividend could be paid, all member nations should share in such proportion as their interest in the bank.

That the said international bank shall be authorized to change its ratio between the gold and silver content of basic coinage whenever such action is necessary to maintain monetary parity, and shall give member nations reasonable notice of such proposed change.

That any member nation may withdraw from said international bank on 6 months' notice at any time.

That in the opening of said international bank, gold shall be valued at —— per ounce and silver at —— per ounce.

Urges Showing of Soviet Film of Kharkov Trials

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter sent by me to the Director of the Office of War Information:

AUGUST 8, 1944.

Hon. ELMER DAVIS,

Director, Office of War Information,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DAVIS: The Soviet documentary film, "Justice Is Coming" (I am informed) is open for bookings in the United States. It is a documentary reproduction of the Kharkov trials in December 1943, when three German jackal Nazi officers and a Russian Quisling were condemned to death by hanging because of their torture and massacre of innocent men, women, and children in Russia.

In the final scene, the four guilty brutes swing from four gallows posts.

The demands for the showing of this picture of crime and punishment have arisen all over England. Englishmen are infuriated by the dreadful havoc caused by robot bombs. They seek retribution, and rightfully so. They wish to see this film. They see reflected therein their thirst for vengeance.

At the film's inception there are quoted words by Stalin, as follows: "We shall bring the German criminals to book." And the promise is performed. There are shots of burning Russian villages and devastated cities, and of the charred bones of dead children. Interspersed between pictures of rapine, rape, and plunder by Nazi monsters are such shrill phrases as "Be ye accursed, ye murderers."

The prisoners confess at the trials. They admit the gas-filled vans by which they suffocated their victims, the truckloads of children shot and then kicked into mass burial pits. The audience cheers the verdict of death as well as the springing of the nooses.

This is the type of cinema we need in America. It is horrible, maybe sickening, yet necessary to arouse placid Americans out of their complacency with regards Nazi atrocities. They probably have heard of so many that their feelings have become numbed.

Many of us remember the last time. We then called them "Huns." We vowed to set up atrocity courts. We made direful threats to bring all the Boche guilty of heinous crimes to trial. Teddy Roosevelt here, Lloyd George in England, promised to hang the Kaiser and make the Huns pay to the last farthing. Books, pamphlets, newspaper editorials of 1917 and 1918 reflected the same demands for punishment to fit the horrible crimes of the German culprits.

Yet, all came to naught. Kaiser Wilhelm was permitted a confortable exile as the Squire of Dorn in Holland. Hindenburg, Ludendorff, Von Tirpitz, Von Bismarck lived on in iniquity and the planning of World War No. 2. The Junkers, the Prussian military clique, the Gestapo, will live to bring forward another Schicklegruber on a white horse unless we punish and pay them the wages of their sins.

But, Americans, with intense sentiment and tender stomachs, will want again to withdraw from the mess as soon as the last shot is fired. That must not be.

Hitler, Himmler, Goebbels, Goering, and all the vile brown-shirted Nazis must hang from gallows five times higher than the one from which Haman swung.

Bring on this movie. Show it all over the United States.

I am sure a patriotic Hollywood and the cinema distributors and theater owners would cooperate wholeheartedly in the showing of "Justice Is Coming."

Yours very sincerely,

EMANUEL CELLER.

Extracts From Speeches of Hon. Hamilton Fish, of New York, Against Racial and Religious Intolerance and Persecutions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMILTON FISH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following extracts from various speeches I have made during my service in Congress against racial and religious intolerance and persecutions. The extracts cited are selected and brief quotations from only a few of many such speeches I have made on this subject since I have been in public life, but they are sufficient to prove to any fair-minded person that I am not and have never been anti-semitic and have consistently raised my voice and used whatever influence I have possessed to protest against any discrimination against racial minorities whether at home or abroad.

The extracts follow:

On December 14, 1925, I introduced a resolution, perhaps the first action taken by any Member of Congress—House Joint Resolution 76, Sixty-ninth Congress—to stop the spread of fascism in the United States. This resolution provided, in part, as follows:

Whereas it is reported in the public press that Benito Mussolini has urged the creation of Italian centers in the United States to inculcate foreign ideals and teach of fascism, which is subversive of our republican form of government guaranteed by the Constitution; and

Whereas the Italian Prime Minister has recently deprived the Italian Parliament of all authority to amend or alter his decrees, has denounced liberty as a sham, and by force of arms has ruthlessly uprooted popular government to obtain which the people of all civilized nations have for centuries past shed oceans of blood; and

Whereas the present Italian dictatorship and despotic form of government is inconsistent and subversive of American ideals of government based on the consent of the governed: Be it

Resolved, That the Congress regards with disfavor any attempt by a foreign power to interfere with the internal affairs of the United States by creating centers for their nationals or their former nationals in this country, and commends the American Legion for their activities in encouraging and establishing American centers to promote the practice of American ideals, customs, and habits, and the Americanization of all immigrants in the United States, with a view of their speedy absorption as naturalized citizens into the American body politic having the same identical rights, liberties, privileges, and duties as all other American citizens.

In a statement issued in connection with this resolution, I said:

The teaching of fascism in America would be as dangerous to our institutions as bolshevism, and as subversive of our form of government. It would mean the destruction of our Constitution and with it popular government, and cost us our hard-won liberties, and our most cherished rights and privileges. We want no centers in the United States where fascism can be promoted, either directly or indirectly. We want none of it, nor will we stand for outside influence in the Americanization of our aliens.

Again, on January 4, 1932, I introduced a somewhat similar resolution—House Joint Resolution 169, Seventy-second Congress—against any foreign interference in our internal affairs, through the creation of centers to inculcate foreign ideals and allegiance in the United States, and providing that—

The Congress of the United States is opposed to interference by any nation or nations in our internal affairs through the creation of centers to inculcate foreign ideals and allegiance for their nationals or their former nationals in this country, and looks with disfavor on the teaching of fascism in the United States as inconsistent with American ideals and liberties and subversive of our republican form of government as guaranteed by the Constitution, and demands that the activities and propaganda of both Fascists and anti-Fascists shall cease.

In the House of Representatives, June 30, 1922—speaking on behalf of House Joint Resolution 322, favoring the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, of which I was the author:

This resolution favors the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and is based on justice and humanity * * *. It is an expression of our sympathetic and favorable attitude in establishing in Palestine a refuge for the persecuted Jews of the world, where they can develop their own culture, law, and ideals in the ancient land of their fathers, given by Jehovah to Abraham and consecrated in the hearts of the Jewish people as the birthplace of their traditions.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

Speech at the protest meeting held under the auspices of the American Jewish Congress, at Town Hall, New York City, March 16, 1930:

Multitudes of Russian priests, Jewish rabbis, Zionists, Catholic priests, and Protestant ministers are being arrested and on flimsy charges exiled to Siberia if they are not secretly executed by the Ogpu, the terrible secret police which has recently been reestablished to spread terror among Christian and Jewish worshippers in Soviet Russia. * * * The active, relentless persecution and terrorism has resulted, according to the statement of an eminent rabbi who has just returned from an investigation in Russia, in driving three-quarters of the Jewish people away from the faith of their fathers. This is an almost unbelievable statement to anybody who has studied the history of the Jewish race. In spite of all the pogroms and persecutions that Jews have suffered in the past centuries, they have always retained their religious beliefs until the terrorism of the Ogpu, the dreaded secret police, has made life an abomination and desolation for them. * * * There is one silver lining to the religious persecution of the Russian people, and that is the concurrence of Protestants, Catholics, and Jews to champion religious liberty and to present a united front against the attempts of the Communists to exterminate all religions based on a belief in God. The united protest of Christendom and Judaism, that most ancient of all faiths, marks a cornerstone in history, for in union is not only strength but understanding, which will bring glory to God in the highest and on earth peace and good will toward men.

Statement as ranking Republican member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, March 21, 1933:

It is none of our business what kind of a government there is in Germany, Russia, or Italy, but it is our duty to protect the lives and property of American citizens wherever they may be. Attacks on American citizens of Jewish origin in Germany must cease immediately. * * * The rise of anti-Semitic propaganda and the persecution of the Jews in Germany turns civilization back to the dark days of the Inquisition in Spain and the pogroms of the Cossacks under the Czarist regime in Russia.

In the House of Representatives, May 24, 1933:

I introduced the following resolution (H. Con. Res. 19), and it will depend upon the unanimity and character of the support given it by the Jewish people in the United States and their friends whether I shall request immediate consideration. If it is shown clearly that the Jewish people are united in demanding immediate and favorable action on this resolution, I shall urge prompt consideration and adoption:

"Whereas the German Government is pursuing a relentless and ruthless policy of economic persecution and repression of Jews in Germany; and

"Whereas it is the avowed intention of the German Government to deprive the Jews of their civic, political, and economic rights; and

"Whereas the comparatively small number of Jews in Germany, not exceeding 600,000, constitute a peaceful, law-abiding, industrious, and defenseless element of the population: Be it

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States regrets the continued persecution of the Jews in Germany and expresses its sympathy for them in their hour of trial, humiliation, and economic discrimination, and requests the President of the United States to use his good offices and make friendly representation to the German Government in the interest of humanity, justice, and world peace, to respect the civic and economic rights of their citizens of Jewish origin, and to put an end to racial and religious persecution."

Letter to Justice Wendell P. Stafford, American National Conference Against Racial Persecution in Germany, at a meeting held in Washington, D. C., June 5, 1933:

I regret exceedingly that, owing to a previous engagement, I will be unable to attend your protest meeting against the tragic and inhuman attempt of the Hitler government to destroy the economic rights of German Jews and deprive them of citizenship. No nation, or no people, particularly the American people, accustomed to equal opportunities under the law, can remain silent at the cruel, brutal, and systematic policy being pursued by the German Government to turn the hands of progress back 2 centuries and force peaceful and law-abiding Jewish citizens to return to the poverty and disease of the ghetto. The American people are shocked and horrified that any civilized government could in our day and generation undertake to outrage civilization by strangling through economic weapons a whole race. Stupid and ruthless leadership turned the world against Germany 20 years ago, and God forbid that it should again come to pass. By encouraging and promoting intolerable injustice to the Jews, the German rulers are prejudicing their own demands for justice before world public opinion. The fight has just begun, and must continue until human rights and Jewish rights prevail. I would appreciate the active and militant support of your Congress toward securing a favorable report and action on my resolution (H. Con. Res. 19) requesting the President to make friendly representation to the Hitler government regarding the economic and racial persecution of 600,000 German Jews, in the name of justice, humanity, peace, and friendly relations between nations.

Letter to Hon. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, chairman of Special Committee to Investigate Nazi Activities in the United States, March 19, 1934:

I favor the adoption of your resolution, and a thorough investigation of Nazi propaganda and activities in the United States. There is no more room for Hitlerism in our American Republic than there is for communism. Both of these foreign forms of dictatorship, one representing the right and the other the left, constitute a complete repudiation of our free institutions and our republican form of government guaranteed to each State by the Federal Constitution. Furthermore, the American people are opposed to the injection of racial and religious issues, which are contrary to the spirit of our institutions and violate the guaranties of civil liberties contained in the Constitution. What we need in the United States is more tolerance, not less, more civil liberties, not less; and more insistence on freedom of speech which tends to dissipate both racial and religious bigotry. I hope your committee will nip in the bud any indication of Nazi propaganda and activities from alien and foreign sources in the United States. I wish you every success in your efforts to stamp out the seeds of foreign propaganda in our country.

Statement released to Jewish congregations in my district, September 1, 1936:

The Jews throughout the world have much to be thankful for as a result of the assistance, moral and financial, from their English speaking brothers in America. American Jews have been shocked by the persecution of their coreligionists in certain foreign lands and have made every effort to assist them in their affliction. In these days of enlightenment, we cannot understand this persecution of the Jews in foreign lands. In America the Jews have contributed much in every walk of life, and in the city of New York have helped by their charitable gifts to build great institutions for the aged and to relieve the sufferings of the sick and destitute. American Jews enjoy the same civil rights and blessings of liberty guaranteed by the Constitution to every American citizen and will continue to do so as long as our free institutions and the Constitution of the United States shall endure. In spite of the present-day persecution of Jews in certain nations, they will emerge from these temporary attacks, as they have done in the past, to even greater opportunities for service to humanity and the fulfillment of their hopes and aspirations in Palestine and destiny as a great race.

Statement on July 26, 1937:

The proposed partition of Palestine by the British Government is an amazing suggestion, and a deliberate breach of trust. * * * There is more need at the present time for a refuge for the persecuted Jews of Germany and of Poland in Palestine than ever before. Relying on the promises and pledges given in the Balfour resolution and our treaty agreement with Great Britain, millions of dollars have been raised in the United States to rehabilitate and develop Palestine and make it once again a land of milk and honey. These generous contributions from America have made it possible for tens of thousands of Jews, driven out of Germany and Poland, to find a home and livelihood in that ancient land of their forefathers. Great Britain accepted the mandate and it is her duty to fulfill her pledges given to the Jewish people and live up to her obligations to the nations of the world, including those to our own Government.

Speech over Intercity Broadcasting System, February 4, 1938:

I have come here this evening to raise my voice with others in condemnation and protest against the tragic racial persecution of the Jewish people in Rumania. We are familiar with the situation in Germany, where the Jews have been outlawed and declassed, where there are only 600,000 Jews to a population of 60,000,000 Germans, while it is claimed that there are a million or possibly a million and a half Jews in Rumania, out of a population of 19,000,000. The inhuman and brutal treatment of the Jews in Rumania has shocked the American people. They are opposed to all forms of racial and religious persecution, in the interest of humanity, justice, and world peace. As a liberal Republican, I loathe and abhor all forms of political, economic, racial, and religious repression and persecution, whether in this country or elsewhere.

Speech of Representative SIROVICH, of New York, in the House of Representatives, January 6, 1938:

Permit me to congratulate the distinguished son of illustrious forebears who has served humanity loyally and faithfully, not only in our country but throughout the civilized world. In the resolution I have introduced today calling on the President to intercede in the name of humanity against the shameful treatment accorded by the Rumanian Government to its religious and racial minorities, it might interest my colleague to know that on July 22, 1872, your distinguished grandfather, Hamilton Fish, who had been a Member of Congress of the United States from 1844 to 1846, Governor of the State of New York from 1849 to 1851, United States Senator representing the Empire State from 1851 to 1857, and Secretary of State under President Grant from 1869 to 1876, dispatched upon a similar occasion of violent religious persecution in Rumania, an official communication to all American diplomatic representatives stationed in Europe and stated: "Although as a rule we scrupulously abstain from interfering directly or indirectly in the public affairs of that quarter [Rumania], the grievance adverted to is so enormous as to impart to it as it were a cosmopolitan character, in the redress of which all countries, governments, and creeds are alike interested. * * *" I congratulate the distinguished Member of Congress from the State of New York, HAMILTON FISH, for following in the footsteps of his father who also served in Congress as well as the magnificent contribution of his grandfather, one of the most eminent Americans in our history, upon the altar of humanity.

Other speeches on this subject appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 6, 1938, and January 25, 1938, protesting persecution of Jews in Rumania.

Statement, November 15, 1938:

If the technical recall of Ambassador Hugh Wilson from Germany by Secretary Hull is intended as a protest and remonstrance against racial and religious persecution of the Catholics and Jews in Germany, it deserves the wholehearted approval of the American people. They have been shocked by the systematic brutality and persecution of the Jews in that country for the past few years. A continuation of these racial and religious atrocities will set the hands of human progress back 1,000 years into darkest barbarism. I cannot too strongly denounce these inhuman practices.

On April 28, 1938, I spoke in the House of Representatives against the confiscation of property belonging to American Jews in Germany, and on numerous other occasions in behalf of the Jewish homeland in Palestine.

Radio address over Columbia Broadcasting System, November 25, 1938, on America's answer to religious and racial persecution:

I speak tonight not as a Jew but as an American who loathes and abhors all forms of political, economic, racial, and religious repression and persecution, whether in this country or elsewhere. I propose to discuss the American viewpoint rather than to detail the infamous and inhuman actions of Hitler, the Nazi dictator, who has set the hands of progress back 1,000 years by his attacks on race and religion. To all appearances Hitler has become stark, raving mad, and he and Goebbels and his gang of ruffians are engaged in an orgy of racial and religious persecution, not only of Jews but of Catholics and Protestants as well. The people of America, regardless of party affiliations join with all other civilized people in denouncing this retreat to darkest barbarism in Germany. * * * There can be no compromise with the Nazi groups in America, who are trying to sow the seeds of racial and religious persecution and to tear down our own free institutions and republican form of government. The American people look with sorrow and abhorrence on the disgraceful and tragic events in Nazi Germany, where a ruthless dictatorship is bent on destroying free speech, free press, and free institutions and substituting for them a government by the bullet, racial and religious persecution, robbery, terrorism, and armed violence. American citizens have not only a right but a duty to protest and remonstrate against racial and religious persecution of Jew and gentile in Nazi Germany. * * * The inhuman acts of the Nazi government put it outside of the limits of decency and fair dealing. Hitler, Goebbels, and other fanatical Nazis are undermining the fundamentals of civilization. * * * We must profit by the events in Nazi Germany and make sure that they shall not happen in America. I urge all loyal American citizens not to compromise in any way with the spread of nazi-ism or Nazi bunds or Nazi ideals in free America. There can be no compromise with either nazi-ism on the right or communism on the left.

Address at Mecca Temple, New York, November 2, 1938:

The Jews in America have served our country loyally in time of peace as well as in war. No one has the right to impugn their patriotism or love of America. No group owes more to our country, and none should be more willing to make greater sacrifices and uphold and defend our free institutions and representative and constitutional government, under which they have found security, peace, and prosperity as in no other nation in the world. With large parts of Europe aflame with violent anti-Semitism, I am proud of the fact that I introduced the Zionist resolution, which has already helped to provide a refuge for 400,000 persecuted Jews. Large sections of Palestine have been restored and rehabilitated by these Jewish immigrants, from Dan to Beersheba. I hope and pray that the British Government will permit several hundred thousand of the exiled German,

Austrian, and Rumanian Jews to find a place of refuge and a home in Palestine, that ancient land of their fathers.

Speech as president of the American Group of the Interparliamentary Union Conference, at Oslo, Norway, August 16, 1939:

I present to the delegates briefly a plan, or possibly a vision, on a large scale, backed by prominent and wealthy Americans, providing for the settlement of refugees in the undeveloped and sparsely populated but healthy uplands of Central Africa. The African continent is the only place left in the world where there are vast territories, rich in natural resources, and where over population is not yet a problem. This problem of the refugees is inseparably connected with the preservation of peace. The problem is by no means a Jewish or a racial problem, it involves Catholics and Protestants as well, and people of many nations. It is essential to discover a new homeland for these unfortunate refugees, driven out by dictatorial governments, where they can find peace, security, employment, and civil liberty. * * * I am not giving away any diplomatic secrets when I tell you, my colleagues, that I discussed the refugee problem with both Lord Halifax, the British Foreign Secretary, and M. Bonnet, the French Foreign Minister, both of whom expressed a definite desire to cooperate in ascertaining if there were any sparsely inhabitated but livable lands within their colonial possessions that could be developed by modern science, engineering, irrigation, and medical research and supervision. I also had the honor of discussing the refugee problem with M. Mandel, the French Colonial Minister, who volunteered to have an immediate survey made in the French Colonial possessions in Africa and particularly that section to the south and east of Lake Tschad, and invited me to meet him early in September in Paris, after his survey had been completed. * * * I plead with my fellow delegates to consider this problem, and to cooperate in solving the refugee problem by providing a new homeland for these people where they may have plenty of elbow room and an opportunity to provide for themselves in peace and security free institutions of their own making. It must be a democratic state under representative or parliamentary forms of government, with freedom and liberty for all.

Unfortunately, the war broke out in Europe before the plan I submitted could be followed up, and there was no way in which it could be accomplished at that time, or until the war is won.

In the House of Representatives, December 9, 1941:

The Jewish people, who have more at stake in this war than any other people in the world, who have suffered more, who have been the victims of barbarous treatment in eastern Europe, who have been outlawed and discriminated against on account of their race and religion, who have been deprived of their economic and civic rights and by inhuman and brutal persecution by the Nazis forced back into the poverty and misery of the ghetto or into concentration camps, should have the unquestioned right to fight. Let us give them that opportunity without delay. Let us give them some of our lend-lease money as we have given it to the Poles, the Czechs, the Free French, and the Greeks. Let them have an army in Palestine of 50,000 or even 100,000, with American lend-lease money with which to obtain equipment and guns. Let them have a Jewish military unit under their own flag, under the Star of David, and manned and officered by their own people.

The President and General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL J. KIRWAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial on the President and General MacArthur, which was published in a recent edition of the Youngstown Vindicator:

THE PRESIDENT AND GENERAL MACARTHUR

Amid the discussion as to whether President Roosevelt's trip to the Pacific was political or not, at least one man is glad that it was made.

This man in General MacArthur. As everyone knows, General MacArthur has not been happy over the way he has been treated. At one time he was very unhappy, not for himself so much as for the whole situation in the Pacific. Intensely devoted to the Philippines, he felt that the decision of the President and Mr. Churchill to give first place to the war in Europe condemned the Filipinos to years of suffering. It appeared to him that his own counsel was disregarded and that he was set down in a subordinate position.

It is now known that these are the reasons why General MacArthur allowed his name to be mentioned for President. He never had any serious intention of running, but he believed that if people back home talked about him they could not help thinking about the war in the Pacific and what was needed there.

It was natural that, having to do so much with so little, General MacArthur should consider himself forgotten. Battles that would have been won in a few days if he had had men and equipment became major campaigns. His long struggle and the sufferings of his men in the steaming jungles became an epic chapter of the war. Yet he heard after the Quebec conference last summer that his command was to be secondary to that of Lord Mountbatten.

If this decision was made at Quebec it was not carried out. Instead, General MacArthur was given more of the things he needed and conditions began to change. After fearing for months that he would get no farther than New Guinea, he was able to begin his rapid advance. Gradually the Nation's eyes turned again to the Philippines and General MacArthur was confident that he would soon lead the reconquest and liberation of the islands. A correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, Lewis B. Sebring, Jr., who has just returned from 2 years at his headquarters, wrote yesterday that it was when General MacArthur became sure of this that he issued his statement that he would not consider nomination for the Presidency and would not accept it if it were offered.

This was the background of the meeting between President Roosevelt and General MacArthur at Hawaii last month. Mr. Sebring writes that "The feeling of optimism that General MacArthur developed last spring over his prospects for returning to the Philippines over a route that he would choose himself and which he would command has been clinched by President Roosevelt's meeting with him, as well as with the commanders of other American forces in the Pacific, and by the President's subsequent statements that General MacArthur most certainly will return to the Philippines."

President Roosevelt publicly confirmed this at Bremerton Saturday night. As General MacArthur heard it and heard also the President discuss not only our strategy in the war with Japan, but the steps we propose to take in the Pacific to protect ourselves against future aggression, he must have felt that his ideas were finally receiving the recognition they deserved. This will be heartening to him, and to Admiral Nimitz and to the million men under their command. The address began so informally that the President seemed to be speaking extemporaneously; but as he went on to tell of what the Pacific islands mean to the United States and of what we mean to do there, it became an historical declaration of American policy. Even the President's critics must admit that it and the trip which had such a result were worth while.

Soldiers Can Read Balzac's Droll Stories But Cannot Read Yankee From Olympus, a Biography of Justice Holmes—Hatch Act Again Revealed as Asinine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, because of the Hatch Act, which is supposed to prevent pernicious political activities, the War Department has withdrawn from Army libraries and Army educational courses six well-known history text books—among them Our Nation, by Barker and Commager.

The Council on Books in Wartime have also proscribed The Republic, by Charles A. Beard, which appeared recently in serial form in Life magazine. Yankee From Olympus, by Catherine D. Bowen, is a biography of the late Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. A condensed version appeared in the June issue of the Reader's Digest.

The Hatch Act as amended prevents the circulation among the armed forces of any pamphlet, literature, or material that might contain political argument or political propaganda calculated to affect the result of a Presidential, senatorial, or congressional election.

That is mighty broad language. Even the Bible might come under the ban.

I believe the War Department has applied a rather tortured and strained construction of the act. Nonetheless, if the mumbo-jumbo of this legislative monstrosity means what the Department says it means, then let us get rid of it.

This Hatch Act, a statutory abortion if ever there was one, prevents G. I. Joe from reading in the camp library the best book of the year, Yankee from Olympus. Yet, the same G. I. Joe can buy the book in the town book shop or department store, or borrow it from the local library.

It might also be pointed out that the Hatch Act has proven its worthlessness a score of times. It deprives 3,000,000 Federal workers of their right to participate in the coming important Presidential election. It is a denial of the right of free press and speech to those millions of workers, not only in Washington but in mills, factories, and shipyards and aircraft plants all over the country. It is flagrantly violated. It is unenforceable. Grand juries refuse to indict, petit juries refuse to convict, and judges in the rare cases of conviction suspend sentence or inflict a fine of 1 cent.

It is another ignoble experiment. Like prohibition, let us be done with it. It must be repealed.

James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, probably no other man ever stepped from the political stage with more friends in all political parties than James A. Farley, who recently resigned the chairmanship of the New York Democratic State Committee. Many newspapers of the Republican Party have joined the press of the Democratic Party in showering encomiums on him.

The Indianapolis Star, a newspaper not of Mr. Farley's political faith but which appreciates friendliness, character, and uprightness as being among the highest of human values, has joined in the chorus of praise showered on Mr. Farley since he made his valedictory and retired to private life. In submitting for the RECORD excerpts from an editorial printed in the Star on June 10 last, I am happy to present to the House and to the country a great newspaper's opinion of a great American, as follows:

JIM FARLEY STEPS FROM POLITICS

Big, kindly, canny James A. Farley, of New York, the man who won the 1932 Democratic Presidential nomination for Franklin Roosevelt by his practical and astute spadework with party leaders from precinct committeemen to State chairmen throughout the land, has bowed out of the political scene. He resigned Thursday as New York State Democratic chairman, the last of his prominent party affiliations.

Now chairman of the board of the Coca-Cola Export Sales Co., seeing to it that "cokes" get to our fighting men in all theaters of operation, he said business took all his time and, therefore, he was retiring from the political post.

Whatever the basic reasoning in his resignation, the country lost one of its most loved, one of its fairest and one of its most able politicians—not only of this period, but of all its history—when Jim Farley gave up the New York State chairmanship. And that's using the word politician in its very best sense—a real servant to the cause of honorable self-government by a vast people. As national party chairman and as Postmaster General, Mr. Farley has the highest esteem from the Nation. His has been a true personal contribution to the American scene—an example of what a politician should be. All Indiana offers him a handshake of good will for the future.

The United States Air Transport Command and the Chinese Soldiers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, in the Washington Merry-Go-Round of the Washington Post this morning appears a very important article on the war. I have had similar facts before me for some time. Mr. Drew Pearson has stated the situation so well that I do not believe any further elaboration is necessary. I quote the article:

Now that President Roosevelt has stepped up the pace of the drives against Japan, more attention is being given to the part which Chinese troops can play in the war. In this connection one of the most important unwritten chapters of the war now can be revealed—the part which Chinese troops and the United States Air Transport Command played in blocking the invasion of India.

At the time the Japs were driving into northern India last spring several thousand Chinese troops were flown into India and succeeded in stopping the onrushing Japs.

Day after day the British army had been pushed back, until the Japs menaced the Imphal rail line and seemed on the verge of spreading out into northern India. British-Indian troops had been powerless to stop the Jap advance. One year before, at Quebec, the advance through Burma had been announced and Lord Louis Mountbatten had been placed in charge. Instead of an advance through Burma, however, the Japs reversed the process.

In this emergency the United States Air Transport Command loaded several thousand Chinese soldiers into transport planes, flew them over "the hump" (the Himalayas, highest mountain range in the world), and dumped them down in northern India.

PACKING 'EM IN

The Chinese were packed into the planes in such numbers that they practically lay on top of each other. They were literally like sardines. Flying over 20,000 feet over the Himalayas they were without oxygen tanks, and numbers of them passed out. Unloaded in India, many were dragged from the plane unconscious, laid on the ground, and had to be revived.

However, given food and a week's rest, they bucked up and made admirable soldiers. They proved tough jungle fighters, which the British and Indian troops are not. Thus the Japs were stopped and the Assam Valley was saved.

Two facts stand out as a result of this hitherto untold chapter in the war. One was the amazing performance of the Air Transport Command, which flew in all kinds of weather over the most difficult terrain in the world. They took General Chennault's gasoline and flew it in reverse, not to aid China but to aid India.

The other was the example of what the Chinese troops could do in a pinch and what they might be able to do against Japan in north China if properly equipped and led.

Early in the war, before the Japs took Burma and Singapore, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek formally offered Chinese troops to Prime Minister Churchill to fight in India or any other place in the Orient. The offer was refused. The Chinese believed at the time that Churchill did not want Chinese troops in Burma, a country once part of China, which the Chinese sometimes talk about getting back.

CHINESE ON THE JOB

Since then the Chinese have done a great job in building the airports from which United States B-29's take off for the bombing of Japan. And with proper leadership and equipment many believe they could do an A-1 job in taking other objectives.

The final decision probably depends (1) on political factors; (2) on transportation. Regarding the latter, the Air Transport Command continues to perform miracles in carrying every drop of gasoline, all airplane parts, personnel, food, and every conceivable type of equipment to United States air bases in China.

As the enemy now full well knows—though the United States public may not—these transport planes now fly during the monsoon season, which the British previously said was impossible.

Mr. Speaker, I can only add that the American people have a right to be proud of our Air Transport Command and also that the confidence we have in the Chinese and our reliance upon them has not been misplaced. Given the tools with which to fight, the Chinese can utterly destroy every Japanese army on the soil of China. The present campaign in Burma to clear the Burma Road is a most strategic move. The way has been rough for us in this war because we were so peace loving that we forgot to defend ourselves. We are fast moving to a position where we, with our allies, command the offensive, and no more important offensive was ever undertaken than that of reestablishing the Burma Road.

B'nai B'rith Serves All

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with its long-established policy of rendering service to humanity, B'nai B'rith organization, over 100 years old, is rendering an outstanding service to the men and women of the armed forces of this Nation.

I am happy to be a member of the B'nai B'rith war-service committee that is constantly planning and establishing the comforts of home to every man and woman away from home. I herewith include in my remarks an article about the B'nai B'rith hospitality house established at Los Angeles, Calif., which appeared in the Civilian Front on July 29, 1944:

"THIS GUY BENNY B'RITH" RATES TOPS WITH SERVICEMEN GUESTS OF FREE HOSPITALITY HOUSE

Los ANGELES.—The battle-scarred marine drawled, "I don't know this guy 'Benny B'rith'— but if he's the guy who gave me this, you can thank him for me." And a sailor from Kansas exclaimed, wide-eyed, "You mean all this is free? It doesn't cost me a cent? Geez!"

These were the words of the first two servicemen who registered last Christmas Eve at the B'nai B'rith Hospitality House in Los Angeles, the world's largest free servicemen's hotel. And with those words B'nai B'rith knew its idea to help relieve Los Angeles' servicemen's weekend housing problem worked.

A year ago the weekly influx to Los Angeles of tens of thousands of men in uniform on weekend leave from the many Army and Navy installations in California created a housing crisis of major proportions. Hotels and rooming houses were jammed and thousands of Uncle Sam's finest were compelled to sleep in hotel lobbies. doorways, on lawns, and sidewalks, and even against buildings and lamp posts.

B'nai B'rith, the Nation's largest Jewish service organization, decided the situation required action. The Hollywood Lodge of B'nai B'rith opened a small dormitory in Hollywood but that only scratched the surface of a real job. It was at that point that Phil Goldstone, a member of Los Angeles B'nai B'rith Lodge, owner of the Alexandria Hotel and the long vacant Alexandria Hotel Annex on Spring Street, offered B'nai B'rith the use of the latter building—rent, heat, and light free—for use as a free dormitory for servicemen.

The offer was promptly accepted and representatives of all B'nai B'rith groups in Los Angeles created the B'nai B'rith Hospitality House, Inc., with the sole purpose of providing a free dormitory for men of all branches of the armed forces, without distinction as to race, creed, or color. Eleven B'nai B'rith lodges now participate in financing and manning the dormitory, which has 500 beds.

Since the Hospitality House opened on Christmas Eve, 1943, over 14,000 sleepers have been accommodated on Friday and Saturday nights, the only nights the place is open. In addition a thousand more have slept or dozed on chairs and settees in the lobby.

The doors are open all night Friday and Saturday and servicemen drop in at any time during the night for coffee and doughnuts. Over 60,000 doughnuts with coffee have been served thus far.

B'nai B'rith men and women serve as volunteers every Friday and Saturday night in 2- or 3-hour shifts. Members of Aleph Zadik Aleph, B'nai B'rith's youth organization, serve at the snack bar, wash dishes, and do odd jobs.

Servicemen guests are permitted to sleep until noon unless they leave calls at the call desk. A checking system for extra clothing and a safe for valuables are provided. All men registering must present furlough or leave passes and list their service numbers.

Stationery is also provided free. Comfortable chairs, magazine racks, a game room are other features of the house.

One of its most unique features is a time clock manned throughout the night by B'nai B'rith volunteers. When each man registers he is asked when he wants to be called in the morning. Next to his name the time is indicated and if he has to catch an early train or make an early mass the B'nai B'rith men on duty are sure to call him in time.

But the most popular thing about the House is the clean bed with fresh white sheets and the showers. A large recreation room has been converted into an extra dormitory because the need for sleeping quarters was found more important than recreation.

The housing shortage is so acute that many men arriving at the House refuse coffee and doughnuts for fear of losing bunks assigned to them. Only when they are assured that their beds are secure and that no one else would get them do many boys relax in amazed relief.

A homesick corporal turned to one of the registrants and whispered hoarsely, "You know, this is the nicest thing that's happened to me since I joined the service. You guys are O. K."

And B'nai B'rith says that Uncle Sam's boys are O. K., too.

The Danger of the Falange

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me on July 27, 1944, over Station WEVD, New York, N. Y.:

If we permit ourselves to forget, in purblind escapism, the meaning of all the danger signals that pointedly marked the road to World War No. 2, our inevitable victories on the continent and in Japan will prove hollow. Smashing the Fascist, Nazi, militaristic pattern in Germany, Italy, Japan and ignoring the same dread pattern in Spain which has extended to Argentina, Paraguay, Bolivia, and Chile would be like pulling out the weeds, but taking pains to leave the roots intact.

The political mentality of the Spanish Falange is Nazi. No Franco double-talk can make it otherwise. Deliver us, in the name of Allied ships sunk off Gibraltar, in the name of military secrets betrayed to the Axis through the work of Spanish embassies, in the name of wolfram, in the name of iron ore sent by Spain to feed Hitler's death machines, deliver us from Franco's neutrality.

We need not preen ourselves that our expensive wooing of Franco kept Spain neutral. Spain is neutral only because German militarists wished it so. (Churchill's kindly words about Spain notwithstanding.) Militarists planning a war do not overlook the possibility of defeat. A "Thousand-year reign," such as the Reich envisioned, is most scrupulously prepared for. If defeat should come again, the war machine must go underground for another try as it did in 1917. It is not for nothing that Marshal Goering said, "Spain is the key to two continents."

Thus, now that an Allied victory is imminent, it is well for Spain to make placatory gestures toward the Allies and at the same time to do the Axis' bidding. She has promised to cut down her wolfram shipments to Germany, but nothing has stopped her from sending 45,000 tons of iron ore a month to German-occupied territory. She has promised to withdraw the Spanish Blue Legion fighting against Russia on the eastern front, but nothing has stopped her from seeing that the Blue Legion is incorporated into the Nazi columns. The Falange militia is dissolved, Franco announced with braying trumpet, but the fact remains that the Falange militia was made part of the Spanish Army, thus strategically placing key positions in the hands of the Falange, and, most significantly, the appropriations to the Falange has been tripled this year. But the cunning hand of the German chess player is clearly visible. The gentleness of the Allies toward Spain is well marked. It is apparent that Franco Spain will not be crushed as will be Germany following an Allied victory. What a springboard for Germany's comeback.

Yes, what a springboard right into Latin America. The work of the Falange has been done very well indeed in Argentina. Step by step with the coup that put them in power in Argentina on June 4, 1943, the colonels' clique known as the G. O. U. (Grupo Officiales Unidos) has followed the antics of the Falange in Spain and the Nazi Party in Germany. Nor is that anything to marvel at. More than one-half the moneys appropriated to the Spanish Falange by the Spanish Government is earmarked for use in Latin America. It cannot be said that this money has been spent in vain. The administrations of ex-President Ramirez, of President Farrell, followed closely the Franco brand of neutrality. Riding high and handsome now is Col. Juan D. Peron, Argentina's Vice President, a member of the colonels' clique, who has steadily advanced forward and who is now rumored to be ready to replace Farrell. When accused of organizing labor and capital along totalitarian lines, Peron blatantly declared, "If the Nazis think along these lines, then the Nazis must be right."

The neutrality practices of Franco are assiduously aped by Argentina. True, after much pressure, Argentina enacted the farce of breaking relations with the Axis but the smuggling of vital war materials to Germany such as platinum, industrial diamonds, drugs (including insulin) continues. The violently anti-United States—anti-yanqui—newspapers are encouraged to vilify the northern neighbor. Although trade between Germany and South America has been ostensibly suspended, the big German trusts have kept up their interests in the Argentine markets and are making more money now than they did before the war. Upon the insistence of the United States, 38 German spies were arrested by the Argentine Government. Of the 38, 32 were released and 6 held because they prematurely confessed. It is interesting to note that the 6 who had to be held because of open confession have not been sentenced. German benevolent and cultural societies are permitted to function while all prodemocratic groups have been forbidden to assemble under any pretext whatsoever. Nazi-controlled newspapers receive without any difficulty added allotments of newsprint, but those of more liberal tinge are closely rationed. In fact, it has been said that if one wishes to know the next Argentine move, it is best to read the Nazi sheets circulated in Argentina.

The censorship of newspapers, radio, the theater and movies is stringent. Anti-Semitism is officially practiced. Notables in radio, science, the arts, and education have been withdrawn from their posts. Books of liberal slant are banned. Can parallels be more obvious between Argentina and regimes in Spain and Germany?

How did it all start? Well, there is the German General Wilhelm von Faupel, now head of the Ibero-American Institute in Berlin. A far-seeing institution, it created the overseas Falangist movement as the key to Fascist penetration in Latin America through the medium of the Spanish Falange.

And so Falange these many years has been busy selling Berlin to Latin America. As is pointed out by Allan Chase in his splendid book Falange. General von Faupel had an excellent background for such purpose. Until 1926, he was military counselor to the Inspector General of the Argentine Army when he left to take the same post in Brazil; from whence he departed to serve as Inspector General of the Peruvian Army, before his return to Germany. Von Faupel knows his Latin America well, you may be sure.

If we are still persuaded that the Falange is a purely internal affair of Spain and "none of our business," what have we to say to the declaration of Mexico's attorney general? "During 7 years," he said, "sinarquism has spread among the peasants the ideas, programs, and norms of conduct of the Spanish Government based on falangism and fascism, disturbing public order and clandestinely urging the Mexican Army and people to revolt against the Government. Up to the present, sinarquism limited itself to the organization of a potential force for the conquest of power, but articles published in El Sinarquista reveal that they believe themselves ready to take control of the Government." Let it be noted that this statement was made as late as July 8, 1944.

All about us seeps through the evidence that Franco's Falange is widening its orbit. Serious charges have been leveled against a pro-Franco group that has worked its way into the government-in-exile of the Philippine Commonwealth. Nor have we forgotten the congratulatory notes sent by Franco to Jose Laurel, puppet head of the Japanese-held Philippines.

Throughout Latin America, especially Paraguay, Bolivia, Chile, as well as Argentina, in a soil made ready by the Falange, German industry has planted its economic stronghold. From control of a country's economy to control of its government is not too big a step to contemplate. Regardless of what happens to Hitler, industrialists of the Reich are prepared to "carry on" Germany's destiny. Twenty-six hundred German firms, officially blacklisted both by the United States and England, thrive in Latin America. In Argentina, the blacklist is not recognized by the Government. Through operations carried out through Spain, the investments of Germany in Latin America are increased. Germans have their say in such financial pies as the public utilities, the electrical and building fields, and the arms production in the Argentine. Operating in Buenos Aires are the Banco Aleman Trans-atlantico and the Banco Germanico, German-dominated cartels such as the Siemens-Schukert, I. G. Farben, and Bayer drugs shovel in their huge profits in Argentina merrily. In addition to those openly operated, hundreds of other cover-up or straw-front German businesses exist. It is most certainly a beautiful field day for fifth columnists.

Chile, although it severed relations, still allows the Banco Aleman Transatlantico and Banco Germanico to continue. Interests like the A. E. G., the electrical trust, are in German hands. In Uruguay, the big importing houses like Kurt Berger and Merck Chemical still have their way.

Bolivia, as one of the chief Nazi centers, has within its borders all kinds of Nazi enterprises. Paraguay, of course, with its Axis sympathies, has many a German industrial outfit. Colombia and Venezuela are not neglected by German firms. It is not a picture to be lightly viewed and then put aside.

Last month we recalled Norman Armour, United States Ambassador to Buenos Aires. The day before yesterday Buenos Aires announced the recall of Adrian Escobar, Argentine Ambassador to the United States. Allied victories on the Continent have not resulted in the cessation of pro-Axis activities within Argentina any more than they did in Spain, in spite of Spain's promises and in spite of the Argentine so-called break in diplomatic relations with Germany and Japan. To the present governing heads of Spain and Argentina, the defeat of Germany is merely a hope deferred. There will be much work to be done after the war to raise the German banner again.

So Franco and his Falange dream. Undoubtedly the Reich's master minds have watched with deep satisfaction the poisonous tentacles of the Falange reaching forth to corrupt and destroy. The Reich's investment in the Spanish civil war has paid high dividends.

Our coddling of Spain must cease. We must recognize that Spain is an Axis Nation, that Spain is dedicated to the onerous purposes of the Axis, and that in defeating the Axis our victory remains a half measure unless Franco Spain is crushed along with its begetters. A democratic Spain must be our goal. Let us be sure this time.

Secretary of State Hull deserves highest commendation for the forthright statement condemning the Fascist Government of Argentina. That statement was long due. The pro-Axis Fascist clique under Farrell and Peron, now in control of Argentina, is endeavoring to spread the Axis doctrine throughout pan America.

Our duty in Argentina is plain. We must smash the Axis there as we are smashing it in Europe. It is insufficient to provide for diplomatic isolation. It must be implemented by an iron-clad quarantine. Our attitude must be firm and hard. We must isolate Argentina completely. To this end, we need the active cooperation of Great Britain. However, with heavy investments in Argentina, the British may be loath to take such steps. Her trade with Argentina gains while ours declines, but Britain must be made to see the light. She must refrain from importing wool, beef, wheat, and corn, and we must refrain from importing Argentine cheese, vegetable oil, corn, turkeys, and other foods. Both America and Britain may have to tighten belts. We should preclude the shipment of newsprint from Sweden, which Peron gives to Nazi publications but denies to pro-Allied papers. We must deny Argentina access to iron and steel for her huge armament program. I wager that if Great Britain, with the cooperation of the United States, would completely refuse navicerts and build an economic wall around Argentina, the Farrell-Peron regime would crumble in a fortnight. The unprecedented Argentine prosperity upon which Farrell and Peron have built their Nazi citadel would collapse.

Justice to Our Disabled Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill, H. R. 5185, which provides disability benefits for members of the armed forces who are discharged on account of disabilities that were declared to exist by the draftee or inductee at the induction center or which were revealed by the induction examination.

In my handling of veterans' claims I have encountered many cases of obvious injustice which this bill will correct. Men who are known to have a history of disabilities are taken into the service, nevertheless, and when later they are discharged they are denied disability benefits with the curt explanation that they had the disability before they were taken into the service. This simply is not right. If the induction authorities are given fair notice that a preinduction disability existed it does not lie in good conscience for the Government to say after the man's disability has grown worse and he is thrown out of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, "You are not entitled to relief because you had the disability before you entered the service." If the Government accepts a man because it regards him as a good physical risk it should stand by its bargain and in all fairness accord to him as generous treatment as it extends to all other men who are taken into the service.

The bill introduced by me is as follows:

Section 1. In any case where a man on his induction or enlistment in any of the armed services notifies the authorities at the induction center that he has had a case history of a certain specified ailment or that he is suffering from a certain specified disability, or when the induction examination reveals that he has such an ailment, or disability, and when later, after he has been taken into the service, said ailment or disability or some development or outgrowth of said ailment or disability becomes evident to the extent that it becomes necessary to discharge said man, the said ailment or disability shall be assumed to have been aggravated by service and said man shall be entitled to be paid disability benefits at the usual disability compensation rates.

SEC. 2. If a draftee or enlistee at the time of his enlistment or induction deliberately and deceitfully and by untruthful testimony conceals a disability he shall not be entitled to the benefits of this act.

Enough Water in the Missouri if Stored

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesaay, August 16, 1944

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, most of the questions about handling the Missouri River floods, and use of its waters, turn on the question of how much water would be available.

The Missouri River States Committee, composed of the Governors of nine States in the Missouri Valley, and other appointee members in those States, created a subcommittee of the several State engineers to make a determination on this point.

Their report has been completed and I am glad to say that their conclusion is that there is an adequate water supply for all contemplated uses, if a proper system of storage reservoirs is constructed.

Under permission given by the House, I include for the RECORD the report of this engineering subcommittee and commend it to the attention of all who are interested in solving the flood problems of the Missouri Valley and of converting the water from destructive to constructive uses.

REPORT OF THE ENGINEERING SUBCOMMITTEE TO THE MISSOURI RIVER STATES COMMITTEE

Pursuant to the resolution adopted by the Missouri River States Committee on March 14, 1944, your subcommittee submits the following report.

Meetings of the subcommittee were held on April 20, at Omaha, Nebr., and on May 2-4, inclusive, at Washington, D. C. At these meetings conferences were had with the United States Army engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation engineers, and engineers of the United States Geological Survey. On May 22 the subcommittee convened at Omaha for the preparation of this report.

WATER SUPPLY

The longest record of stream flow in the basin is that on the Missouri River, at Fort Benton, Mont., 1882–1943. The discharge of the Yellowstone River has been computed by the Army engineers for the period 1898 to 1943 by the use of records obtained for shorter periods at Livingston, Glendive, Intake, and Sidney, Mont. While there are short records at various points prior to 1929, no general program of stream gaging along the main river below the mouth of the Yellowstone was started until that year. With few exceptions these records, compiled by the United States Geological Survey, are now available for the 1929–43 period.

By the use of such data the Army Engineers compute the average annual run-off of the Missouri at Yankton, S. Dak., to be 23,050,000 acre-feet (equivalent to 31,800 cubic feet per second) for the period 1898 to 1943, inclusive. Using the 12-year period, 1931 to 1942, inclusive, the Bureau of Reclamation computes the average annual run-off at Yankton to be 14,935,000 acre-feet (equivalent to 20,600 cubic feet per second). For this same period the Army engineers' figures shown an average of 15,536,000 acre-feet per year (equivalent to 21,440 cubic feet per second), arrived at by correcting Yankton discharges for evaporation and storage at Fort Peck Reservoir.

It is the opinion of your subcommittee that neither the 1898–1943 period nor the 1931-1942 period accurately reflects the amount of water that, with regulation by storage, can reasonably be made available for use.

As to the longer period, the record at Fort Benton, and that on the Red River at Grand Forks, N. Dak., both available since 1882, show that water supplies in the Missouri and in the adjacent Red River Basins during the three or four decades prior to 1942 had undergone downward trends of large proportions. In this period the Red River, unaffected by irrigation, declined from an average of 2,500,000 acre-feet per year for the 10-year period 1901–1910 to 490,000 acre-feet per year for the 10-year period 1929–1938, a decline of 80 percent. Beginning its decline somewhat later, the upper Missouri water supply declined from an average of 7,556,000 acre-feet per year for the 10-year period 1908–1917, to an average of 3,716,000 for the 1929–1938 period, a decline of 51 percent. According to United States Census figures, the larger part of the present irrigation development in the upper Missouri Basin took place prior to 1919. Concerning the shorter period, it embraces essentially what is known as the drought period of the thirties, including 11 successive years of unprecedentedly low-water supply. To use a much longer period than that over which it might be possible to provide regulation by storage, or to start a shorter period with the beginning of a term of dry years without the benefit of accumulated storage, does not, in the opinion of your subcommittee, reflect the amount of water that can, with reasonable regularity, be made available with the storage, which both Federal agencies propose to construct in the Missouri Basin.

Using the 30-year period, 1914–1943, an average annual water supply at Yankton of 21,898,000 acre-feet (equivalent to 30,228 cubic feet per second) is taken from compilations supplied by the Army engineers. There is an average annual gain of 575,000 acre-feet between Yankton and Sioux City. When this is added to the average annual water supply at Yankton, the subcommittee finds an average annual water supply at Sioux City, the proposed head of navigation of 22,473,000 acre-feet per year.

We believe that reservoir storage in the basin can be provided which could effect reasonable regulation between wet and dry periods.

IRRIGATION REQUIREMENTS

The Bureau of Reclamation estimates that above Sioux City, Iowa, there is now a total of 2,265,600 acres irrigated and their plan proposes to irrigate an additional 3,576,000 acres in that area. In the entire Missouri River Basin the Bureau estimates that there are now irrigated 5,027,700 acres and it proposes to develop an additional 4,760,000 acres. They estimate the annual consumptive use of water on land now irrigated, including evaporation from reservoirs, to be 8,000,000 acre-feet, of which 3,600,000 acre-feet are consumed above Sioux City, Iowa. This amounts to about 14 percent of the total undepleted water supply of the basin above Sioux City. They estimate annual consumptive use in the entire basin for new development to be 9,000,000 acre-feet, of which 6,800,000 acre-feet will be consumed above Sioux City. These estimates appear to be the best information available.

NAVIGATION REQUIREMENTS

The Army engineers in 1932 estimated the minimum flow for an 8–9-foot channel as 30,000 cubic feet per second during the navigation season (240 days—14,281,000 acre-feet). They now state that this figure must be considered as an assumption made solely as a basis for hypothetical operation studies. They advise present indications are that, during the wetter years, characterized by frequent flash rises from tributary streams entering below Sioux City, more water will be required for maintaining a navigable channel than during the drier years.

They also advise that the regulation of stream flow both on the main stem and on the major tributaries, which will be afforded with the completion of the proposed reservoirs, will tend to control the adverse effects of the variable climatic factors, and that the river improvement works, which are to be constructed to further contract the navigation channel, will enable an increase in channel depths to be secured without an increase in demand on the flow of the river. This improvement would be obtained by revetment of banks, construction of permeable dikes to contract and stabilize the waterway, cut-offs to eliminate long bends, closing of minor channels, removal of snags, and dredging as required.

SANITATION REQUIREMENTS

Quoting from a United States Public Health Service report, the United States Army engineers advised that sewage from a population of 1,205,000, and industrial wastes with a population equivalent of 2,375,000, making a total of 3,580,000, are produced on the Missouri River and lower reaches of tributaries. They estimate winter low flow requirements for pollution control during normal winters to be 5,500 cubic feet per second at Yankton, S. D., and 8,000 cubic feet per second below Kansas City, Mo., 5,500 cubic feet per second for 125 days (nonnavigation season) amounts to 1,364,000 acre-feet.

LOCATION OF LEVEES

The proposed levees would be constructed, in general, along the high banks of the river with 3,000 to 5,000 feet of floodway between them. The width of the channel between existing river improvement works varies from 700 feet at Sioux City to 1,100 feet near the mouth. The proposed levees would not reduce the width of the improved channel and, therefore, would not directly reduce the amount of water required for navigation. Although the flood-control reservoirs will, in general, result in a more uniform flow of the river, it is not believed that any material reduction in the width of the river will be practicable. At least, at this time, it is considered inadvisable to assume that any appreciable saving in the amount of water required for navigation will be effected by this means.

Appendix I, showing maps and charts to accompany report, on review of reports of House Document No. 238, Seventy-third Congress, second session, and House Document No. 821, Seventy-sixth Congress, third session, on flood control, main stem of Missouri River, Sioux City, Iowa, to the mouth, indicates the height and location of levees, and areas to be protected.

CONCLUSION

After a complete examination of the reports of the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation, it is the conclusion of your subcommittee that these agencies have each in their sphere accomplished in a complete and comprehensive manner the tasks assigned to them, and, together, their reports constitute a sound basis for the development of the Missouri River Basin. If it should appear that under certain circumstances there might be possible conflicts in use of water it must be remembered that both agencies recognize that their plans constitute a broad framework, and that details are to be worked out during the years of the development period, through the coordinated and cooperative efforts of Federal and State agencies and local interests.

Time will indicate more accurately the quantities of water required for the various uses in the basin. At this time the Bureau of Reclamation cannot determine definitely the acreage that ultimately will be irrigated, nor when complete irrigation development will be accomplished, nor what the ultimate consumptive use of water will be. Likewise, the Army engineers cannot determine definitely the amount of water required to maintain a navigation channel.

As construction proceeds and details are developed, your subcommittee believes that the States of the basin, through the Missouri River States Committee, or a similar agency to succeed it, should continue active, and thus work with the Federal agencies throughout the period of development of the basin.

Respectfully submitted.

Pertinent Observations Bearing on the Coming Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

IT WILL BE NO PUSH-OVER

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, the national conventions have been held, candidates selected, and issues made clear.

The opening guns of the campaign have been fired. A real battle is in prospect, a regular knock-down and drag-out battle with no punches barred. When Harrison Spangler, former chairman of the Republican National Committee, said "Anyone we nominate will be elected," he was indulging in a bit of wishful thinking. The Roosevelt forces are still formidable and practically intact. The Republican leaders must not overlook the horde of Federal office holders, some 3,000,000 of them, scattered all over the United States. They number more than three times as many as the total of all State employees, and they have been placed largely in key states, such as New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, New Jersey, and California—where they can be the most effective. These Federal pay rollers will be out on the front lines fighting to hold on to their jobs. Nor dare the Republican leaders underestimate the strength of the Hillman Political Action Committee and its communistic affiliates.

According to advance estimates, the Republicans have only a 50–50 chance at this writing. However, they have selected a well-balanced ticket and adopted a forthright platform, not patterned after New Deal philosophy, as it was in 1940. The American voter this November is to be given a clean-cut choice—something he did not have in the last Presidential campaign. He is going to be told in no uncertain words that the Republican Party is for America and the American people, and that our first duty is to our own country and our own people. The Republicans cannot hope to outdo Roosevelt in playing the role of world Santa Claus. Republicans should preach the doctrine that the salvation of America lies in an independent judiciary, in our American system of private enterprise, and in unhampered creative toil. They should take issue with the New Deal philosophy that the less we produce the more we will have, and "we need not worry about the national debt because we owe it to ourselves." The Republican Party should stage an aggressive campaign that will make clear to the American people the vital issues that are to be settled in the November election. The voters then can make their choice between New Deal collectivism on the one hand and the American system of economy on the other—as we have known it and prospered under it for the past 160 years.

A WIN-THE-PEACE ADMINISTRATION

Plans for the post-war world have been made and are in the making. These post-war plans cover world financial agreements, a world food set-up, world relief agencies, world air-transportation agreements, and a world organization to preserve peace. All of these post-war plans—before they can go into effect—must be written into law and must win the approval of the Congress. Because of this situation the next Congress and the next occupant of the White House must work together cooperatively, with perfect teamwork, if these enormous world problems are to be solved and settled right; otherwise there will be world chaos.

In 1919 Woodrow Wilson had his plans made for the post-war world, but unfortunately he did not take the Congress into his confidence. He did not sell his post-war international program to the Members of Congress, but simply said, in effect, "Here it is. This is what I want. You place your stamp of approval upon it." The Congress balked. There was no cooperation or teamwork between the Congress and the White House and a world depression resulted. Will history repeat itself? Will 1945 be 1919 all over again? The answer is obvious. It depends entirely upon whether there will be perfect teamwork and cooperation between the White House occupant and the Congress next year and the years following. We must elect this fall a "Win-the-Peace" administration. The responsibility rests squarely upon the American voter.

THE WORLD MONETARY CONFERENCE

The World Monetary Conference held at Bretton Woods, N. H., has completed its work and gone home. Tentative plans have been agreed upon to achieve world monetary stabilization in the post-war era by the establishment of an international monetary fund of eight to ten billion dollars, and also a world bank of $10,000,000,000, of which the United States will furnish about half, with the rest of the world furnishing the other half. Fortunately, however, these tentative plans must be submitted to the Congress for approval and passage in the form of laws. This canot be done before the next Congress meets in January. It is highly probable that a revised plan or even a new plan may be adopted, such as the plan already submitted by Congressman CHARLES DEWEY, of Illinois. Public hearings will be held by the appropriate committees of the Congress before any action is taken.

This is just one more very important matter, the outcome of which hinges upon the November election.

A BACKWARD LOOK

The Big Three of World War No. 1 sat around the peace table to arrange a "permanent and lasting peace." England was represented by Lloyd George, who had two objectives—to maintain the balance of power in Europe and to acquire more territory for the British Empire. France was represented by Clemenceau, who had only one objective—to make France safe. The United States was represented by Woodrow Wilson, who also had one objective—to establish permanent world peace. Because of these conflicting objectives a compromise was agreed upon, the Treaty of Versailles, the terms of which prevented the accomplishment of any of these objectives. England, France, and the United States, therefore, lost the peace after winning the war. This failure at Versailles brought on, and was the direct cause of, World War No. 2. Why the failure?

President Wilson was an idealist. He expressed his idealism in his Fourteen Points. He was a tired, worn-out, sick man, in no condition to match the brilliance of Lloyd George or the stubbornness of Clemenceau. He lost his fight "to make the world safe for democracy" because he did not pin down England and France to a post-war program during the war, but waited until after Germany had collapsed and the armistice had been signed. England and France, out of danger after the collapse of Germany, were a different England and France to deal with than they would have been when they were on the verge of defeat at the hands of Germany, dependent entirely upon the United States for the help needed to win. Wilson missed his opportunity. He did not use his advantage when he had it. Will history repeat itself? Will a tired, worn-out, sick idealist be outmaneuvered at the coming peace table—this time by Stalin and Churchill—because he also failed to pin down his Allies to a post-war world program while the war was going on and before Germany collapsed?

THE ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE

Tom Dewey, at St. Louis, took 25 governors and welded them into a vote-getting machine that promises to become the most efficient and effective the Republican Party has had since the election of 1896. This feat in itself proves that he is Presidential timber, and demonstrates his ability as an organizer. In the face of handicaps—irritations and ruffled feelings from the previous Governors Conference held at Hershey, Pa.—Dewey was successful in winning the confidence of all 25 Governors and also the assurance of their active, aggressive, whole-hearted support in the fall campaign. In handling the controversial subject of States' rights against Federal control, Dewey proposed a program of Federal-State collaboration in the solution of all post-war problems, unemployment compensation, reconversion, public works, labor standards, and so forth, that completely satisfied the Governors and promises to make that group a much more potent force in national affairs that they have ever before been. The St. Louis conference was a very successful one. It places the Republican Party in an advantageous position for the coming campaign.

FOUR FORCES FOR FOURTH TERM

With 3,000,000 Federal jobholders interested in holding their jobs; with Hillman's P. A. C. and its fund of several million dollars dedicated to a fourth term; with the big city machines and their Kelly-Hague bosses lined up for a fourth term; and with every Communist and Communist-controlled labor group in America supporting President Roosevelt for a fourth term, his reelection this fall is certain unless the American people as a whole—Republicans and Democrats alike—become aroused to their danger and do something about it. These four groups constitute the fourth term shock troops upon whom the President depends for victory. These forces have taken possession of the party in power and will dominate its campaign activities. If successful in their purpose to reelect President Roosevelt for a fourth term they will be in a position to dominate our post-war economy beyond the dreams of the most ardent radicals 10 years ago. These four groups are for a fourth term, but not for the "four freedoms."

OUR COMMANDER IN CHIEF

President Roosevelt by constitutional provision is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy during peace as well as during war. He claims to be, but is not and never has been, Commander in Chief of the American people; in fact, he is the duly elected servant of the American people. Every President we have ever had except three—Washington, Jackson, and Grant—has been a civilian, knowing nothing at first-hand about war, war strategy, or war aims. Roosevelt is no exception to this rule. No President ever before assumed to call himself Commander in Chief of the American people. No President ever before considered himself indispensable. Every President before Roosevelt acknowledged by his action in stepping out at the close of two terms that he was dispensable.

POST-WAR LEND-LEASE

This Nation is faced with the question, Shall Uncle Sam continue lend-lease to England and Russia after the war? That is a question that must be answered "Yes" or "No." Our public debt today is three times the public debt of England. The Russian public debt is not known because of state control and state ownership of all the means of production under the Russian economic system. England wants lend-lease continued after the war to support Britain's domestic economy. This would save England from going deeper into debt and stave off a serious depression the English anticipate, but it would sink us deeper into debt to the tune of several billion dollars each year. Congress is still in control of the purse strings of the Nation and can refuse next June to extend lend-lease. Therefore the question, Shall lend-lease be continued after the war? will be settled by the next Congress, the Congress that will be elected this November.

High Standards for the Egg Industry in New Jersey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include an editorial, I wish to call the attention of the Congress to the situation in New Jersey which confronts the poultrymen, as a result of an order of the War Food Administration.

The State of New Jersey, by legislative action, has defined what a fresh egg is, and, acting under such legislation, the egg industry has reached a high state of efficiency, and the public has benefitted materially. Under the new regulations and the price ceiling established by the O. P. A., a large part of the effectiveness of these standards will be destroyed and the public is the loser.

The State of New Jersey is being penalized for its foresight in establishing high standards for the egg industry. Manifestly this is unfair, and I trust will have the consideration of the Food Administration. However, action on the part of the poultrymen in defiance of these regulations is hard to condone, and it is to be hoped that calm judgment will resolve the matter in a better way.

Nevertheless, this matter brings the question of States' rights very forcibly to the foreground, and the interests of the country demand that States' rights be preserved. The following editorial, appearing in the Asbury Park Evening Press, for Tuesday, August 15, entitled "Fight This Egg Order," is very much to the point. This newspaper enjoys a large circulation in Monmouth County, N. J., and represents the thinking of the people of that community.

I commend the editorial to the Members of Congress for their reading:

FIGHT THIS EGG ORDER

The decision of the Federal Government to impose its own inspection and grading of eggs on New Jersey producers offers conclusive proof of how Federal bureaucracy not only invades States' rights but works against the interests of producers and consumers.

New Jersey is the only State which defines a fresh egg by law. As a result, its egg standards have been raised, and the public has been protected. Moreover, eggs of highest quality have commanded a premium, because the consumer can be certain that he gets what he pays for.

Other States have been lax in establishing or enforcing standards which are lower than New Jersey's, and because of this the War Food Administration has issued an order which would eliminate the "New Jersey fancy" grade of eggs, now commanding a premium of 2 cents a dozen over O. P. A.'s highest price for grade A eggs, and substitute what will be known as "U. S. special" grade. Under the order New Jersey egg markets would have to employ Federal inspectors to retain the premium price already established by the State's own standards.

New Jersey is thus penalized because of the failure of other States to take the steps which this State took far in advance of price control. Moreover, New Jersey is not given credit for an egg grading and inspection system which has successfully served the public. There is no legal relief from the order, which leaves resistance as the one means of combating Federal invasion of the New Jersey egg business.

The directors of the principal egg auction markets in New Jersey have voted to defy this order which became effective yesterday. It is a serious matter to take such a step, and the directors must realize they face a difficult battle. By their action they have become champions of States' rights, and as such they should have the full support of consumers as well as the assistance of their State government.

Behold the Tabernacle of God With Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following sermon preached at the golden jubilee mass of Sacred Heart Parish, Lynn, Mass., June 18, 1944, by Rev. John J. Wright, S. T. D.:

Today we celebrate, with gratitude to God, the creation of this parish 50 years ago on June 13, 1894. The beginnings were modest, and the first pastor, Father Denis Sullivan, could scarcely have dreamed at that time the beauty of the glorious temple that was destined to be dedicated in September 1912 by our late Cardinal Archbishop.

Even in this brief span of years—for 50 years are not so many in the life of the ancient church—how rich are the memories which have clustered around this parish. What force for good has radiated from it into the life of this diocese and of this civil community. How great a debt is owed this altar and this pulpit for public honesty and civic loyalty learned here, for family discipline and personal sanctity fostered here and preached, for faith and hope and charity nurtured here and practiced. How many personal memories, wonderful medleys of experiences human and divine, must by now take their concrete form from the material features of this church Holy memories of moments we most yearn to recapture, of communions worthily received, of graces almost sensibly perceived, thousands of men and women recall all these in terms of this church and of its sanctuaries. Tender memories, for those whose marriages were sanctified here and their children christened; secret memories of hope reborn and joy recaptured will hallow forever the confessionals of this church for some; sweet memories and sad, confided to no man, will always bring to certain of you the vision of these shrines, hushed by the whispered hopes and fears and holy confidences of the sons and daughters of this parish; bitter memories, now almost made palatable by a sacred savor given them at this altar, for those whose beloved dead were brought here for the last prayers of this parish and the last blessings of its priests. Memories of holiness, memories of happiness, memories of Christ.

Christ Himself might be considered the founder of parish life. "Wherever two or three are gathered in My name, there am I in the midst of them"—so spoke Jesus Christ. Now every parish is essentially a group of souls gathered in the name of Jesus, gathered about a tabernacle in the care of a priest, a tabernacle in which Jesus dwells under the sacramental species of the Eucharist. The parish is the normal point of contact between Jesus Christ and His faithful. Parish life is the ordinary means by which we become citizens of and active in the Kingdom of Christ on earth, the church. The parish, with its pastor and priests, its altar, its confessional, its pulpit, its schools, its good works, its sinners and saints, is a microcosm; it is the whole church in miniature, and through it Christ does for a limited community what He founded the universal church to do for all the world. Through it, a group of the faithful, in a corner of the world, do for Christ what all the transcendent church; in heaven, in purgatory, and on earth, does for Him throughout creation. Christ is adored in the parish liturgy; Christ is preached in the parish pulpit; Christ is praised by the parish choirs; Christ is meditated in the parish convent; Christ is imitated, reproduced, in all the mysteries of His life, by the hidden lives of unknown parish saints, by the public zeal of parish workers, by the sufferings of the parish sick.

The parish priest, custodian of the keys of the parish tabernacle, is, in miniature, Peter himself, custodian, as vicar of Christ, of the keys of heaven. That is why there is no need for a man ever to leave his parish, in life or in death, in order to receive from the church everything needed in order to bring him from earth to heaven. When a child is brought to the parish church to be baptized, his parish priest does not inquire what he seeks of the parish or of its priest, but rather "What dost thou ask of the church of God?", as if the parish priest were prepared to give in his local church whatever of faith and of life everlasting the child might expect to receive from the total church, everywhere. Only in material terms—in point of territory and the mere measurements of area and population—is there a distinction between the parish and the church. Only materially is the parish a portion of the church. Spiritually, the parish is the church, the whole church. Just as the entire Christ is present in any consecrated particle of the Eucharist, so the church is present and at work in any canonically erected parish, however fragmentary. There is a sense, familiar to every Catholic, in which the church is Christ; there is also a sense in which the parish is the church, the whole church, the church in miniature.

The history of the parish in the life of the church suggests how this is true. The parish has come to be a definite territory, with a church under the direction of a priest, to which the faithful of a particular area belong; but the parish is a late development in the church. In the very beginnings of the apostolic church there was, of course, but one flock, gathered timorously about the apostles at Jerusalem. Scattered by the winds of Pentecost, however, the apostles left Jerusalem to catholicize the church, to render Jesus Christ and His redemption universal. Wherever they went they founded new cenacles, patterned on that at Jerusalem, new tablernacles, multiplying the presence of Christ throughout the world. Because these apostles were bishops, the first territorial divisions made in the church were dioceses. They were founded and ruled by those who, together with St. Peter, had received at once the priesthood and the episcopate. Peter, bound forever to Christ, was the bond which united among themselves these several and scattered sees of the single church—the church. Between the faithful and the church, there was but one intermediary—the bishop. Peter was jealous of his flock, committed to him by Christ's double charge, and he did not wish the distance between him and them to become too great. He wished his voice to reach the furthermost boundaries of the believing world echoed by the bishops, but without other overtones or the accents of other voices. And so the primitive dioceses had each but one church, the cathedral; each one baptistry, one altar, one pulpit. The diocese was then a parish, and the bishop was its parish priest.

But the flock grew great; as Christ had foretold; the grain of mustard seed grew and multiplied, reproducing itself a thousandfold. Into the towns and villages the news of redemption spread like wildfire, and everywhere men gathered to thank God for it and to insure the perpetual presence of its channels in their midst. Then the bishops became obliged to delegate to auxiliaries some part, at least, of the mandate they had received from Peter, as Peter from Christ and Christ from the Father. And so priests, hitherto cocelebrants at mass around the altar of the bishop, assistants around his throne, received from the bishops, while remaining still subject to them, power to offer mass at local altars, to bless and forgive and preach and baptize in local churches. These priests received a portion of territory with a group of faithful, and on the territory thus assigned them they built a church which was to be an image of the cathedral, as the cathedral had been an image of the original cenacle, as the cenacle had been an image of heaven. Thus was the parish born.

Four elements, then, blend in the notion of a parish: Territory, people, priest, and church. Of these, territory is first because in it all other elements, physical and spiritual, nonhuman and human, have their roots. Out of its territory, its mere earth, comes the water which cancels, through the sacrament of baptism, the sin inherited by the children of the parish, and puts to flight, when blessed in sacramentals, the spirits hostile to the parish life. Out of its land, in symbol at least, comes the wheat which, made into bread, gives place to the body of Christ in the eucharist; out of land come the wine, the olives, the oils which sanctify in the sacramental life of the parish, which strengthen and save its members. Out of its land come the flowers which make glad its altars, the materials with which its church is constructed and adorned. Thus, mere land, mere matter, comes to share in the ends and the purposes of the parish, the ends of the church, the purposes of God.

The second element is the people: The souls of the parish, as the ancient idiom of the faithful calls them, the parishioners. In the life of the church parishioners and brethren are interchangeable terms. The prayer at the parish altar or in parish devotions pro fratribus nostris absentibus—for our absent brethren—means a prayer for our absent parishioners, and it is on the parish as a family of brethren that the priest calls down the blessing of God when, in the liturgy, he prays: "Respice quaesumus, Domine, super hanc familiam—look down, we beg Thee, O Almighty God, on this Thy family." The domestic spirit of the parish is never more manifest than on Sunday, the day reserved to God, and of all days the most typically parochial. On that feast and in the liturgy of the parish mass the people carry on, as it were, a family conversation with their priest, following his every movement at the family table, the parish altar, with their reverent gaze; answering "So be it. * * * Amen," to all the supplications he makes in their name; answering "Et cum Spiritu tuo * * * to you, with us," to all his paternal good wishes; striking their breasts in humility of spirit with him whenever he does so in their name; bowing their heads together with him whenever he names their Elder Brother, Jesus their Saviour; and suddenly growing silent as he pauses in the mass to recall the names of their living and their dead.

The parish priest is the third element in the notion of the parish, for of this family he is the father. If the voices with which our children speak echo the accents of their earthly fathers, the thoughts their voices learn to speak echo the teachings of the spiritual fathers who are their priests. At every stage of their lives they seek him out and he them. With the dawn of reason and the possibility of revolt from God, he is present to guide them Godward and to nourish them with God Himself. In the crises of adolescence he prepares them for the strengthening and the confirmation in the faith which the bishop comes to his parish to bring. On the threshold of maturity he fosters in them their vocations, and whatever these may be has paternal part in them, whether it be as official witness to their weddings, or as their responsible directors towards the priesthood or other consecrated lives. And while his people in their fields or shops, at home or abroad, wage their unrelenting battle of life, their parish priest, like Moses on the hill of Raphidim, lifts his arms unceasingly in prayer for them. More powerful is he than Moses as he intercedes for them, for Moses held in his hands the symbol of God's power, but our priest holds in his hands the God of power Himself.

Last of the elements in the notion of the parish is the parish church itself. If the parish is a family of which the parish priest is the father, the parish church is its house, its hearth, and home. All the little rites and observances of a domestic life take place within its walls, with God Himself made at home, so to speak, within it. All of the houses in which Jesus dwelt during His life on earth, all of the homes made holy by His presence, have their little history renewed in the liturgical life of the parish year. Bethlehem, Nazareth, Cana, Bethany, the Cenacle, Emmaus—all these dwelling places where God found hospitality when He visited our earth, are reconstructed one by one to house Him mystically in the parish church.

And mystically, once more, for their little time each year, there gathers about the same Divine Guest the ancient family of the faithful, numbering like shepherds to those of Bethlehem, like Wise Men to those from the East, like Apostles to those of Galilee, new Marthas and other Marys, Lazarus again and Zaccheus, and all the others whose homes were ever houses for the Lord Jesus find their counterparts within the walls of the house of God that is the parish church. With all the ancient needs, the timeless tears, the unceasing petitions, the same gratitude, the same joy, the same faith, the Catholic people find in the parish church their home, the House of God among men.

Oh! my parish church! Not even death can separate me from thy love. The liturgy offered within thy walls will always include me in its supplications. If anything on this devastated earth has made me dream of heaven, it is what I have seen and heard and felt in the moments when I visited Thee. If the paradise in which I believe will one day confirm for me the faith by which I have believed, I owe it to the things which were done to me and taugh me under thy roof. Small wonder, then, that I love thee, O my parish church. For the life I first learned to live in thee is the undying life that I will live in heaven, if I be faithful to thee. The gate of heaven is the door to thy temple; the key to heaven is the key to thy tabernacle; the joy of heaven is the possession forever of that God whom first we found on earth at home within thy holy walls.

Making Idleness Blissful

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted, I am including as an extension of remarks an editorial appearing in the Brattleboro Reformer of Monday, August 14, 1944.

The editor strips the flesh off the Kilgore-Murray-C. I. O. bill and exposes the grinning skeleton of proposed further unlimited wasting of the hard-earned dollars of the taxpayer in a vain attempt to spend this country into post-war prosperity under a government of men and not of laws.

It certainly is an exposé worth reading. Here it is:

MAKING IDLENESS BLISSFUL

The Kilgore-Murray-C. I. O. bill for reconverting industry, and for unemployment compensation and other benefits to labor, points up the real issue between the New Deal party seeking a fourth term for President Roosevelt and the supporters of the Republican nominee, Governor Dewey, of New York, in the opinion of the Hartford Courant. It does so far more emphatically and realistically than do the platforms of the two major parties. While the measure was decisively beaten in the Senate, a similar measure will come up this week in the House of Representatives.

New dealers wrote the Kilgore-Murray bill with the aid and indeed at the direction of the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. Several weeks ago the Courant stated that the new dealers did not like the Baruch-Hancock recommendations for reconversion. It added that legislation translating those recommendations into action was deliberately being delayed, that in good time the new dealers would attempt to throw Mr. Baruch and all his works into the ashcan, and that under the plea of impending emergency they would seek to jam through Congress their own scheme for reconversion. Unfortunately, that prophecy has come true.

The Kilgore-Murray bill is based on the philosophy of unlimited public debt, of spending the Nation into prosperity. It assumes that war work on the home front entails as great a sacrifice as fighting on the battle fronts—a gross insult to the men and women in uniform—and it seeks to set up a government of men over our government of laws.

The real issue between the supporters of this legislation and its opponents is not whether those persons placed in economic distress by reconversion of industry shall have or shall not have decent and respectable and adequate relief. The issue is only what amount of relief is adequate, and how it should be administered. The proponents of the George bill, which incorporates the recommendations of the Baruch-Hancock report and has been adopted by the Senate, are as fully cognizant of the need for protecting the livelihood of the workingman as are the New Deal backers of the Kilgore-Murray-C. I. O. bill. But the George bill "is no lazy man's dream" as is the Kilgore bill, nor does it lead to collectivism and the arbitrary rule of men as opposed to the orderly process of rule by law.

Nobody knows within tens of billions of dollars what the cost of the Kilgore plan might be. The only certainty is that it rewards idleness handsomely—as much as $35 a week for a front-porch sitter who cannot find just the work he wants, under just the conditions of unionism he is supposed to prefer.

In essence, the Courant concludes, the Kilgore-Murray-C. I. O. bill reflects the political principles of Murray, Hillman, Bridges, Browder and their adaptation of a foreign "ism" to the American scene. The George bill rests upon the governmental philosophy of the founding fathers, of Jackson, Lincoln, Cleveland, Wilson and all the champions of liberty founded on law.

Farm-to-Market Roads

REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, as a former long-time member of the Roads Committee, and as one who will always be deeply concerned about highway improvement, I would like to emphasize the importance and need for bold and intelligent action on highway matters by this body.

One can now say with conviction that the war is in its last phase, the phase of final victory. As our vicious, anti-Christian enemies weaken and succumb, we are brought closer and closer to a new challenge, the challenge of peace. That challenge is not easy to meet. To restore what we may call normal times, preparedness is a necessary instrument. Let us be prepared for the peace as we should have been prepared for war.

Throughout the land, preparedness is under way. Being a highly civilized nation which attempts to provide the necessities and comforts of life for all citizens, a large share of its workers must work on jobs that come through the production of raw materials and processing and selling of manufactured goods. Therefore, it is gratifying to know that business and industry are facing the future now—that they are making plans not just to create jobs but more to create healthy business conditions which will produce the jobs along with opportunity.

Government, too, has responsibility. Government must do everything in its power to re-create the conditions that will bring renewed vigor to private enterprise, whether the business be farming or manufacturing, and to make it possible for a free people to live unfettered and in an atmosphere wherein hard work will be justly rewarded.

Looking to the future, to provide jobs and opportunity for returning servicemen and for released war-plant workers and others engaged in many ways in the war effort, we know there must be more employment on all fronts. We know that all the jobs existing before the war must be brought to life again, and that millions of additional jobs must be produced. If there is any doubt of that, turn the pages back to 1940 when, even despite war orders, the unemployed and those working on emergency Government projects totaled some 8,000,000.

No, we cannot toy with the future. If we do, another depression will surely wrap its tentacles around surviving taxpayers.

With Government, however, keeping in step with the hopes and aspirations of farmers, of businessmen, and of workers, there need be little fear about the future.

One of the things we must look forward to, and be prepared for, is a tremendous demand for transportation facilities, particularly on the highways. Prosperity cannot exist under the handicap of poor, inadequate, and costly transportation. Provision of adequate highways is a job that only Government can perform. Extending Federal assistance for highway construction is one action Government may take which will produce direct, foreseeable, and tangible benefits.

It is a wise government which, after a war, rebuilds or replaces those things destroyed. Highway building agencies have not been able to properly maintain the highways during the war. Shortages of materials, equipment, and manpower have caused an alarming neglect of all classes of roads. Highways are a casualty of the war. Failure to recognize that will set back the recovery of this Nation many, many long and costly years.

In considering Federal highway legislation we must deal in large figures because highway transportation and needs are so vast as to stagger the imagination. In 1941, for instance, our motor-vehicle mileage totaled some 350,000,000,000 car-miles. That traveling was done on some 3,000,000 miles of roads and streets.

A vast amount of work remains to be done on the main State highways. These are the roads that connect cities and most towns and villages. Thousands of miles of roads built shortly after the First World War have long outlived their usefulness and must be replaced. Moreover, traffic conditions have changed greatly. To meet the needs of today's heavier traffic flows and heavier and speedier vehicles, main State highways must be straightened, widened, and reconstructed.

Cities, too, face a big job in fitting streets, particularly principal thoroughfares, to the traffic that will come after the war. Aside from repairing thousands and thousands of miles, cities must build express highways to reduce congestion and accidents.

However, I want to emphasize needs that have been too long existent on local roads. When I say local roads, I mean the farm-to-market roads, the roads over which most of the Nation's foodstuffs must first travel. As everyone knows who has been interested in highway improvement, local roads in general have suffered so that the main highways could be adequately improved; yet, farm and rural populations have contributed vast sums in State and Federal taxes on the motor vehicle.

The war has brought a new appreciation of farm-to-market roads. The production and availability of foodstuffs have constituted one of our principal engines of war. Farmers living along what might be called isolated roads have made it possible for this Nation to feed itself and to feed its army, and to feed the people and armies of our allies.

In the peace that is to come, it will be essential to provide the rural areas with highways which can bring quickly to market dairy products, vegetables, and other produce which this Nation must have to exist. It has been demonstrated time and time again that improvement of farm-to-market roads widens the demand and market for produce and manufactured goods of all kinds. Bad roads discourage travel, and they discourage commerce.

More than 40 percent of the communities, large and small, in this Nation are without railroad transportation. They are entirely dependent upon motor vehicles and highways. For the most part those communities without railroad transportation are the centers of agricultural areas. Farm-to-market roads are as important to those people as are streets to cities.

There are upwards of 2,500,000 miles of secondary or local roads in this country. Only a relatively small portion of those roads have been improved to give year 'round service. Obviously it would be impossible and impractical to surface all of those highways. Nevertheless, several hundred thousand miles of the most important of those roads should be graded and drained, or graveled, or light-surfaced. From a study of the mass of statistics available, I get this simple conclusion—most of our farmers are still stuck in the mud.

In the past some help has been extended by Congress to the States in meeting the stupendous rural road problem. The assistance given, however, was limited in amount and was confined to the secondary roads. The annual authorizations, given before the war, ranged from $15,000,000 up to $25,000,000. Obviously, no State received enough Federal aid to make much progress on the secondary roads. My State of Nebraska, for instance, received from $300,000 to a little over $500,000 per year. That is not much when you consider that, exclusive of the main State highway system. Nebraska has about 90,000 miles of secondary and farm-to-market roads.

Recently the House Roads Committee reported out a Federal highway-aid bill which would extend Federal assistance to farm-to-market roads not included in the Federal-aid systems. Under the terms of that bill, Nebraska, for example, would receive some $2,100,000 per year. That is certainly a step in the right direction.

Testimony presented this summer to the House Roads Committee by Mr. M. D. Jones, Nebraska's chief highway engineer, shows the surface only has been scratched in properly improving Nebraska's important farm-to-market roads. In Nebraska some 10,000 miles of roads are eligible for the Federal-aid secondary highway system, which includes the principal farm-to-market roads. So far only some 3,400 miles have been included in that system. More than 6,600 miles of eligible roads are still left out in the cold. Beyond that secondary Federal-aid system, which is miserably far from completion, there are the other thousands of miles of local roads in Nebraska likewise waiting for some measure of highway improvement. That plight is shared by all States.

In the process of adopting a Federal highway-aid bill, probably a number of changes will be made. I very strongly recommend one important change.

The present bill, H. R. 4915, places unlimited authority over the funds designated for local roads in the hands of the State highway departments. That shuts the door on hundreds of fine county highway building agencies.

In the days of trial ahead we must utilize all resources to obtain the widest possible spread of employment. All capable agencies must participate in our over-all post-war program if we are to have the employment and the prosperity everybody wants. Certainly our post-war highway program will be more quickly and evenly gotten under way and carried on if we make it possible for capable county highway departments to assume a full measure of responsibility in planning and constructing the local roads under their jurisdiction.

I believe it is somewhat unfair to place an additional burden of local road improvement on State highway departments, which already have a job of tremendous proportions in building and maintaining the main State highway systems. So, in shaping final Federal-aid legislation, I urge that the resources and personnel of county highway agencies be utilized to the fullest possible extent.

Since our local roads have never been adequate, the neglect brought about by the war has reduced them to a condition requiring bold treatment. The problem is national. The Nation cannot have adequate highway transportation until thousands of miles of farm-to-market roads are lifted well beyond the mud and dust stage. It is high time progressive action be taken on these, our bread-and-butter roads. Extending Federal aid on a reasonably large scale to farm-to-market roads is a necessary step in the Nation's program to obtain a future of prosperity for all.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

Hon. DONALD M. NELSON,
Chairman, War Production Board,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. NELSON: Your order M-2-b, issued on July 15, 1944, has caused us great concern as to the future of magnesium, and I am writing this—an open letter—in the hope that I may convince you that the public interest demands the immediate lifting of all controls from all forms of magnesium and its alloys. If the present controls continue, it will not only be difficult to take up any slack in employment, but also there will be greater difficulty in realizing the industry's potentialities after the war in the way of production and employment.

The facts are very simple and almost speak for themselves. When the war opened, the Dow Chemical Co. was the sole American producer of magnesium and had been for some years, for the reason that no other company cared to take the risks and the losses of carrying on an industry which, although not new, was undeveloped. It is not necessary for me here to repeat the efforts of the Dow Chemical Co. to interest the Government in expanding an industry which we in our company believed would be vital, both in war and in peace. The Government eventually, through the Defense Plant Corporation, expanded the industry from the 18,000,000 pounds a year which Dow was producing early in 1941 to a rated capacity in excess of 600,000,000 pounds a year.

Recently the War Production Board made a series of cut-backs reducing the production to approximately 300,000,000 pounds a year. We are not informed concerning the reasons which motivated the selection of concerns to be cut back, but apparently the selection was influenced more by manpower than by costs of production. There is already a large stock pile—running somewhere in the neighborhood of 100,000,000 pounds. If the present rates of production be maintained, a stock pile of stupendous proportions may be accumulated. If, on the other hand, production be cut to consumption or below, the industry will be on a skeleton basis. In either case we are threatened with the possible destruction of a vast potential industry.

As matters now stand, the industry is entirely capable of supplying all possible needs of the Government, either for domestic use or for export, and the stock pile is of such proportions as to give ample insurance against any kind of shortage. Therefore, as far as the needs of war are concerned, there is no longer any reason to keep the magnesium industry under any form of control or allocation.

The order M-2-b to which I have referred above has been represented to the public as removing controls over magnesium. That is not true. The order M-2-b, while it modifies certain controls over magnesium products, leaves the industry in essential respects under the same control as it was before. Ingot magnesium is still under allocation.

The uses of magnesium in the war have been impressive. The metal has proven itself. But as yet there has not been the opportunity to promote the peacetime use of the metal. The Nation has, I believe, a great industry in the making, and if the industry now had the opportunity, it could go ahead developing markets for peacetime consumption and in so doing would be developing opportunities for the employment of our boys, as and when they return to civilian life. Every day that the Government now delays in freeing the industry means a greater delay later on in providing employment.

The case is clear, and I would respectfully suggest that it is the plain duty of the War Production Board to remove at once all controls from the industry and to permit it to function as a private industry. Such a course would save the people money, because the Government could buy magnesium on a competitive basis. Also, and of greater ultimate significance, there would be the opportunity for the industry to get on a self-sustaining basis and be ready to meet both the opportunities and the responsibilities of the peace. If this Nation is to continue to have a magnesium industry, it will at some time have to be allowed to stand on its own feet. The time, I submit, is now.

Very truly yours,

WILLARD H. DOW,
President.

Address of Hon. Joe R. Hanley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address of the Lieutenant Governor of New York, the Honorable Joe R. Hanley, before the New York Republican State Committee at Albany, N. Y., on Tuesday, August 8, 1944.

The address is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the State committee of the Republican Party of the State of New York, the rising tide of republicanism in the Nation, presaged first by our great victory in the State of New York 2 years ago, leads to inevitable victory at the polls on November 7.

For 12 years now, the Republicans of the Nation have been in the minority. But there is in resurgence now the fundamental and good grain of sound republicanism throughout the Nation. We have seen it function in the State. We have been tempered by the trials and tribulations that have affected the party. We have been made strong through the experience that we and our Nation have undergone in past recent years.

Our opponents have resorted to defamation of the high standards and good works that have been accomplished by the Republican Party in the State of New York. This is a desperate attempt by a weakened, worn-out and degenerate political machine to fend off the conclusion that will be sealed on November 7.

Among these baseless attacks, fostered by well-financed political organizations through false press releases and widely distributed pamphlets, has been the one on the 1944 war ballot law of the State of New York.

I have been a soldier in two of the wars in which my country has been engaged. To the best of my ability and energy I have been active in veterans' organizations. My two sons are presently serving in the armed forces of the United States. I believe I am qualified to give the picture as I see it concerning this very important issue.

As American, every Republican is anxious that every soldier and sailor who wishes to vote will have the right and the facilities for exercising that vote. As Republicans, we are doubly anxious that that right and the exercise of that right be fully effective and untrammeled. We know that our soldiers and sailors, like their friends, relatives, sweethearts, and wives at home, are feeling the critical need of our Nation for having a rededication to sound and constitutional Government. This, they know, can only come from a Republican victory on November 7.

Under the great leadership of our Governor, the Presidential candidate of the Republican Party, the Honorable Thomas E. Dewey, the legislature, with the Governor's approval, has enacted a model soldier vote law—one that meticulously complies with every constitutional requirement and yet is instinct with a liberalism and a profound recognition of the sacred character of the right to vote of our brave soldiers and sailors.

Let me give you a bit of history. In 1917, the State of New York was one of 17 States having a soldier vote law. That was under a Republican administration. Then, it was one of the most liberal and efficient soldier vote laws among the States. Then, as now, our State constitution required that—and I quote: "Every citizen * * * shall be entitled to vote * * * for all officers that are or hereafter may be elective by the people."

Accordingly the soldier war ballot of World War No. 1 was a full ballot.

This 1917 law provided for the polling of ballots at Army camps—as much like civilian voting as was feasible under war conditions. It was upon this law that the 1942 and 1943 war ballot laws of this State were patterned. The experience of World War No. 1, the machinery that was then used successfully, and the legislation were all utilized.

The operation of the laws of 1942 and 1943 were disappointing. They were disappointing because the Federal authorities told us that the machinery was too cumbersome, that the papers and documents to be shipped and reshipped were too bulky and were displacing vital matériel of war. They told us that their function was primarily to conduct the war and only secondarily to facilitate the election.

In 1944 we had the benefit of specific advice by the military authorities. We had the benefit, too, of the recommendations of the Congress of the United States incorporated into what was to become Public Law 277, the Federal war-ballot law.

Now, heed me well. Wherever possible, under our State constitution, we followed that advice and those recommendations. We followed them in detail. Sometimes we even exceeded the suggestions that were made, where that was possible.

At the request of the Army, we dispensed with polling machinery in Army camps at home or abroad. We provided in our law as Congress recommended—that the post card which, under Federal law, must be distributed by the Army and Navy to all servicemen would be accepted as an application for a State war ballot. In fact, the application required by our law is far simpler than that provided by title 2 of the Federal law. Thirdly, we followed the recommendation that the applications should be received by the War Ballot Commission for prompt transmittal to local election officials. Fourthly, we followed the recommendation that the local officials should assume the burden of mailing the ballots. Fifthly, we followed the recommendation that the State ballot envelopes be distinctly marked. Sixthly, we followed the recommendation that at least 45 days be permitted for mailing and collecting the State ballots prior to the election. In fact, we allow up to 57 days for this purpose. We followed explicitly the suggestions and requirements as to the weight and size of ballots and the enclosing envelopes.

There are two things that, because of our State constitution, we have required. I do not mention those requirements apologetically for they stand for fundamental principles imbedded in our Constitution—the people's Constitution. But apart from argument or debate, the fact is that our Constitution had certain requirements and we followed them. Would any one dare say that we should have violated our Constitution? Would any one have expected us to? If so, the pass to which this Nation has come is sad indeed.

Those two requirements are as follows: (1) That our ballot must be full in the sense that every office that is elective must be covered by that ballot. (2) That the waiving of the necessity to be personally present in one's election district on election day is confined to our soldiers and sailors. Here is what our Constitution says on that subject. It says, and I quote:

"Provided however that in time of war no elector in the actual military service of the State, or of the United States, in the army or navy thereof, shall be deprived of his or her vote by reason of his or her absence from such election district."

That language is plain and clear. There is no room for so-called "interpretation." The military voter must be in the Army or Navy of the United States. As much as we would like, its meaning cannot be stretched to include life-risking members of the merchant marine, those fine people who share many of the hazards of battle—the members of the American Red Cross, those good Samaritans—the Quakers, the civilian employees of the U. S. O., or those brave women in the Women's Auxiliary Service Forces.

Let us see how this law of ours works and will actually work during this crucial year of 1944. The Federal Government, mandated by the Congress, must distribute to every soldier and sailor a post-card form. The soldier gets this card without request, without any action on his part. That post card, when filled out, signed, and mailed becomes automatically an application for a State war ballot. This is the only act that the soldier must perform in order to complete all the requirements before actually making out his ballot. All the other things to which I shall refer are acts to be done by agencies at home. In response to such applications received before September 1, a war ballot must be sent to every eligible applicant on or before September 7. These ballots, I repeat, are not to be sent on September 7 or thereafter, but before September 7. Applications arriving after September 1 will be responded to with ballots as fast as they are received, as long as there is sufficient time to return them before election day.

The ballot which the voter will receive will contain every office to be voted for in the voter's district, from the high office of President of the United States down to the humbliest local office. It will contain the name of every eligible candidate for each of these offices. All the soldier need do is mark with a cross the box next to the name of the candidate for whom he wishes to vote. It will take him no longer to do that than it would for a civilian at home to vote a paper ballot. The ballot he will receive will contain the names of the candidates for the particular congressional, State, senatorial, and assembly districts in which he is entitled to vote. He will not have to consult any bulletin boards, catalogs, or encyclopedias to ascertain the districts in which he is entitled to vote or the names of the candidates for which he may vote. His right to vote for every office is fully and conveniently preserved.

On the other hand, let us look at the Federal supplementary ballot. It is a shorter ballot, but is it a simpler ballot? It contains six blank spaces—a blank space for the candidate for President and Vice President of the United States, for United States Senator, for Congressman from the district in which the soldier resides, and for two Congressmen at Large. There are no names of candidates on that ballot. Our soldier voters—and many of them now will be at the actual battle front—will have to write in the names of candidates for President and Vice President for which they wish to vote. The names of those candidates the men will know, but the hazards of misspelling, errors in first names and initials, are apt to be great. Will he know his candidate for United States Senator? Most will not; to learn that he will have to consult literature which will embrace the 48 States. After he has spent the time necessary to ascertain the name of his candidate for United States Senator, he will then need to know his congressional district. We all know that the ordinary person, especially from the larger cities, does not know his congressional district. Therefore, the first thing the voter will have to do is to ascertain his proper district. He will then have to ascertain the name of the candidate.

When he comes to the offices of Congressmen at Large his problem will be complicated even more, for there he will have to ascertain whether one or two or no Congressman at Large is being elected in his State. After he ascertains that fact, if he can, he will have to learn the names of the candidates. How many of our soldiers and sailors will take the time in the midst of battle exhaustion to ascertain these facts? Is there any doubt that a soldier voter who conscientiously tries to vote for all of the Federal offices under that ballot may have to spend hours at this task, and then he will not know whether his labors have yielded a result free from error which will not jeopardize his ballot. When he is finished, as I have indicated before, he will not have voted for any of the other very important State offices.

We believe that in the days to come, the strength and soundness of our State and local government can do more than any other factor to prevent our entire American system from degenerating into something else and into something hateful.

There are other reasons why our soldier ballot is the only possible ballot of which we now know that can fulfill the guaranty to every citizen given by our Constitution. Any other system ambraces two most dangerous hazards. One is that it would place in certain public officers the power to choose which offices with regard to which the voter will be entitled to exercise his franchise. This is a very dangerous power indeed. Secondly, any other course will throw our elections—national, State, and local—so far as the ballots of this State are concerned, into the courts. There, by reason of legal disabilities, the people's will may be frustrated and, in any event, the result kept in doubt for a long period of time.

As a former soldier, as a father of soldiers, and as one experienced in public office, I am very proud indeed of this war-ballot law. It is a model of simplicity.

But our task, and particularly your task, is not ended in expressing pride in this war-ballot law. We have a greater and more important task before us. Each one of us, as good Americans and as good Republicans, must see that every soldier and sailor who is eligible to vote in this State exercises that franchise on November 7. We know and believe that our soldiers and sailors are no different than the Americans at home. They, too, are seeking a Republican victory—not for partisan reasons, but for the recovery and reconstitution of the American Government. Every party worker, like every other American, must apply himslf to the task of bringing the franchise to the soldier—the franchise that will make our victory on November 7 universal.

The Fourth-Term Nomination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under date of July 13, 1944, W. K. Kelsey, an eminent and fearless commentator of the Detroit News, expresses his views about President Roosevelt's acceptance of the fourth-term nomination, and I am constrained for the benefit of my colleagues because of the fairness and the clear reasoning of the writer to insert in the RECORD the commentator's remarks, which he captions "The Sense of Duty."

I am certain that anyone who is fair and understands the humankind will agree that the commentator has made a correct analysis which many of us perhaps have improperly appraised. I feel that his searching and sound analysis deserves preservation in the RECORD:

THE COMMENTATOR

(By W. K. Kelsey)

THE SENSE OF DUTY

The manner of President Roosevelt's acceptance of a fourth nomination—for that is what his statement meant, although the nomination has not yet been accorded—was admirable in its straightforwardness. In response to Chairman Hannegan's letter saying that a majority of the delegates favor his renomination, he might have remained coyly silent. Or he might have replied, "Well, let 'em," keeping his acceptance in partial doubt.

Instead, he spoke what was in his mind. Called on to accept for another term the responsibility of the world's hardest job, he said he would remain on it, if that should be the people's will.

Some people may smile and shake their heads, declaring that Mr. Roosevelt is so enamored of authority that he would like to be President in perpetuity. The commentator disagrees. He is somewhat younger than the President, and, so far as he knows, in good health. Yet he has reached the age when even his comparatively slight responsibilities often weight on him so heavily that he would gladly retire to a wilderness, and live on locusts and wild honey, if any were available without effort. How much greater must, at times, be the President's weariness.

But, one may say, Mr. Roosevelt thinks constantly of his position in history.

Of course he does; and so does any man who occupies high office. But Mr. Roosevelt has already made his place in history. He could retire today with that place securely fixed. He has been the greatest modern leader of the attempt to make the United States a more democratic country, with less distance between the extremes of wealth and poverty, of power and impotence, of knowledge and ignorance. He has maintained the government of the Constitution in two great crises testing its very existence—the crisis of depression and the crisis of war. His is a record of patience and moderation equal to Lincoln's, and Lincolnian has been his faith in the people. History will write, as contemporaries close to the scene are already testifying, that he saw the war catastrophe coming, that he did his utmost to arouse the people to a sense of danger, while at the same time he sought to avert, or postpone, the approaching peril. Is his "quarantine" speech of 1937 forgotten, or his forecast of the use of air power? We scoffed at the time, many of us.

THE VERDICT OF HISTORY

President Roosevelt could retire today, and stand in history with Washington and Lincoln. He can continue in office and risk that sometime in the next 4 years he will suffer a failing of his powers, so that he will make mistakes that will alter history's judgment.

Consider how high the estimate of Woodrow Wilson would be today, if he could have laid down his office on November 11, 1918! Yet only 2 years later his own party was giving him but the feeblest of lip-service.

Nearly a quarter century has passed, and his place in our historic record is still far below what it some day will be, when we can view it in the same perspective with which we view the lamentable failures of Jefferson's second administration. Those failures have been largely forgotten in our admiration of Jefferson the man.

So will Woodrow Wilson's failures be, when they have been overcome by recognition of his magnificent idealism, his heroic effort to bring this country into active cooperation with others to solve the world's problems. It was not Wilson who failed; it was we who failed him. That is the fact which is so hard for us to swallow, so that we prefer to blame him, rather than ourselves.

President Roosevelt, renominated and reelected, faces the same perils that President Wilson faced—and he knows it. He can lead the Nation to victory in war; but can he lead it to victory in peace? Every man of high honor guards his reputation as his most precious asset; indeed, as the sum total of his wealth. To lose it, either through his own error or through his neighbors' misunderstanding, is the supreme calamity.

Franklin Roosevelt assumes that risk, not gladly, but in the course of duty. If the people wish him to continue in office, he will face future vicissitudes as he has faced those of the past. Few statements have been issued by men in public life nobler than the President's acceptance of further service to his country, if it demands that he serve.

LONELY DECISION

A man of great integrity and a high sense of his duty may frequently face a problem which he feels he must solve alone. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt knew of her husband's decision only when she was informed of it by reporters. She testified thus:

"The President doesn't discuss these things with me. Many people think that he does, but most often the first I know of some decision is when I see it in the papers."

There is the incontrovertible proof of Mr. Roosevelt's sincerity when he said that "if the people command me to continue in this office and in this war, I have as little right to withdraw as the soldier has to leave his post in the line."

Having decided as to his duty, the President saw no need of discussing it with his wife. Whatever the consequences of the decision, she would have to accept them. Of course, the President knows that Mrs. Roosevelt, too, is a good soldier, who would accept his considered judgment without question or quiver. Fortunate, indeed, is the man who possesses such an understanding, high-principled mate.

Must Extend Old-Age Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article, entitled "Must Extend Old-Age Pay," by Warren Carberg, which appeared in the Boston (Mass.) Sunday Post, August 13, 1944:

MUST EXTEND OLD-AGE PAY—WAR CONDITIONS TURN UP LOOPHOLES IN SOCIAL SECURITY—MANY MORE SHOULD BE BROUGHT WITHIN CODE

(By Warren Carberg)

The war has brought home to the American people the undeniable fact that the Social Security Act must be quickly and drastically expanded to provide insurance against want for all.

Out in the cold under the present set-up are the millions in the armed services, the thousands who left their regular peacetime jobs to accept work in Government shipyards and in arsenals, the great army that went into agricultural work, the self-employed small businessman, those in domestic service, and the others who work for State, Federal, or municipal governments.

John F. Hardy, regional director of social security in New England, one of the most progressive thinkers in the country on social security expansion, told Legionnaires at their department convention just closed in Boston that the veterans' G. I. bill failed to include provisions to protect the social-security rights of veterans under the old-age and survivors' insurance program of the Social Security Board.

Unless action is taken, he pointed out, the social-security protection of servicemen will be reduced, and some will lose it entirely. There will be a loss of thousands of dollars in insurance rights in the case of those who are killed in action or who die after they have been demobilized and before they have built up their rights again.

In such cases, he said, widows and other dependents may find themselves with no claim at all to old-age and survivors' insurance benefits. The loss will be particularly serious in the case of those who die from causes not connected with their military service. Under existing laws the families of such men may get neither veterans' nor social-security benefits.

Senator WAGNER recently introduced a bill in the Senate to correct this unfair situation, and the bill is still pending.

In commenting on the bill, Mr. Hardy said that it would not only preserve the social-security rights which service men and women had earned prior to induction, but they would build up their rights in the same way as those now in civilian employment. The bill has the endorsement of all veterans' organizations.

"In the last analysis," Mr. Harry said, "veterans' legislation as such cannot guarantee the heroes of this war the security and opportunity for which they are willing to give their lives, for the security of the veteran depends on the prosperity of the whole Nation.

"We cannot help but realize," he said, "that though an individual's rights must be defended, no individual can stand alone. All of us have responsibilities to each other and to the community, which we must fulfill if we are to survive as a nation. It is not enough that we provide protection to the veteran. We must provide adequate social-security protection to his family as well."

FIVE MAJOR HAZARDS

Another bill now in Congress is known as the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill for social security. It is designed to provide for the wives and children of the veterans, and for the millions of other persons in our country, insurance protection against the five major hazards of life—unemployment, sickness, disability, old age, and death.

The bill is not a featherbed for the indolent but rather a safeguard for our system of free enterprise, which cannot function properly if large portions of the population are without income.

"The welfare of the veterans is the welfare of the Nation," said Mr. Hardy. "Though this G. I. bill of rights protects him during the transition period back to civilian life, his well-being in the long view must rest with the kind of country we build for him and for all of us, as well as the kind of relations we establish with the other nations of the world. Social security can help make the earth a truly civilized planet and should guarantee a full measure of security to the veterans' security not only after the war, but security against all future wars."

Paradoxically enought, those thousands of men and women who were motivated by patriotism to leave secure and easy civilian tasks for rough and strenuous toil in Government owned shipyards and arsenals are similarly out of luck unless the Government enacts legislation to correct present social-security evils.

Under Federal law they are compelled to turn over 5 percent of their pay, although there is small chance to benefit, since, in order to do this, they must be under civil service for a period of 5 years in order to collect.

The President, who was instrumental in fathering social security, has already recommended that legislation be passed to overcome these shortcomings which, in the light of wartime conditions, loom so prominently on our social background. Both the Republican and the Democratic platforms urge the expansion of social security. There is every hope that the plan, if amended to take in all American adults, will prove to be a prime factor in the success of our post-war transition period.

The Wagner bill would make it possible for a couple over 65 to receive a maximum of $120 monthly instead of the present $85. More than 600,000 eligible men and women past 65 have jobs now, primarily, because of wartime opportunities.

SHOULD TAKE CARE OF DISABLED

They may claim their benefits whenever they stop work. Many other men and women, past the age of 65, who have received benefits, have given them up temporarily in order to take jobs. Apparently these figures indicate that Americans prefer a job to retirement income when there is a job and they are able to work.

There is general agreement among almost everyone that social security should take care of the man or woman who becomes disabled or sick and who is compelled to stop working.

Under present provisions the worker ceases to develop a wage record and the payments are steadily reduced so that at the age of 65 there would be virtually nothing left. This gaping hole in the provisions of the law is just one more instance of how inadequate it is in its present form.

Down in one of the old Chandler buildings, erected originally by the Coca-Cola king in Baltimore, some 76,000,000 wage records of those covered by social security are on file. I am told that they have tabulating machines there that make the new lightning calculator at Harvard mere child's play.

They have such amazing machines in that vast building that, given your correct name and social-security number, they can find your wage records in a minute and a half.

A few days ago the Social Security Board put into effect its one millionth monthly benefit under the Federal family-insurance system, better known as the old-age and survivor's insurance.

The millionth benefit check, amounting to $58.49, was presented to Mary Rex Thompson, 33-year-old widowed wife of a Cleveland war worker, on behalf of herself and her two children, Dale Bernice, 4, and Jerald Robert, 1.

These benefits will continue for 17 years, until the youngest child is 18, and unless Mrs. Thompson remarries, the payments will be resumed after she reaches the age of 65.

Altogether, the payments on the social-security account of her husband, John Robert Thompson, may total $15,000. Thompson paid $145 in taxes over a period of 7½ years prior to his death and his employer paid a similar amount.

GIVEN WIDE PUBLICITY

The payment was given wide publicity, principally in order to acquaint widows with the benefits they are entitled to under social security. Many of them lose considerable money because they wait too long before filing their claims. The retroactive clause on such claims go back only three months. Thus, if a widow waits a year before filing, she loses nine months of benefit payments.

In Massachusetts about 50,000 claims have already been settled totaling benefits of about $1,000,000 monthly. Of the 1,000,000 beneficiaries already receiving payments approximately 400,000 or 40 percent are retired male workers; 600,000 or 60 percent are women and children. This program of Federal family insurance, even in its infancy, is beginning to serve its real purpose: to prevent destitution and to provide a basic minimum subsistence for American families in which the breadwinner dies or stops work because of old age. It supplements other resources such as life insurance or savings.

In the last annual report the Social Security Board also recommended that because of the wartime situation it is particularly urgent that coverage be extended to farm workers, to domestic workers in private homes, employees of nonprofit organizations, and self-employed persons.

"The high levels of current employment and earnings," the report stated, "would now make it possible for many workers to pay contributions and thus gain insurance rights which they may not be able to acquire in future years, in particular the older workers who may be in need of the retirement provision when the war ends and younger men return to civilian life.

"Extension of coverage would not entail serious administrative difficulties. For appropriate groups it might be appropriate to use a stamp system, under which employers purchase stamps at post offices or from rural mail carriers to place in a book which evidences the contributions made by workers and employers.

"Extension of the basic protection of old-age and survivors' insurance to public employees—Federal, State, and local—would also be feasible and would round out insurance protection of survivors, now lacking, to nearly all these employees, and provision for old-age retirement, now unavailable to many, and would assure continuity of rights. Extension should be made in such a way as not to endanger any rights of these workers under existing special systems and to increase, not lessen, the total insurance available to them.

"An immediate problem related to coverage arises from the situation of the millions of persons now in the armed forces. Because of the eligibility provisions and the methods of computing benefits under the program, the insurance protection which service men and women may have acquired before their induction will be partly or wholly used up, and the amount of potential benefits payable to them or to their survivors will be diminished." Men and women in the service are protected against death while in the service, or after from service-connected causes. After discharge, however, many veterans will be without this protection in the event of death from non-service-connected causes.

Firemen Boo Down Speech Assailing Governor Dewey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, one of my very close friends, George Roesch, of 341 Brooks Avenue,

Rochester, N. Y., who was conspicuously identified with the New York State Volunteer Firemen's Association sent me a clipping appearing in the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle, August 16, 1944, entitled "Firemen Boo Down Speech Assailing Governor Dewey." Mr. Speaker, volunteer firemen's associations and volunteer firemen throughout the country are nonpartisan organizations. They render a great service to the community in which their organization exists; in fact, no community can get along without a volunteer fire company, and the services that they render cannot be computed on a cold, hard basis of dollars and cents.

The reason my friend, George Roesch, sent me this clipping was to emphasize the fact that people today are thoroughly disgusted with the old-time repulsive smear campaigns and they will resent any unjust criticism that will in any way approximate the assassination of character, regardless of the occasion. The article is as follows:

FIREMEN BOO DOWN SPEECH ASSAILING GOVERNOR DEWEY

(By Joseph R. Malone)

Henry Epstein, who was State solicitor general under Governor Lehman, picked the wrong place to make a partisan political speech last night.

Billed with Lt. Gov. Joe R. Hanley, of Perry, as guest speaker at the convention dinner of the New York State Firemen's Association at the Hotel Seneca, he was booed down when he launched into a lengthy prepared address bitterly critical of Governor Dewey.

Epstein, solicitor general from 1933 to 1943, and Democratic candidate for attorney general in 1942, waded into his speech in an increasingly hostile atmosphere after it became apparent to the crowd that he chose to ignore the suggestion of Gordon A. Howe, toastmaster and Greece supervisor, that speeches be brief and nonpartisan.

HANLEY STEALS SHOW

In an uproar of booing and amid shouts of "We want Dewey," Epstein abandoned his set speech entirely and wound up by reciting doggerel verse picturing the Governor as an inept young man with diaper trouble, unable to make up his mind or come to a decision. The booing rose to a crescendo as he sat down.

Hanley, following Epstein, quickly stole the show by making an old-fashioned riproaring Americanism speech, devoid of rancor or partisanism, such as Hanley well knows how to make. The Lieutenant Governor's appeals to the audience's patriotism won hearty applause from a dinner crowd of 1,000 perspiring men and women packed into the banquet room and adjoining hall.

Epstein quoting Republican Governor Wills, of Vermont, described the Republican 1944 goal as bringing government back to the village pump, which gave Hanley opportunity to retort:

OFFERS PRINCIPLE

"Henry talked of a garden hose and village pump. If he had lived up where I do in the country, he'd think they were pretty good things to have around. We know how to use them but down in New York, they don't."

Hanley said there were differences of opinion and he hoped the time never would come in America when they weren't expressible. American citizens, he declared, must be alert to preserve their constitutional rights and privileges. Hanley offered as his principle:

"I'm for America first and for international cooperation afterward."

"In this campaign," he said, "we must make sure of one thing, whether we are Democrats, Republicans, Socialists, American Labor, one creed or another, one race or another: We must all make sure that when our boys come home they find a free America waiting for them."

American troops, he said, are accomplishing the impossible all over the world. At home, Americans are making sacrifices, Hanley declared, but every constitutional liberty given up for victory must be restored, he held, when the war is over.

"Give America the facts," he said "leave the avenues of information open and she'll do the right thing and she'll elect the right kind of man."

Speechmaking began at 9 and Howe warned it must be over by 9:30 so a floor show could go on. Epstein, first speaker, said he was fully aware the firemen's association was nonpartisan and nonpolitical. But he paved the way for his speech by saying:

"Representatives of both political parties are here and you won't take it amiss if I discuss some of the issues before the people from an international viewpoint."

CROWD PATIENT AT FIRST

The crowd was patient while he arraigned the Hoover administration for taking no action when Japan seized Manchuria, declared the Republicans proposed cuts in naval appropriations when Hitler was rising and Mussolini's "pugnacity was rampant." But the booing began when he declared Dewey ridiculed Roosevelt's "clarion call for a program of 50,000 planes a year and a revitalized Army and Navy," and it continued to grow in power when he held Dewey has yet to express himself "on the isolationist pratings of NYE, BROOKS, CLARE HOFFMAN, and the like."

"You've got to expect those things," Epstein remarked philosophically following the meeting. Epstein managed to complete 3 pages of a 7½-page manuscript.

PORTRAIT PRESENTED

Guests at the speakers' table other than Firemen's Association officials included Thomas E. Broderick and Roy F. Bust, Republican and Democratic county chairmen; Mayor Dicker; George F. Rogers, Democratic candidate for Congress; and Public Safety Commissioner Tom C. Woods.

Leon H. Ingersoll, of Cincinnatus, retired president of the association, was presented a large framed portrait of himself, with Henry W. Sprague, of West Webster, making the presentation. Albert J. Foley, of Dunkirk, will succeed Ingersoll as president today.

Disposal of Surplus Property

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the greatest merchandising job in the world is covered by this bill which handles close to $100,000,000,000 of surplus war property. Unless the surpluses are handled intelligently, we could have a grave upset in our national economy. The selling of this property could seriously interfere with private employment and business. It is urgent that some action be taken at once which will set up the machinery and outline a blueprint with certain guide posts, which, when put into operation, would do the best job.

Industry and labor have mastered a great production job. It will have as tremendous a job when it comes to disposing of surplus property, plants, and equipment.

In the past year some 40 bills have been introduced into Congress which contain certain plans for the distribution of this war goods and equipment.

Just how well Congress handles this post-war headache will depend upon the law we pass and its administration. It will depend on how much of a reaction is produced in this country and I mean by reaction, how much unemployment and disrupting of the civilian economy will be caused by the disposal of this surplus equipment.

There are many people and groups now writing to Congressmen who are concerned about the problem. There are some who think they may be able to purchase a jeep, a truck, typewriter, and other equipment for a few cents on the dollar. There will be some individuals who would like to buy a complete manufacturing plant for a song. I believe it is the duty of this Congress to set up the machinery which will prevent anyone stealing from Uncle Sam.

Within a few blocks of this Capitol there is a surplus supply depot. I personally visited this plant several times. I am satisfied that the equipment coming to this surplus depot is not being disposed of in a manner which is to the best interest of this country.

The disposal of surplus materials is not a job for boondogglers or amateurs. There must be careful planning, scientific marketing, economic controls with advertising and selling by every known method.

I have listened to the debate in Congress on how this job should be done. I am about convinced that the job should not be left to any one administrator who would have unlimited powers. It is too big a job for any one man. It is more responsibility than any good man should have, and certainly more than any poor administrator should be given. I believe it can best be handled by giving the administrator a board made up of experts who have the knowledge and background of advertising, engineering, and of selling. It is quite possible that all the surplus land should be funneled through the Department of Interior. The United States now owns much land under the direction of this department.

There would, of course, be rigid controls set up by an administrator and a properly organized board or commission. It will certainly take men with knowledge and courage to contribute everything they have in this great program of beating swords back into plow shares if we are to keep the wheels of industry from stripping gears. The commission should be appointed by the President and approved by the Senate. The commission should report to Congress at frequent intervals.

The legislation we are considering today is important because of the magnitude of the anticipated surplus and the effect it will have on post-war recovery. This legislation is important to the American worker and the returning soldier. It is important if we expect to give men jobs. It is important if we are to have a prosperous and growing post-war America. America has grown great because it was built upon a system of free enterprise. If we are to continue to grow, labor and business must move forward with full production and full employment. Labor and business should be watchful to preserve the principles of free enterprise.

Yes; this is a big merchandising job. It should be handled by businessmen familiar with the property to be handled. It should be handled through the regular channels of business. It should be handled by men who have learned the cold, hard way. It is too big a job for one man. Let us have a commission. Let us avoid the mistakes made in the last World War.

Surplus War Property

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LA VERN R. DILWEG

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. DILWEG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial on surplus war property, which was published in the Washington Post.

I am in full accord with the opinion expressed by this great newspaper. It is my firm belief that no single individual should be given the tremendous discretionary powers granted in the House bill. I believe that due consideration should be given the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. POULSON], which amendment is printed in the RECORD on page 7003.

A select board of seven, instead of a one-man control should be better qualified to formulate surplus disposal policies within the framework of the broad statement of objectives contained in the House bill.

The editorial follows:

SURPLUS WAR PROPERTY

The bill on surplus-property disposal now being considered by the House vests tremendous discretionary power in the hands of the proposed Surplus Property Administrator. It may be taken for granted that hard and fast rules cannot be laid down for the disposal of surplus property running into billions of dollars, and consisting of a vast variety of articles from shoes, clothes, and drugs to farm lands and huge manufacturing plants. It is doubtful, however, whether Congress ought to empower a single administrative official to formulate surplus disposal policies within the framework of the broad statement of objectives contained in the House bill, referred to by one critic as "pious words." However honest and efficient the official entrusted with this tremendous task may be, Congress should not shift to his shoulders responsibilities for making important policy decisions that might vitally affect the post-war economy. Admittedly it is difficult to lay down specific directions for the guidance of a surplus-property administrator without impairing his efficiency. Nevertheless, the difficulty of the task does not excuse a failure to tackle it.

The method of dealing with the disposal of war plants provides an outstanding instance of the inadequacies of the safeguards thrown about the exercise of power by the proposed administrator. It is estimated that the Government has invested more than $15,000,000,000 dollars in manufacturing plants and other productive facilities. Congress quite rightly does not wish to assume direct responsibility for the disposal of these plants. For if Congress were to retain a veto power over sale of war plants every Member of Congress would be in hot water with his constituents, and the whole disposal question would inevitably become a football of politics. While steering clear of political complications, Congress could and should maintain supervision over the disposal of Government-owned plants to a much greater extent than contemplated. To be sure, restrictions are placed upon the sale of synthetic rubber and aluminum plants, which have cost the Government $5,000,000 or more each. The bill also seeks to avoid violations of the antitrust laws in disposing of plants. However, the problem of disposal is much broader than indicated; it is not limited to the two industries singled out, nor to the avoidance of monopolistic trends. In disposing of agricultural lands the Administrator is also given a virtually free hand, with the proviso that, to the extent feasible, former owners of surplus real property acquired by the Government shall be given an opportunity to reacquire it.

No doubt it is desirable to put on the statute books legislation dealing with surplus property as soon as possible. But the hurry is not so great as to preclude taking time to tighten up some of the loose provisions of the House measure. For after all we already have a Surplus Property Administrator whose office was created by Executive order. He is prepared to carry on until the statutory agency is set up, and in all probability he will continue in office thereafter.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER A. RAMEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from today's edition of the Washington Times-Herald by Mr. Frank C. Waldrop:

IRISH NEEDLEPOINT

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

A troublemaking old party by the name of John T. Flynn, whose highly unofficial biography of our peerless leader you may have read under the title of "County Squire in the White House," dropped in yesterday with a wild story to the effect that he opposes a fourth term for our peerless leader because he was convinced against it by the words of several of the Democratic Party's most revered figures, including Woodrow Wilson.

"Look," he said, "I've got it all written down here." Flynn, who is a member of the New York City Board of Higher Education, is always writing things down.

A careful analysis of the evidence he produced does seem to give him a shadow of excuse for saying that the Democrats may have persuaded him to this contrary attitude by what they have had to say in times past against even a third term.

Early in February 1928, said this Flynn, the shadow of Calvin Coolidge still hovered over the coming Republican convention, even though Coolidge had said in August 1927: "I do not choose to run."

Later, in December 1927, he amplified this by saying he meant it and that he expected his party to seek other candidates. But some busy New York politicians were maneuvering to force him to run for a third term. At this point Senator ROBERT LA FOLLETTE (Progressive of Wisconsin) introduced a resolution, which read as finally passed:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States, in retiring from the presidential office after their second term, has become by universal concurrence a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

This resolution was debated at length—not so much because anybody favored a third term but because some Senators felt it a free-handed slap at Mr. Coolidge, unjustified by anything on his part.

And who do you suppose was there leading the fight to keep Coolidge from accepting something he had already declined and hadn't been offered, anyhow?

Well, one was the then minority Democratic leader, Senator Joe Robinson, of Arkansas, who later became F. D. R.'s first Senate majority leader.

Another was the late Senator Pat Harrison (Democrat, of Mississippi), also a party veteran of his day.

And there was that war horse of the New Deal, now honorary chairman of Sidney Hillman's Political Action Committee, former Senator George Norris, of Nebraska.

He not only voted for the resolution but spoke several times for it. Now he is out in his gray hairs, after his long liberal career, whooping up the fourth term for the man who called a great power dam after him.

But who else was there voting against a third term and for a resolution which said that any departure from the time-honored tradition "would be unpatriotic and fraught with peril to our free institutions"?

Who but that brave ALBEN BARKLEY, of Kentucky, who made the nominating speech not for a mere third term but for a fourth term? And, of course, almost all the Democrats voted for the resolution, including Senators MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, GLASS, of Virginia, and others still in the Senate.

But, after all, this opposition to the third term is a historic Democratic Party doctrine, according to Flynn.

Jefferson said: "If some termination to the services of the Chief Executive be not fixed or supplied by practice, his office, normally 4 years, will in fact be for life."

Gen. Andrew Jackson, a special saint in the Roosevelt calendar, said:

"It would seem advisable to limit the services of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either 4 or 6 years."

He repeated this opinion many times in official documents.

When friends of General Grant, urging him for a third term, had revived the question, it was a Democratic Representative, William M. Springer of Illinois in 1875 who offered a resolution after the election worded much like the La Follette resolution. It was adopted by a vote of 234 to 18 and every Democrat in the House voted for it.

Grover Cleveland, a great Democratic President, had sharp things to say about the temptations of long Presidential careers tied to patronage, and the Democratic Presidential candidates of 1896, 1900, and again in 1908, each pledged himself if elected he would not seek even a second term.

In 1912, when Wilson was elected, the party platform contained the following plank:

"We favor a single Presidential term and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection and we pledge our candidate to this principle."

In pursuance of this pledge, the Democratic Senate in 1913 passed a constitutional amendment providing for a single term of 6 years with no reelection. It was passed by a vote of 47 to 23. A year later European upheavals sidetracked the idea, and Wilson got busy preparing to make the war to end war, and so forth.

Needless to say, Flynn hasn't been around to headquarters of the Democratic National Committee with any of this foregoing material, but you are free to take it there if you like.

The Military Factor in Higher Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent heretofore granted, I am including an address delivered by Col. Herman Beukema at Norwich University, Northfield, Vt., on August 6, the occasion being the celebration of the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of Norwich University, an outstanding military collegiate institution of the country.

Not too many people know that Alden Partridge, one-time Superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point, having made up his mind that we never could train a sufficient number of professional soldiers, nor should we, to offer and afford the necessary military defense which the country should have, 125 years ago left West Point to establish what he then called the American Military, Literary, and Scientific Academy, wherein those who were assembled were taught the arts of war and the pursuits of peace on the basis of his contention that no citizen was properly trained unless and until he was trained as a soldier as well as a civilian, prepared to meet any emergency which might confront him or his country.

Alden Partridge, as a man of vision, takes a place alongside Jackson and Jefferson as a nation builder. The institution which he founded has for 125 years observed and respected the traditions he established.

Upon the stone gateway at the entrance to the grounds of Norwich University is placed a tablet bearing the following inscription:

This institution was founded upon the principle that a citizen soldiery is essential to the maintenance of free government. Through a hundred years this principle has been cherished, and the men have here learned that obedience to law is liberty. In the centuries to come let all who enter through this gate be faithful to the past.

This is the Norwich ideal. To a Norwich man it is always an inspiration and a challenge. He loves peace, knows what war costs, and is never a militarist, except when his country calls.

The address of Col. Herman Beukema, professor of economics, government, and history at the United States Military Academy, follows:

Norwich commemorates the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of its founding at the most momentous period in modern history. There have been other days when humanity's eternal struggle to preserve or to advance the cause of human liberty and the dignity of the common man has hung in the balance. There have been days when that struggle was lost, days when serfdom or slavery became the common level of all save the privileged few. But somehow the torch passed on by Miltiades at Marathon, by Aetius at Chalons, left a spark which continued to glow until at last it rekindled the old flame at the dawn of modern history.

Five years ago that white light had again become little more than a pale flicker. A self-styled master race, two master races, in fact—one white and one brown—had ordained a new order, a world of masters and slaves. A little handful of masters and a world of slaves, with even the instruments of the masters' power, the German and Japanese nationals duped into slavery to their concept of the modern state—this was to be the pattern of civilization. The blackest days of ancient Assyria's military despotism threatened to become the normal pattern for humanity. The campaigns under way, we were told, would determine the course of civilization for a thousand years. Let us hope that Hitler's prophecy was right, and that its fulfillment marks not only the destruction of his every hope but of the spiritual soil which gave them birth.

Divine providence and the courage and skill of our fighting men have warded off this latest and most dangerous threat to our liberties. And now that ultimate victory over our enemies is assured, it is time to take stock of our situation, and to discover where and how the danger to our existence as a free people could have become so great in so short a time. It behooves us to learn the real reasons for the losses we have taken—for that oil slick which through the first half of 1942 extended the Atlantic coast from Florida to Newfoundland; for the hopeless situation of our Philippine garrison, finally wiped out after battling for months against impossible odds; for the bloody job that remains to be done. We realize at last that these things need not have happened. We know that this war could have been scotched at the outset. We find the courage to admit as a Nation that the fault is one for which the voter can best find a scapegoat by looking into a mirror. The crisis could have been averted, the causes underneath that crisis could have been destroyed if, at the fateful moment, we had possessed the force to meet our national and international obligations and the will to use that force. We had neither. Our lack of these two vital essentials of safety accurately recorded the concrete desires of the overwhelming majority of our citizenry.

And now we are given another chance. It may well be our last. We have the opportunity to analyze past mistakes and to make sure that, within our lifetime at least, they will not be repeated. In our analysis we can begin with the old rule that the key to any human problem in which the element of force is the final determinant lies in the availability of trained men, properly equipped, ready to meet and overmatch the threat. Whether it be an incipient street riot or the opening guns of what may become a world war, prompt and effective counteraction by trained forces is the one certain means of destroying the danger. It is not beside the point that, as late as May 21, 1938, little Czechoslovakia's partial mobilization put a prompt end to a projected move of the German Army into that state. The Munich Conference had still to come.

In the early days of our national independence, when memories of its cost were still clear, America's leaders entertained no illusions as to the role of force in international affairs. The views of men like Washington, Hamilton, Monroe, and Andrew Jackson are familiar to everyone who has studied American history. Less well known is the stand of Thomas Jefferson, perhaps because his later biographers, emphasizing the humanitarian ideas of the great libertarian, deliberately chose to ignore the iron qualities in the man. Said Jefferson, "that Government must prove the strongest on earth where every man * * * would meet invasions of the public order as his own personal concern." Those words were written in a day when our hard-won independence was far from secure.

Jefferson was specific as to the measures to be employed in creating and maintaining the core of a sound defense. Writing to Monroe in 1813, he stated, "We must make military instruction a regular part of collegiate education. We can never be safe till this is done." The following year, in outlining a national system of education, he included military and naval architecture among the subjects to be taught in professional schools, and recommended general military training for the younger students as a form of recreation. The mass of the Nation's youth, under his scheme, would have received enough instruction in the use of arms and the routine of military drill to make their transition into soldiers a relatively simple matter in the event of a national emergency. And the intellectual elite were to receive the more advanced and technical instruction necessary to fit them for service as officers in the event of war. The essence of this modest program of national insurance was its emphasis on a limited degree of military competence for all able-bodied men (a reminder of the Anglo-Saxon fyrd of King Alfred's day) and an elite corps of trained leaders.

Unhappily such wisdom and foresight was lost on a people to whom a soldier had become a symbol of the tyranny from which they had fled when they sought asylum in the new world. The views of the electorate were properly expressed in that gem of legislation passed by Congress in June 1784, 9 months after the signing of the Peace of Paris. It declared: "Standing armies in time of peace are inconsistent with the principles of republican governments, dangerous to the liberties of a free people, and generally converted into destructive engines for establishing despotism. * * * The commanding officer is hereby directed to discharge the troops now in the service of the United States except 25 privates to guard stores at Fort Pitt and 55 to guard stores at West Point." Just emerged from a war in which they had been compelled to mobilize 400,000 Continentals and militia against an enemy who never had more than 42,000 men in the field, these early Americans could still reduce their armed forces to two tiny groups of quartermaster storekeepers. They placed their trust in the width of an ocean not yet shrunk by modern technology.

That bit of folly in our initial item of peacetime military legislation assisted in the birth of a tradition for which we have paid so heavily and so often that the lesson may at last have been learned. That we have never gone down to final defeat in any war under policies so dangerous to our national safety can be attributed to many causes. Among them is the fact that sound military training never quite died. Through the intervals of peace it survived on a skeleton basis. Always there remained a small nucleus of trained officers and men which could be, and was, expanded in times of emergency to meet the crisis. The cost, or to be specific, the wanton waste of that haphazard way of buying national insurance shows how far the American people were ready to gamble with their security. Only a rich nation could so have indulged itself. There was, moreover, a margin of safety in the fluctuating backlog of trained and partly trained men produced through private initiative. As the records of every war have shown, this reserve pool, the product of our military colleges and academies, was rich in officer material. Many of such graduates embraced a permanent military career. Today's roster of that contingent begins with the Chief of Staff, Gen. George C. Marshall, and continues with an imposing list of officers exercising high command in the field or vital staff positions. Among them are two outstanding major generals in the armored forces, both of them Norwich products—Maj. Gens. Ernest N. Harmon and Edward H. Brooks, Jr.

From the first, military instruction under civilian auspices and as a feature of higher education has been a peculiarly American institution. It has never had a true counterpart abroad. Seeking its origin, one discovers it here in Norwich University or, to be specific, in Norwich's predecessor, the American Literary, Scientific, and Military Academy, which opened its doors at Norwich, Vt., in 1819. To the farsighted vision of one man, Capt. Alden Partridge, founder of the institution, must be given the credit for this inspired step. Captain Partridge, product of a rugged environment in which merit alone could pave the way to advancement, returned to his native Vermont in 1819 with well matured views as to the young Nation's educational needs. Thirteen years of service with the faculty and staff of the United States Military Academy, during which period he had successively held the positions of professor of mathematics, professor of engineering, and superintendent had given him the opportunity to test his views.

A grim moment of his West Point service which occurred June 18, 1812, is worth recalling. On that day Congress declared a state of war against England. And on that day West Point was an empty shell, devoid of instructors and cadets. Of more than 300 candidates appointed to the academy in the previous 2 or 3 years, not one had entered. The hostility of William Eustis, Madison's Secretary of War, had prevented the certification of their credentials. In the meanwhile cadets and officers already stationed at West Point had been scattered throughout the Army, on the ground that their services were needed elsewhere. If any serious protest was ever registered against Eustis's policies, it does not appear on the record. The Military Academy Act of 1812 provided a tardy correction for this state of affairs.

Captain Partridge logically concluded that sole dependence on a national academy as a source of trained officer material was dangerous—all the more so because of the widespread and continuing hostility among his countrymen against anything that savored of a professionally trained force. So long as public opinion favored a militia of citizen soldiery, it appeared wise to make the best of the situation. But even in a militia there must be men qualified to command and to lead. Counting on support from those elements of the population who put a proper valuation on military training as a feature of higher education, he decided to launch his project. His plan called for the preparation of a youth "in the best possible manner for the correct discharge of the duties of any station in which he may be placed." It is interesting to note that, more than a century before Captain Partridge's time, John Milton, England's greatest poet, less well-known as a practical pacifist, had declared in his tractate on education, "I call a complete and generous education that which fits a man to perform justly skillfully, and magnanimously, all of the offices, both private and public, of peace and war." Whether Milton's terse pronouncement had ever been brought to Captain Partridge's attention is not recorded. It is interesting to note in passing that the views of the author of Paradise Lost have been significantly disinterred for frequent quotation in these days of blood letting, when higher education is once more surveying its function and objectives.

Captain Partridge charted his course along lines which broke sharply from the traditional immersion in the classics then in vogue. True, Latin and Greek and the modern languages were available to those who preferred the classics. The major emphasis, however, was on the pure and applied sciences leading to and including the study of engineering. Ultimately, courses in agriculture were set up. What most disturbed the educational die-hards of his day was Captain Partridge's organization of the student body as a military unit and the inclusion of military drills and exercises in the daily schedule. He was soon to hear civilian educators refer to his cadets as "janissaries"; his academy, as an "infidel institution." Nevertheless, it was not long before he had definitely proven his case. "Partridge makes men" became the well-known comment of the day; and within 5 years after its foundation the academy was drawing students from 18 of the 24 States in the Union, and from several of the organized Territories and foreign countries as well. Judging from the distribution of its student body, no other private institution of that day could lay so just a claim to being the "national university" on which Alden Partridge had set his heart.

Before he laid down the reins of authority Captain Partridge was to see his example emulated in many parts of the country. Indeed, in addition to the American Literary, Scientific, and Military Academy, he founded five other academies in as many States. Lack of time forbids discussion of how the destruction by fire of the original academy buildings at Norwich led to its removal to Northfield, or of its chartering by the State of Vermont in 1834 as Norwich University. The sprout planted by the founder had borne its fruit and scattered its seed to every part of the country until the military colleges, to use the War Department's technical description, and the secondary schools of the same type were a commonplace in the Nation's educational pattern. Out of the wartime experience with their product was born the R. O. T. C. system, the source of more than 100,000 officers for the present war. Just how far the availability of this pool of elite material affected the speed and quality of our rearmament program after 1939 and the war effort itself is a matter calling for further study. It is safe to say that the net benefit was tremendous and that the cost of the peacetime maintenance of R. O. T. C. training has been repaid manyfold in the dividends declared on the battlefield.

There is a less rosy side to this picture, one which accurately reflects our costly obsession with the notion that world peace could be had by fiat, or in any event that this country could remain aloof from whatever storms might be raging outside our national boundaries. Our enemies of today entertained no such illusions. In the states which comprised the Axis and in some of their imitators as well the pattern of education from bottom to top, had been reshaped into the various types of training peculiarly necessary to a people planning a course of all-out aggression. Pure research, the processes of honest analysis, and truth itself disappeared from the classrooms and the textbooks.

The reaction of America's teachers and commentators to this deliberate pollution of the stream of education was one of righteous scorn. What we failed to note at the same time was the weaknesses in our own system. Only at the very last, when our active entry into the war had become merely a question of time, did we discover that for more than 20 years the product of our institutions of higher education had received, along with their diplomas, an assortment of false illusions on every major issue touching the obligations of the United States to its fellow nations, and of themselves as individuals to their country. There is no fitter commentary on the student's state of mind than the language and the spirit of the petitions which poured in on Congress from the campuses during the debate on the selective-service bill. True that situation has been corrected, at least for this day. I am told on good authority that not a few of the rabid petitioners of 1940 are listed among the men posthumously decorated for valor beyond the call of duty. Still, before we decide to close the books on this matter, we will do well to remember that the foolish effusions of these youths merely gave back to society what society had given them. It is comforting to add that no one has been readier to admit responsibility for the dangerously visionary teaching of these past years than the educators themselves. That fact clears the ground for the realistic, honest approach to the problems of the peace to come, problems just as important and far more complex than that of achieving military victory.

False motivation was not the sole weakness of our educational system in these years of truce. Almost as serious was the progressive decline of interest among the students in what they describe as the tough courses, particularly those in the technical fields. The deterioration was most marked in the secondary schools, giving the colleges a steadily weakening supply of entering material. For a nation which prides itself on having outstripped all others in its technological advances, this situation was bad enough in peacetime. For a nation, destined soon to fight for its existence and to provide at the same time the flood of supplies necessary to keep its allies in the fight, appropriate comment is best left to the imagination. Happily the trend is reversed; classroom emphasis has gone back to the tough courses and to individual merit. We can hope that 25 years hence no foreign ambassador can respond as did Admiral Nomura 3 months before Pearl Harbor when a fellow guest at a dinner party asked him whether he thought America would maintain her stand to the point of going to war. "No," responded the smiling Admiral, "too many Beauty Rest mattresses; too many chocolate-milk shakes." The admiral's comment obviously indicated not only his estimate of a softening mental and spiritual fiber, but took in physical fitness as well. The record of our induction centers since 1940 bears him out. Nomura might have added: "Too many coonskin coats; too few players' uniforms."

This recital of shortcomings, all of them inimical to our national potential for war and for peace, might readily be dismissed as bygones which are best forgotten. In a day when our armed forces are driving to victory with a power and skill never surpassed in our history, we would all prefer to dwell on that sum total of human fitness and unquenchable spirit which is achieving victory. That has been the pattern of our past wars, and of the periods of peace which followed. Focusing our minds on the ultimate victory and blocking out the painful memories of the price paid for victory, we lost the lessons of the avoidable waste which entered into the cost. So doing we threw away the one real safeguard against a repetition of the folly. Better this time to keep the bygones before us as warning signs, better to hold them as object lessons lest we again become soft in mind and fat in body, ready in the estimation of some future self-styled master race, for the kill.

It will be a lean, hard America that emerges from this war. It will arrive at the hour of victory, the hour which one recent author characterizes as the most dangerous in all history, trained to the minute. That America need not fear the squandering of the fruits of the war, as we squandered those of World War No. 1, so long as our people as a whole show as much courage and mental honesty in facing our national problems, as our soldiers are showing on the battlefield. There is no other route to safety in a day when the robot bomb and the B–29 have reduced the word "frontier" to a technical abstraction, when boundaries will be safe only so long as any future renascence of the will to world mastery is promptly identified and then destroyed at the source before it is too late.

How and to what extent America will take to heart the lessons learned since the outbreak of this war in Manchuria 13 years ago rests with the electorate. In this Nation the "sovereign will of the people" is no empty phrase coined by a dictator for his own purposes. The executive instrument of the Government, including the armed forces, can do no more than implement that sovereign will, as expressed in the acts of Congress. The rule of the people which survived the two greatest crises of our past, first when we fought to secure national independence and again when we preserved by force the unity of the Nation now faces a greater test. This time the stakes are all that humankind has achieved in its struggle of sixty centuries to establish the dignity, integrity, and sanctity of the common man.

Military victory over our enemies will be but a first major step toward the ultimate goal. Whether the fruits of that victory will again be squandered, as our generation squandered those of 1918, whether we will achieve only a breathing space before the issue of human liberty is again put to the test of battle, depends largely on the vision, courage, and tenacity of the American people in the years ahead. One fact alone sets them apart from all other nations. Under their control lies a total combat potential such as no other nation can boast. Whether it be latent, as it was in 1940, or supremely effective as it is today on every fighting front, the sovereign people who speak in terms of such power carry a responsibility which cannot be overestimated. Nor, as Pearl Harbor has shown, can the issue be dodged. The one road to safety and to the peace which, in the President's words, has become "indivisible," lies in the full acceptance by the people of the obligations inherent in the status of the United States as a great power.

Responsibility so broad and far-reaching can be met only by a people ready for it. The preparedness I have in mind is not so much one that can be expressed in terms of combat divisions, and in naval and air task forces, maintained against the day of war but rather one which tallies with Thomas Jefferson's definition, previously quoted, under which every man is ready to meet invasions of the public order as his personal concern. Such readiness, to have any value, must begin with a proper understanding of the issues at stake. Hand-in-hand with understanding goes the physical and spiritual fitness which qualify the individual to make a proper contribution to the nation's cause. If this formula appears to point toward a projected race of supermen, let me hasten to say that the word is best forgotten. At the same time we need something considerably better than the average which has been processed in our induction centers these past 3 years. And if we are to get it, education, higher education must point the way.

The immediate challenge to education is one which any real teacher will welcome. The human raw material now flowing into the campuses is in many respects quite unlike that of 5, 10, or 15 years ago. Some have already had their taste of battle. Nearly all have relatives in uniforms. And with few exceptions they show a comprehension of world events which would put to shame many an international relations major of 5 years ago. Above all they feel that no glib, stereotyped interpretation will explain to them the inner elements of the present struggle, nor of the problems still to come. Instead they are eager to wrestle with the issues facing us all, beginning with the acceptance of the fact that we cannot again break faith with the dead. It will not be difficult to mould such material to the end that the sense of personal responsibility will be fully developed, and to the further end that the college product, returning to its native community, will in due time provide sound, enlightened leadership for those who have been denied the opportunity of higher education. Nor should it be hard to drive home the need of physical fitness for all as a proper counterpart to mental development. If that ideal appears visionary, let us not forget that the college product of the last 20 years of truce accurately reflected the weaknesses of higher education in executing its vital mission. The cost of that failure is too heavy to be dodged by our consciences, too far-reaching to escape the historian. In blocking off that blind alley to futility, we will find it easier to keep to the straight road in the future.

You will note that I have said nothing to this point on the subject of military training as an element of higher education. Inasmuch as it is involved in the broader question of compulsory service, an issue now under consideration by Congress, I am omitting it from my discussion. What can be said at this time is that the role of the military colleges and universities like Norwich will play a continuing vital part in the rounded development of our youth. Adding to other requirements of their curricula a prescribed course in military training, thereby inculcating a sense of self-discipline which enures to the student's lasting benefit, they offer no asylum to the type who seeks merely 4 years of delightful exposure to a campus environment, untroubled by too much pain of concentrated effort. The appeal must continue to go to the youth who realizes that the worth while things of life come the hard way. So doing, the military colleges spare themselves much wasted time and energy. They cannot, it is true, adhere longer to the full import of Alden Partridge's rule for the training of mind, body, and character, so blended as to fit a man for "all of the offices, both public and private, of peace and war." Technology and its offspring, specialization, compel a contraction of a program so broad. The fundamentals, however, which point a man toward the desired goal, can and should remain unchanged, ensuring the Nation that this institution continues to train men properly for the duties of both peace and war. Then, as once was said of Alden Partridge, it can still and always be said, "Norwich makes men."

The Truth About Farmer Cooperatives and Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, following up the correspondence with Ben C. McCabe, of the so-called National Tax Equality Association, over the question of the taxation of moneys held in trust by farm cooperatives for their members, I ask consent to include with my remarks two statements released by the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives which tell the truth about this whole situation:

THE TRUTH ABOUT FARMER COOPERATIVES AND TAXES

Despite clever propaganda to the contrary, farmer cooperatives are not exempt from taxation. Generally speaking, they pay taxes the same as any other business.

They pay State and local property taxes.

They pay excise taxes.

They pay transportation taxes on the movement of goods or persons and taxes on communication services.

They pay social-security and unemployment-insurance taxes.

They pay stamp taxes, use taxes, import taxes, occupational taxes, and miscellaneous taxes on various commodities wherever other businesses pay them.

Many of them even pay income taxes—the reason that others do not, is that they have no income to tax.

For farmer cooperatives are service—not profit—organizations.

Cooperatives operate on the basis of deducting from the returns to the farmer for his products, or adding to the price of supplies purchased for the farmer, an amount sufficient to cover estimated costs plus a margin for operating contingencies. What is left after actual costs are covered belongs to the farmer-member or patron and is systematically returned to him. Even the margin left for contingencies if unused is returned.

It is in no sense a profit to the association; it is a revolving fund into which balances due the patron are from day to day accumulated, pending settlement with the farmers, and from which excess contingency charges are from day to day paid out.

Furthermore, like all individual citizens, the farmer must report all taxable income including refunds from cooperatives which he receives in cash or stock; and for that matter, all equities that may be credited to his account on the books of the cooperative.

Any other corporation operating on such a nonprofit basis, would also pay no income tax, for the simple reason that there would be no income to tax. This method of doing business is actually being followed by many concerns other than farmer cooperatives. In other words, there is nothing to prevent any industrial or commercial corporation from contracting to refund to patrons all proceeds, less expenses of operation, thus operating on a cost basis as does a cooperative.

The relationship between a cooperative and the farmer is essentially that of agent and principal. To tax the cooperative for balances of earnings, or savings which it is obligated by law, charter, or agreement to handle as trust funds for, and, to pass on to, the farmer, would be taxing an agent for income belonging to his principal, the absurdity of which is obvious.

If the farmer gave his hired man $10 with which to buy 3 bushels of seed potatoes on his trip to town, and the hired man was able to get the seed for $9, including truck hire, and later returned the $1 to the farmer, nobody would maintain that the other $1 was income or profit and should be taxed to the hired man. Yet the taxation of proceeds received by a farmer cooperative for one of its patrons would be nothing more than taxing the hired man.

Farmers set up their cooperatives to provide themselves needed services—not to make profits on capital investment in unrelated enterprises.

In the event of liquidation, the net assets of a cooperative are prorated to the members or patrons on the basis of the use they have made of the association; if they are stockholders they can receive as such no more than paid-in value of their stock. In addition, they may receive as patrons, their equity in any undistributed balances on hand. Thus, the principles of nonprofit and patronage refund, termed recently by a Federal judge as part of the "warp and woof" of any cooperative, are carried out not only in operation but also in the process of liquidation.

SHALL THE FAMILY FARM BE PRESERVED?

In American agriculture the producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative has been developed as a vitally important means by which the farmer preserves and exercises his right of free enterprise. Shall this right be denied?

An attack that will strike straight home to three out of every five farm operators in America has been launched by certain business and financial interests.

It would strike at these farmers by denying them the right to use their producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperatives on a cost-of-doing-business basis.

Farmers set up these cooperatives because they needed them.

They use them to provide services they need to carry on their farming operations—services that in most cases would not be practical for the individual farmer to provide for himself on his own farm.

There can be no doubt about this statement. The figures themselves prove it. Farming is a small business, and the average member of a farm cooperative requires the services of his cooperative to the extent of less than $1,000 per year.

Yet, the opponents of cooperatives, operating as they are behind a false front—for the officers and directors of this anti-co-op drive do not reveal the real forces back of it—would take from farmers the right to join with their neighbors to provide themselves on a sound basis with the services they need.

Such an attack threatens free enterprise right at a time when two opposing and contradicting philosophies are under test in America.

The newer of these philosophies looks to the National Government to solve our problems, meet all emergencies, and to regulate and order the economic life of the individual.

The older and traditional philosophy calls for the individual to be strong and self-reliant, through the exercise of his own initiative and the application of his own courage and resourcefulness.

In American agriculture, the producer-owned and produced-controlled cooperative has been developed as a vitally important means by which the farmer, working with his neighbors, preserves and exercises his right of free enterprise. Without some such means of mobilizing their economic strength, farmers will become either the serfs of other interests or a ward of the Government.

If he lands in either position, free enterprise in the United States will be dealt a death blow. The very foundation of our economic life rests on the ownership and operation of land by the maximum number of freeholders.

Certainly if farmers are denied the privileges of cooperative endeavor because of the opposition of selfish financial and business interests, there can be no common ground for cooperation between the farmers of the country and finance, industry, and commerce. This is a fact which businessmen everywhere should ponder.

FARMING IS A FAMILY ENTERPRISE

There are 6,096,799 farms in America. There are only 530,131,000 acres of tillable land. This means that the average American farm has only 87 tillable acres.

Although farms as a whole are the important producers of basic wealth, the average farm is a family-sized business. Yet the individual farmer has the same problems of buying and processing and selling that the big corporations have—and without their concentration of money and facilities.

To enable the individual family farm operator to cope with the advantages in capital, trained personnel, and research facilities of the other great industries of the country, the United States and the legislatures of all the States in the Union have authorized the organization and operation of producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations by farmers. At the same time the legislative bodies of the country imposed certain conditions which effectively safeguard both farmers and the general public from the misuse of cooperatives, such as:

Restrict participation to bona fide agricultural producers.

Limit the return on invested capital.

Base control on membership rather than investment. One man, one vote.

Provide that cooperatives shall do business at cost—any overcharges for services rendered are returned to the members in proportion to the use they made of these services.

"Come Before Winter"

OF

HON. CHESTER H. GROSS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I have through the years listened to and read many great sermons, but I have never heard or read one that has been so much of an inspiration to me as one that came to my desk recently entitled "Come Before Winter." Last night I gave it to one of the young men running an elevator in the House Office Building, and he told me that he has not read anything more inspiring in his time. It was preached by Rev. J. B. Baker, D. D., of St. Matthew's Lutheran Church, York, Pa., in my district.

The sermon is as follows:

"COME BEFORE WINTER"

(2 Timothy 4: 21)

These words were written by that grand old warrior of the faith, Paul the Apostle, to his young convert and ministerial son, Timothy. Paul is a prisoner in Rome in the days when prisons were often little more than cisterns, with no light entering them save that which seeped in through the hole at the top, through which the prisoners were lowered. The Mamertine dungeon in which Paul was kept, a vile hole about 20 feet in diameter, is still shown to tourists.

How little we easygoing Americans know what it cost some men to be Christians. A little while ago one of the German puppets tyrannizing Norway called the bishop of Oslo into his office and said:

"You triple traitor, you ought to have your head chopped off."

The bishop looked down at the cross that hung from his neck and simply said: "Here I am."

And if you read the rest of this letter of Paul to Timothy you will find that Paul said practically the same thing. "I am now ready to be offered up."

One said, "I am now ready," the other said, "Here I am."

"Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
While others fought to win the prize
And sailed through bloody seas?"

This grand old warrior had two needs there in his dark, damp dungeon, one for his body and one for his mind. God was abundantly caring for his spiritual needs, so he wrote to Timothy:

"Bring the cloke that I left in Troas with Carpus and the books, especially the parchments."

The increasing dampness and coolness of his dungeon is indicated by his pathetic request to "come before winter."

There are two reasons why Paul asked him to come before winter; one was his own need and the other reason was the hazard of winter travel.

Ships were often compelled to put up for the winter in ports even in the Mediterranean and those who took the risk often lost their cago, sometimes all and sometimes their ship.

But we are not going to linger in the Mediterranean Basin. Coming before winter has too wide a significance for that.

Paul's words to Timothy are God's words to you. Everybody wants to come to God sometimes.

Every person with a normal mind knows that we are all heading for a great unknown, that we will all need more than human strength and human wisdom very soon, and that to get it we must get right with God and not expect Him to get right with us.

The only question on which we differ is the question of time.

Felix said to Paul when he pricked his conscience: "When I have a convenient season I will call for thee."

Felix has more descendants than the original Smith.

A wiser than Felix said: "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth," which means come before winter.

The same two reasons which made it wise for Timothy to come before winter make it wise for you to come before winter.

Paul needed him and the saints need you.

You say "Me," "a drunk," "a vagabond," "me, who swears and sneers at the church and church people, who has not read the Bible or gone to church for years," "you're just talking."

No, friend, I'm not just talking, and these people who just a few minutes ago sang "For You I Am Praying" know that I'm not just talking. There isn't a man living, there isn't a woman living, be they ever so vile or so low, who cannot become a comfort to the saints, who cannot warm their hearts as that cloak of Timothy warmed the body of Paul.

Suppose you are a drunkard. Jerry McCauley, and Samual Hadley, and John B. Gough, and Sam Jones, and Sam Small, and John G. Wolley were all drunkards once upon a time, and when Jerry McCauley died more redeemed men followed his body to its grave than ever followed a hearse in the city of New York.

Suppose you are a vagabond. So was John St. John, the superintendent of the Bowery Mission, and hundreds of other men brought to Christ in the Bowery missions, many of them college graduates, wanderers from home, estranged from their families, damned by rum.

Suppose you do swear. Mothers warned their children against going near that profane tinker who bore the name of John Bunyan. John Bunyan gave his heart to God and God purged his vocabulary as he will purge the vocabulary of every Christian, for no Christian swears. And with his new heart and renewed mind and purged vocabulary John Bunyan, with his glorious Pilgrim's Progress, has cheered and comforted and inspired and blessed thousands upon thousands.

Suppose you haven't been in church for years. Neither was the son of Jacob Reiss, the right-hand man of Theodore Roosevelt in clearing up New York. He hadn't been inside a church for over 20 years. That is long enough to starve a man to death spiritually. But God can raise the dead and that is what he did for Mr. Reiss. On the day that news came of the terrible destruction of Rotterdam a strange impulse took him to a church in New York and to his amazement he found that there is something solid in religion and that he had been mushing around in dirty sand all those 20 years and more. The result was that he was honest enough to admit it and write his confession and give it to a national magazine so that the whole world could read it. You can imagine how the saints were comforted by his confession and his manly declaration of it. But it went further than that. Maybe you too heard your mother sing:

"Ring the bells of heaven,
There is joy today
For a soul returning from the wild.
See the Father meets him
Out upon the way,
Welcoming his weary, wandering child.

"Glory, glory, how the angels sing,
Glory, glory, how the loud harps ring.
'Tis the ransomed army, like a mighty sea,
Pealing forth the anthem of the free."

That song is based on the words of the Lord that there is joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repents.

Oh, come before winter. You have something, no matter how vile or how low you are, that will warm the hearts of saints and cheer the hosts of heaven.

But that is not the only reason why I plead with you to come before winter.

Each season of life, like each season of the year, has experiences and blessings that cannot be found in any other season. If missed, they are missed forever.

Who would want to jump from winter into summer and miss springtime; spring, with its roses and peonies, its anemones and arbutus, its apple blossoms and forget-me-nots, its returning robins and mating wrens, its luring streams and calling woods?

Taking spring out of the year would be like taking boyhood out of life. In fact, Tennyson called spring "the boyhood of the year."

"There is no time like Spring,
When life's alive in everything."

Don't forget that there is a spring to the Christian life, too, and that he who comes to Christ in winter misses one of the sweetest experiences in Christian living.

The past presidents of the York County Luther League meet once a year in a banquet of food and memory.

A number of them are no more active in the league, but when it was mentioned at the last meeting that the league will shortly celebrate its fiftieth anniversary, the past presidents decided to pay for a souvenir program to be used then, in appreciation of what the Luther League did for them in the springtime of their life. That is when all of them learned to speak in public, pray in public, and live a useful Christian life.

Come before winter that you may have something satisfying to carry with you through the years. Memory will be a flat purse if you don't. And who would want a year without a summer?

Sitting one day in the long ago with a man so loved and honored by all that everyone called him Uncle George, and looking from his front porch out over a field of golden grain waving like a drowsy sea, he said:

"My folks want me to sell and move to town, but how can I leave a scene like this?"

And everything else was in harmony with the wheat and his soul; the hay was already in the barn, the apples and the peaches ripening, the berry bushes bending, the garden full of earth's richest offerings, and the bees gathering their nectar.

A few years without a summer, and we would all die. Summer is just as valuable in Christian living as it is in general living.

Someone said, "Oh, for a thousand years of mid-life." We can't have that many, of course, but mid-life is the summer of the soul. Come before winter if you want a real harvest. This means more than present satisfaction.

The Word declares that "They that be wise shall shine as the stars forever and ever." Daniel xii: 3.

But some stars are brighter than other stars, and some of the wise will be brighter than others, and for only one reason.

Each will be rewarded according to the deeds done in the flesh.

A Christian life without a summer will be very apt to be like a farm without a summer, bins empty, hayloft empty, cribs empty, everything empty.

Come before winter. Come when your great production mid-life can yield harvests for God. Don't give him a summerless offering, a sucked out orange, an empty barn.

A spring well managed and a summer well spent brings an autumn well filled. It is then that the Creator gives the forests their richest hues, then that the very angels of heaven seem to hang out their choicest draperies as the sun goes down, then that the caverns of winds breathe out their crispest breezes. It is then that the tiller of the soil on whose industry we all live feels at his best. Riley, the Hoosier, tells it all in his—

"When the frost is on the pumpkin and the fodder's in the shock,
And you hear the kyouck and gobble of the strutting turkey cock,
And the clackin' of the guineas and the cluckin' of the hens,
And the rooster's hallelooyah as he tiptoes on the fence;
O, it's then's the time a feller is a feeling at his best,
With the risin' sun to greet him from a night of peaceful rest,
As he leaves the house, bareheaded, and goes out to feed the stock,
When the frost is on the pumpkin and the fodder's in the shock."

In his quaint Hoosier dialect he says that if there was such a thing as the angels wanting boarding he'd want "to accommodate the whole endurin' flock, when the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock." And thinking of everything gathered in, the barns and cellers and the attics and pantries and shelves full, he says:

"It sets my heart a clickin 'like the tickin' of a clock,
When the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock."

That same feeling pulsates the heart of the Christian who remembered his Creator in the days of his youth and gave the Lord the spring and the summer of his life. There is a deep satisfaction that the late comer can never know.

The treasures which Christ tells us to lay up in Heaven are the soul harvests which need a spring and a summer as well as the field harvests do.

Come before winter. Come while you still have strength for service left. He alone will save you, but even He cannot reward you above your deeds. The Bible is very specific in warning us that we shall be rewarded according to the deeds done in the flesh.

All the mercy of God, and it is as fathomless as the sea, cannot give you more yonder than you have earned. Our entrance into heaven is a pure gift but our station in heaven is our own achieving. How can you work 6 and 7 days on earth to be somebody here and be so perfectly willing to be nobody hereafter, when this life is just the draft of a breath and that life endless?

Come before winter. But there is another reason for warning you against a winter acceptance of Christ and that is in the fact that winter travel is dangerous.

Beginning with Dr. Starbuck many students of religion have proven by elaborate charts and diagrams that most of the people who have come to Christ have come in their youth. A few before 12, many between 12 and 20, a goodly number between 20 and 30, then the line drops down like a shot eagle, with a small number between 30 and 40, a still smaller number between 40 and 60, and only a very rare conversion after that. In the 40 years of my ministry, I have confirmed only one person in the eighties.

Youth is by far the best traveling time to Christ, youth with its alertness, its idealism, its dreams, its ease of choice, its quickness of motion.

Youth is the time of great decisions, of location of trade and profession, of marriage and methods. It is in youth that we decide whether we are going to be prodigal or thrifty, slipshod or systematic, cooperative or selfish, superficial or thorough. Not a classmate to my knowledge is different in essentials today from what he was in college 45 years ago. Come to Jesus now.

Don't wait until your eyes are dim and your ears dull and your arteries brittle and your joints stiff and your gait limping.

Christ gave you a 33-year-old body, don't give Him a dried up carcass. He died for you in His prime, don't live for Him in a worn out body.

Even if you do come like the dying thief in the eleventh hour it is still a bad bargain for you, because you might have done so much better.

But the chances are that, if you put it off till winter, you won't come at all.

In the stormy days of the English-Scottish wars the English sovereign offered all the Scotch chiefs pardon, if they came before the end of the year and acknowledged his sovereignty.

They knew that further resistance was useless, and one by one went down to bow the knee, but one of the Scotch chiefs, McIan by name, decided that he was going to be the last to do it, and so he waited until just a few days before the end of the year to start.

A blizzard, however, developed in those last few days and prevented McIan from reaching the king in time. The result was that he was ignominiously put to death for his pride.

Of course, the Lord Christ would not do that to any mortal, but the tragedy is that he who waits till winter will likely not arrive.

He will be like the touring party that came to Mount Washington and spurned the idea of taking a guide with them because they had a geologist with them. With their geologist, who knew rocks but not Mount Washington, they started up the slopes. In the afternoon a snowstorm developed which became worse the longer the afternoon wore on. In a short time they were traveling in circles and when the morning sun rose the next day they were all cold in death not far from the house they had hoped to enter.

Lost in sight of refuge. Don't you make that mistake, brother. Come before winter and accept our guide, the Lord Jesus Christ.

Wanted: An All-American Bard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN P. NEWSOME

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. NEWSOME. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David L. Cohn, published recently in the Atlantic Monthly:

WANTED: AN ALL-AMERICAN BARD

(By David L. Cohn)

What the country needs is a poet laureate of Congress. This is the sense of a bill recently introduced by Representative W. C. COLE (Republican, Missouri) and now in the hands of the House Library Committee for consideration. The bill proposes as first laureate Mr. Horace C. Carlisle, of Troy, Ala., an employee of the Capitol Architect's office. A better selection could scarcely have been made, for not only is his name rich in literary connotations but he is demonstrably an excellent poet who now quite properly gives his work a patriotic slant. This, for example, is a stanza from Mr. Carlisle's stirring poem, Uncle Sam's WAVE:

"Methinks, many a brave,
That's escaped with his life,
Will come home to his WAVE,
And will make her his wife.
And throughout the long years
That are likely to come,
Free from sorrow and tears,
They will sing Home, Sweet Home."

The use of the word "methinks" shows that the poet is as familiar with verse forms as you are with the old picket fence on Sycamore Street; yet there are surly critics in this country who will say that Mr. Carlisle is not a poet at all. These are the people who have got American poetry off the beam, and Congress, recognizing the damage that has been done, is trying to get it on again. Mr. Carlisle's verse takes us back to the simplicities of our forefathers, and anybody who does not want to return to the simplicities of his forefathers is at best a poltroon and at worst a traitor. For what do we find even in the little stanza which we have quoted? A celebration of the very things for which this country was founded and which we are now fighting to preserve: the right of a brave to marry a WAVE and spend the rest of their lives singing Home, Sweet Home.

Congressmen, whatever their aesthetic blind spots, have passionate convictions about the uses and beauties of poetry; to them poetry is not, as it is to so many of us, an empty hodge-podge of words about larks, long-winded Greeks, and plowmen breaking the stubborn glebe. They regard it as a tool of their profession and even the prosiest orator breaks his oration every now and then, coats his tongue with honey or with fire as the case may be, and lets fly—"as the poet said." This does something to popularize poetry among their still rude constituents and bears out their contention that it has practical angles.

Congressmen, moreover, are so enamored of verse that they ratified the appointment of Archibald MacLeish, a practicing poet of great ability, as Librarian of Congress. And although Mr. MacLeish is less often quoted by Congressmen than is Eddie Guest and his standards are by no means those of the proposed laureate, Horace Carlisle, the fact that he presides over the great Library is indicative of the trend.

It is heartening, then, to record that with unerring good taste our legislators, who move to the contrapuntal music of no sound, have picked the right man in the person of Horace C. Carlisle. He is vouched for by no less an authority than the good gray poetry lover, the Honorable THEODORE G. BILBO (the Man) of Mississippi, who secured consent to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Mr. Carlisle's poem entitled "Brumidi in the District of Columbia Room." Brumidi, let me say for the benefit of those who are lamentably ignorant of the works of art in their Nation's Capitol, is the little-known genius who painted so many of the murals that adorn the Capitol's walls. The last stanza ends on a note of lofty idealism and intimations of immortality:

"The District of Columbia room belongs to all the States,
And yet it does, in fact, belong to none—
Herein the District laws are planned, but from it emanates
The rule of conduct for none but its own.
The artist, we presume,
Resolved to give this room
The very best that it was his to give—
And, through the coming years, down to the day of doom,
In these, his pictures, will Brumidi live."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the permission granted by the House, I am including in these remarks a petition signed by leading citizens and groups of Ann Arbor, Mich., urging that a ship of the United States Navy be named "Ann Arbor." This request gives the reasons why such action on the part of the Secretary of the Navy is advisable. It is as follows:

We respectfully petition that a ship of the United States Navy, of appropriate size, be named after our city.

We are aware that in population Ann Arbor is exceeded by many other American cities, but its influence and importance are entirely disproportionate to its size.

One of the earliest settlements of southern Michigan and from the first a governmental, business, and cultural center, Ann Arbor derives its unique quality from its peculiarly close relation to the "Mother of State Universities," the University of Michigan, whose home it has been since 1837. This, the first publicly supported and publicly governed university of the United States to be successfully organized and operated, has admittedly been the pioneer of public higher education and the model after which the system of State universities of the central and western parts of the country has been fashioned.

The influence and fame of the University of Michigan have been extended far beyond the limits of this country by the teaching, writing, and discoveries of the eminent scholars of its faculties. The late President James Burrill Angell was illustrious both as an educational leader and as a diplomat; Thomas McIntyre Cooley's Constitutional Limitations is one of this country's legal classics; Michigan scientists of both the past and the present have benefited mankind by their discoveries in medicine, chemistry, physics, and engineering.

Since the University of Michigan was first established 133,623 persons have attended it, of whom 82,051 completed the course and received their degrees, and 106,376 are still living. These men and women came literally from all parts of the United States and from all the countries of the world, and as alumni they are correspondingly distributed. There are 7,000 of them in the State of New York and more than 4,000 in California, with large groups in all the intervening States both north and south. Hundreds are to be found in China, India, and the Philippines; hundreds also in Canada, the South and Central American republics, and substantial numbers in every country of Europe, Asia, and Africa. All of these, who as university students walked the pleasant streets of Ann Arbor and lived in its hospitable homes, cherish a deep affection for the city in which the happy and profitable years of their youth were spent. Into whatever port an American naval vessel bearing the name Ann Arbor might come, it would be instantly recognized and welcomed by many who know and love the place.

Apart from the university, Ann Arbor has other reasons for believing itself to be an appropriate sponsor of an American naval vessel. Its picturesque name, based on a tradition of its earliest settlement, is unique. Its beauty of location, its wealth of comfortable homes and handsome streets, its parks, hospitals, and public services are unusual. It offers cultural advantages—concerts, lectures, dramatic performances, library facilities—to be found in few cities except those of the largest size. Its industries, dependent rather upon skilled labor and inventive genius than upon mere size, produce articles which in turn many other industries depend. It is the governmental and cultural center of a large and important area, typically American and highly influential in American life.

In the present war, both the city of Ann Arbor and the University of Michigan are making noteworthy contributions. We are told that the city leads the entire country in its per capita purchase of War bonds. We know that fully 95 percent of its industrial products go into war materials. Outstanding and vitally important items made in Ann Arbor include optical fire-control instruments, broaching tools, that have revolutionized gun making, aircraft parts, radio parts, ball and roller bearings, gun recoil and engine springs, shells, gauges, filters, machine tools, bomb racks, baling presses, and precision instruments of many kinds. The city has sent about 4,000 men into the armed forces, and approximately 3,000 of its citizens are registered for various types of civilian defense.

At the University of Michigan, which has been designated as a training center by both the Navy and the Army, the teaching skill of the faculty, the educational apparatus of laboratories and libraries, and the facilities for lodging, feeding, and caring for the welfare of military and naval personnel in training have been loyally dedicated to national purposes even before December 7, 1941. In its extent and variety, and in that it has not been confined to the mere housing of personnel but has consisted of a wide variety of educational services which only a highly organized university is fitted to provide, the University of Michigan's war-training service is unique. The institution has also sponsored more than 100 research projects bearing upon war problems, among them some of immediate practical value to the Navy. It maintains an excellent Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, is now conducting the United States Naval Academy's Graduate School of Naval Architecture, and has more than 1,300 seamen and marines in the naval college-training program. Of the university, 128 are now on leave for war service with the Army, Navy, or other Federal agencies; of the alumni and former students, 20,000 are estimated to be in the armed forces. Already 62 have lost their lives in the country's service. Two of the latter were awarded Congressional Medals of Honor posthumously; in honor of one of them, First Lt. George Ham Cannon, United States Marine Corps, the Navy has named one of its new destroyers.

For all these reasons we believe that Ann Arbor is a name which would proudly and most appropriately be borne by an American ship of war. Already known far and wide, it stands for a truly American community, of the kind that has been the special pride and cherished possession of our country, and a community from which have gone forth thousands upon thousands of leaders in public life, the industries, and the professions—Congressmen, Senators, Cabinet members, governors, judges, soldiers, and sailors, engineers, lawyers, scientists, doctors and surgeons, dentists, teachers, and writers—men and women who have importantly helped to shape the thought, government, and social conditions of the country we live in. Ann Arbor has done much for America.

What Price Gold

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, back in pages of past CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS recording the debates in both branches of the Congress on money legislation, we have been told many things about gold and many fallacies about silver. Who could have convinced those old leaders, John Sherman—the gold standard advocate—and Senator Aldrich with his elastic currency scheme, all of which have been demonstrated as impractical and unworkable, that gold alone as a basis of world currencies would prove so inadequate that its value would actually be increased from $20.67 to $35 an ounce, and that it would be seriously proposed in this country to increase the value of gold to $120 per ounce.

These financial leaders and monetary experts were successful in demonetizing silver and in keeping the value of the metal silver on a commodity basis but what has their success done to the value and stability of money throughout the world? And how are we to maintain the stability of our money with a national debt estimated to reach $300,000,000,000 when the war is over with an annual interest charge $9,000,000,000? How much more in taxes will the American people have to raise annually to meet the Government's operating expenses and make payments to reduce the national debt?

We have reached a time when the metallic base of our currency must be broadened for the safety of business and credit in the country, not by increasing the value of gold, 70 percent of which is produced in the British Empire, but by remonetizing silver. The reported plan to increase the value of gold published in the Siskiyou Daily News and my reply thereto follows:

ONE-HUNDRED-AND-TWENTY-DOLLAR GOLD CLUB

A new type of club, designed solely to promote an increase in the price of gold to bring the value of the yellow metal to par with world economic needs, is in process of being launched in Siskiyou County.

Its sponsors hope that its membership will spread first over all California, thence over the United States, and then over the world. They plan no dues, fees, or assessments, requiring only that members work actively for one objective.

That objective will be to bring the price of gold into line with present economic factors and assure that it will be kept in line by regular, periodic price revisions thereafter on a world-wide basis.

The immediate intent is to work for a price of $120 per ounce, troy weight on gold.

That price is based upon years of study of economics and gold by Kenneth K. Ash, Yreka mining engineer, who has attracted international attention from monetary authorities.

It is hoped the objectives of this club will be achieved by spreading knowledge of the need involved, so that first individuals, then mining, then economic organizations and Government officials will be attracted to its support.

As a first step, Mr. Ash has outlined tentatively, as follows:

THE $120-GOLD CLUB

This is a nonprofit club formed for the sole purpose of advocating and actively working for an increase in the value of gold from $35.40 to $120 per fine ounce, troy weight.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 16, 1944.
EDITOR, SISKIYOU DAILY NEWS,
Yreka, Calif.

MY DEAR SIR: It is interesting to receive marked copies of your Daily News advocating the raising of the value of gold $120 an ounce.

While you are planning the advancement of gold what about silver?

Do you realize that the bulk of the gold produced in the world comes from the Eastern Hemisphere and the bulk of the silver in the world is mined in the Western Hemisphere and do you know that there is 400 million ounces of gold proven and in the unmined reserves of South Africa.

Let us take cut a pencil and paper and figure for a minute what an increase the price of this gold from $35 an ounce to a $120 an ounce would mean to the gold miners of the British Empire; $95 an ounce would increase the value of the unmined South African gold by $38,000,000,000 to say nothing of the gold in the British possessions, India, Australia, Canada, and the South Sea Islands.

Did you ever stop to think that the twenty-two billions of gold we have stocked in the Fort Knox vaults of this country was obtained by the products of American labor; surely we cannot afford to raise another mountain of gold purchasing power in the hands of our competitors to take away from American industry the fruits of its labor.

Let us return to a sound adequate money system, based upon the use of both the precious metals of gold and silver, the money that brought the bulk of the territory embraced within the United States and placed America in its present preeminent position among world powers.

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

Address by Hon. Joseph F. Guffey, of Pennsylvania, Before Blair County, Pa., Political Action Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address delivered by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] on August 13, 1944, before the Blair County, Pa., Political Action Committee, at the Chestnut Street Hall, Altoona, Pa.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In addressing this meeting, I cannot but recall the tremendous change which the New Deal has brought to organized labor in western Pennsylvania.

As a small boy I first became interested in the problems of labor and laboring men and their families when I witnessed the eviction of a number of miners and their families from the company houses at the mines located in Possum Hollow, Sewickley Township, Westmoreland County. They were compelled to erect muslin tents on the bar in the river because no one in the neighborhood would lease them land on which to erect their tents. The hardships on the children who were my age or younger excited my sympathy.

Later I remember the bloodshed and violence by which Henry C. Frick crushed the Knights of Labor in the Connellsville coke region. A few years later came the Homestead strike, when Andrew Carnegie viewed with safety the scenery on the Upper Nile in Egypt and let H. C. Frick crush the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers. For 30 years thereafter Frick and the steel magnates ruled western Pennsylvania through the coal and iron police, the State courts, and the State government at Harrisburg. Many of you who hear me today can remember those days when it was worth a workman's life to have it known that he was trying to organize labor in the steel industry. As soon as it was discovered he was put on the black list and his name and activities were furnished to all the other steel companies and manufacturers in western Pennsylvania. You men all know what the black list means.

And just to show you how all these things hang together, it was Henry C. Frick, of Pittsburgh, together with Senator Knox, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Frick's personal attorney, and Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, who defeated Woodrow Wilson's ideals and the League of Nations after the last war. It is said that Frick spent more than a million dollars toward this end, thus making certain another world war. The same man who had the strikers shot down at Homestead and at the Morewood Mines and the Trotter Mines of the Frick Coke Co., at the latter 2 of which more than 150 workers were killed or wounded, is the man whose actions a generation ago forced you to send your sons and brothers overseas to fight another world war.

It is well to remember at this time that the second World War has cost 20,000,000 lives and will cost this country at least $300,000,000,000 which you, your children, and your grandchildren will have to pay. The longer I live the surer I am that we face the same kind of enemies at home and abroad as we did in 1920 and we must be eternally on guard to prevent them from destroying our rights and freedom.

To the railroad workers in Altoona I call attention to the fact that Frick's hatred for Woodrow Wilson was caused by the passing of the Adamson Act in 1916, which permanently established the 8-hour day for railroad workers.

I would like to tell you, as a man who has been in politics for over 40 years, that the United Steel Workers and the other C. I. O. unions are doing the only thing which will effectively protect your rights and freedom. You are organizing politically, so that what decency and dignity you may acquire by collective bargaining cannot be taken away from you by political judges, controlled police forces, and private thugs. And I also tell you that, unless you and your friends exercise vigilant watch over the control of the affairs of your cities, counties, State, and Nation, you will never be secure from the threat that some future Henry C. Frick might again beat you down into blood-stained and profitable submission to his will. There are still plenty of Sewell Averys of the Montgomery Ward Co. and Mittens of the Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. in the Republican Party.

To protect your wages, your hours of labor, your dignity as human beings and your rights as American citizens, you must register and you must vote, and you must make sure that your votes are counted. You must register and vote for your friends and against the enemies of labor.

You are fortunate today in that you have had the matchless liberal leadership of Franklin Delano Roosevelt for the last 12 years—and we are going to have his leadership for the next 4 years. He is a true friend of labor because he is a true American. He has been called a traitor to his class because he saw that a house divided against itself cannot stand, that this Nation cannot endure half bond-holders and half bread-lines. He saved labor and he saved capital, and his chief reward for this, so far as capital is concerned, has been to be called every dirty name in the book.

My record in politics has been consistently liberal—I have given unstinted loyalty and support to all the great Democratic liberal leaders of my time, including William Jennings Bryan, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and constantly admired the liberalism of Theodore Roosevelt, Robert La Follette, Sr., and George Norris, of Nebraska. I put the Bituminous Coal Act on the statute books and fought many a battle, successful as well as otherwise, for the liberal measures sponsored by President Roosevelt's administration. The kindest thing that the Republicans have said about me is that I am a politician. I have come to the conclusion that, in Republican eyes, a liberal who fails is a statesman, a liberal who succeeds is a corrupt politician, and a liberal who leads successfully is a dangerous demagogue. Well, I haven't made a political failure of my liberalism, so I guess I'll never be called anything but a politician, except among my friends.

You know that I led the fight for the renomination of that great American and great liberal, HENRY WALLACE, at the Chicago convention. I am sorry that the convention did not select him as President Roosevelt's running mate, because, in my opinion, HENRY WALLACE is one of the greatest living liberals in the world today. He is a comparatively young man—and has much time—and I am sure that this Nation has not heard the last of HENRY WALLACE.

However, I am frank to say that since HENRY WALLACE could not receive the nomination, I am delighted that the convention chose HARRY TRUMAN to be President Roosevelt's running mate. For 9 years I sat beside HARRY TRUMAN in the Senate of the United States. We have always voted together on every measure for the rights and dignity of labor and for the welfare and protection of our servicemen. HARRY TRUMAN went out to do battle against the huge corporations which had graciously consented to manufacture the weapons needed by our armed forces, and he forced them to disgorge millions upon millions of dollars of unearned and exorbitant profits. He did this with such skill, knowledge, and dignity that I have yet to hear anyone call Senator TRUMAN a demagog. They do call him a politician. The rights of American labor and the privileges of American citizens will be in safe hands with Roosevelt and TRUMAN on the ticket.

I shall, of course, support Roosevelt and TRUMAN all the way down the line, as I know you will do. I rely on you to help carry Pennsylvania for Roosevelt and TRUMAN next November. We of the State Democratic organization cannot do so without your active support. We not only need you to register and to vote, we need your advice, we need the cooperation of vigorous leadership.

For I tell you that organized labor, under the leadership of Phil Murray and the C. I. O., is one of the most dynamic sources of social action, the only testing ground of political leadership in modern America. Everywhere else, the springs are running dry. Outside of the Farmers' Union, there is little farm leadership today that is not admitted to be subservient to the packers, millers, processors, and warehousemen. If the farms could again produce an Abraham Lincoln, you can rest assured that the Republican National Committee would throw him out on his ear and probably have MARTIN DIES investigate him as a Communist. The last great leader of American capitalism died before we entered the last war—the elder J. P. Morgan. The living great leader of American industry is now in his eighties and I see no new Henry Ford springing up with a billion-dollar business. Only in labor organizations do we find the vigor of leadership, the courage, and the imagination which gives hope for the future of our institutions. We call on you to work with us and to share the responsibilities and rewards with us. We don't want electoral cannon fodder; we do want full and fair political partnership.

This is particularly true with respect to the changes which are coming throughout the Nation, particularly in the South. Certain reactionary southern political bosses, who are Republicans in everything but name, have long been waiting for the twentieth century to blow over. Since the twentieth century intends to keep on rolling along for two or three more generations, these southern reactionaries have become desperate.

Here is an example. The Chamber of Commerce of the State of Virginia has adopted a resolution which opposes the industrialization of Virginia. This is because industry brings labor, labor organizes, labor pays its poll taxes, labor registers, and labor votes. And if labor votes in Virginia, then there is no hope for the old machine. But the South is being industrialized. Southern labor is organizing, southern labor has registered, and is voting. MARTIN DIES, of Texas, is no longer to be in Congress. JOE STARNES of Alabama is also going on a permanent vacation from the House of Representatives after next January. Senator "COTTON ED" SMITH of South Carolina has also been retired by the voters of his State, but CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, and LISTER HILL, of Alabama, both liberals and friends of labor, were renominated in the face of the biggest corporate slush-funds in the history of southern politics. The Roosevelt-haters and labor-baiters are on their way out. Practical liberalism is on the march and labor is marching with it, shoulder to shoulder.

That is why I repeat to you—organize, organize, organize; register, register, register; vote, vote, vote. Make your votes count and see that your votes are counted. Vote for your friends and against your enemies. That is American history and the American way.

It would be a great mistake to assume that a few victories here and there will do the trick. The reactionaries are desperate and are up in arms. They will use money on a scale never before witnessed in American politics. They will resort to every known trick and use some new ones to hold down the vote and juggle the election returns. They have already succeeded in making it practically impossible for the bulk of our servicemen to vote this year and they admit that they did so because they knew our soldiers and sailors would vote 10 to 1 for Roosevelt. They rely on the dislocation of industrial labor by migration to war plants to hold down the labor vote and they rely on differences between the leaders of organized labor to divide the labor vote. They will appeal to every prejudice, every gripe, and every grouch. They will try to turn the farmers against labor and to turn the professional and businessmen against both farmers and labor. They will appeal to foreign isms and passions and spasms to hyphenate the electorate, just as they did in 1920.

That means that victory in this campaign, like victory in this war, depends almost entirely on you, and your wives and daughters. If you don't register, if you and your wives and daughters don't vote, if you don't make your votes count and if you don't see that your votes are counted, the enemies of organized labor may steal this election the way they stole the presidential election of 1876 from Samuel J. Tilden and the way they counted out William Jennings Bryan in 1896.

All I can offer to you in the way of solidarity and service is yours for the asking. I am for Roosevelt and TRUMAN—I am for the New Deal—I am a life-long liberal Democrat. I am also an American and I unhesitatingly phophesy that unless Roosevelt is reelected this November the fate of America will not be pleasant to contemplate. No Republican leader, however plump or youthful, could stand up for 5 minutes against the avalanche of greed and graft, reaction and ignorance, which would sweep into office with him.

Everything that labor has fought for and achieved during the past two generations would be knocked down and the country as a whole would be paralyzed and divided at the moment when our whole future depends on unity of purpose and decisive action. This is labor's responsibility and labor's opportunity. On you, the men and women who staff our giant industries, depend to a great extent the hope for liberalism and organized labor.

Pollution Problem of Delaware River

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following address delivered by me at a meeting of representatives from governing bodies of municipalities located in southern New Jersey, at a meeting called by Mayor Dempsey, of Paulsboro, N. J., to consider the subject of pollution in the Delaware River, and held in the high-school auditorium on the evening of August 17, 1944:

There is no doubt that the waters of the Delaware River in the Camden-Gloucester-Philadelphia area are polluted. The odors that result are nauseating. It is disgraceful. It should never have been permitted to reach the outrageous conditions that now exist, nor should it be permitted to continue. It calls for the united action of all public officials and citizens.

In finding a remedy for it there are many conditions, having a bearing upon the subject, that must be given consideration before a decision can be made as to whether it is a national, State, interstate, or local responsibility, or a joint responsibility upon the part of some or all of these.

LOCAL RESPONSIBILITY

In the first place, what is the cause of the pollution of which we complain? Much has been said about it being the duty of the Federal Government to clean up the mess. Those who advocate this cannot and do not say that it has been caused in any degree whatsoever by the Federal Government. What is the cause of it? Who is responsible for it?

It is admitted to be the direct result of raw sewage being dumped into the river by cities and towns bordering on it or its tributaries, and the waste that comes from industries similarly located.

The chief offenders in this vicinity are the cities of Camden, Gloucester, and Philadelphia. Of course, there are other contributing factors, but these three cities are the chief offenders. If they assumed the responsibility they each owe to their own citizens and treated the raw sewage before it was dumped into the river, the conditions of which we complain would in large measure disappear.

They owe such a duty not only to their own citizens, but likewise to the citizens of every community in the surrounding area who now suffer from the obnoxious odors arising from the filth these cities pour into the river every day.

Every municipality in this area, outside of Camden and Gloucester, have constructed sewage-disposal plants to provide proper sanitary safeguards for their citizens. And, from information I have, the same is true of the municipalities bordering on the city of Philadelphia.

Why should the cities of Camden or Gloucester, in defiance of the laws of New Jersey, be permitted to dump their sewage into the river and thereby help create an annoyance for every citizen within miles of either city? Or, why should these cities expect to be privileged above all others in the United States and have the Federal Government build their sewage-disposal system out of the Federal Treasury?

The Federal Government never has done it, and it is my opinion it will not and cannot in the days ahead with a $300,000,000,000 debt staring us in the face, and an expanded Budget that will be necessary to take care of our maimed and handicapped soldiers, their widows and orphans, and to provide increased hospital facilities, unemployment compensation for returning soldiers and unemployed war workers, and all the other additional and exceptional expenses incident to the war. No; the Federal Government will have need of all the income it can get to take care of these necessary expenses that are the outgrowth of the war. This will preclude any possibility of a change of policy in this regard at any time within the foreseeable future. To accomplish it would be necessary for the President to reverse the stand he has already taken in these matters. I will make further reference to the President's opposition to the type of legislation proposed by Mr. Morrissey, solicitor of the city of Camden.

In my opinion it is not only unfair to other communities but it is unjust and unpatriotic in times such as these for the representatives of Camden and Gloucester to demand, or to expect, that the Federal Government shall use the receipts from the income taxes collected from the citizens of Collingswood, Oaklyn, Haddonfield, Westville, Woodbury, Paulsboro, Pitman, Glassboro, Elmer, Woodstown, Swedesboro, Salem, and, all the other communities here and elsewhere to help pay for a sewage system for these two cities and any others that have been delinquent in performing up to this time the responsibility they owed to their citizens.

MORRISSEY PROPOSAL CONTRARY TO NATIONAL POLICY

Furthermore, an important fact, in the history of Federal antipollution legislation, has been entirely overlooked by the representatives of the cities of Camden and Gloucester in their advocacy of the so-called Morrissey proposal (H. J. Res. 303), which would require the Federal Government: "To construct such new sewage-disposal system or systems; alter, repair, improve, and modernize such present sewage-disposal systems as by such survey the Chief of Engineers shall determine to be feasible and necessary."

That requirement is without a doubt one of the most preposterous, or, probably I should say ambitious, declarations of policy that to my knowledge has ever been proposed as a remedy for pollution in navigable streams. If that policy were to be adopted it would mean that the Federal Government would not only be required to construct new sewage systems and alter, repair, improve, and modernize existing disposal systems in the Delaware River Basin but also everywhere else in the Nation, because you couldn't adopt such a policy for this locality and deny it to others.

But, the important fact that has been entirely overlooked by those who drew the proposed Morrissey bill, and those who now promise to introduce it in Congress and procure its passage, is that it is directly contrary to the policy laid down by President Roosevelt when he vetoed an antipollution bill passed by both Houses of Congress in 1938.

VINSON-BARKLEY ANTIPOLLUTION BILL

The bill to which I refer was the culmination of 20 or more years of effort to provide a national solution of the problem of pollution in the navigable waters of the United States. It had the support of the United States Department of Public Health, all of the State departments of health, local departments of health, national and State associations organized to combat pollution in streams, business, industrial, sportsmen, and recreational groups. There was practically a complete unanimity of support. The authors of this legislation were two of the strongest and most outstanding supporters of the present administration. They were Senator BARKLEY, Democratic leader in the Senate, and Congressman FRED VINSON, whose close contact with the present administration is evidenced by the fact that he was appointed a United States Circuit Court judge by the President and later recalled by the President to act as Director of Economic Stabilization, who together with former Supreme Court Justice Byrnes, as Director of War Mobilization, are the two most powerful and important personages in the official life of Washington, outside of the President. The fact that they are often spoken of as Assistant Presidents is an indication of their strength and importance.

I have mentioned the names of Senator BARKLEY and Congressman VINSON as the authors of the antipollution bill that the President vetoed after it had passed both Senate and House, to indicate (1) the strong support from a political standpoint that was back of the bill, and (2) that if these two important persons in the present administration were unable to get enacted an antipollution bill because of a Presidential veto, it is preposterous to take seriously the promises of prospective candidates as to what they would do if elected.

The passage of the Vinson-Barkley antipollution bill was looked upon as the first step, but an important step, in remedying the conditions growing out of pollution in navigable streams. It created a division on pollution in the United States Public Health Bureau and was to be operated in conjunction with the office of Chief of Engineers of the War Department. It provided for studies and surveys in connection with State departments of health and interstate commissions where such were in existence. It recognized State and local jurisdiction. It authorized an initial appropriation of $300,000 to be expended by the new division on pollution and $700,000 to be divided between the several States faced with the pollution problem to enable them to make the several studies and surveys that might be necessary. And, most important of all, it provided for 30-percent grants and 70-percent loans, at low interest rates, to municipalities that might not otherwise be financially able to bear the cost or raise the money for construction of sewage-disposal systems. It also provided loans to be granted to industries, at a low rate of interest, to enable them to construct facilities that would purify their waste before pulling it into navigable streams.

The grants and loans to municipalities and loans to the industry were provided for in the Vinson-Barkley bill on the basis of P. W. A. grants and loans in effect at that time. This provision was made a part of the bill to encourage municipalities and industries to eliminate the contribution they were making to the pollution of streams by dumping raw sewage into such streams. The bill was finally passed by both Houses of Congress after long and comprehensive hearings and careful deliberation. The unanimous support accorded the bill was a recognition of the need for such legislation and the fact that a satisfactory solution of the problem had been attained.

VETO OF VINSON-BARKLEY ANTIPOLLUTION BILL BY PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Having in mind the years of effort that finally culminated in the passage of the Vinson-Barkley bill, you can readily realize the keen disappointment that was felt when the President vetoed the bill. All the work and effort that had been put forth went for naught. It was all lost.

The basis of the President's veto was that under the terms of the bill the Bureau of the Budget, which is under the direction of the President, was not given an opportunity to pass upon the merits of such projects "in their proper relation to the merits of other projects of a similar nature, and all of those projects be then considered in their relation to the needs of the other Government activities that are presented for incorporation in the annual Budget."

The President in the same message said: "I appreciate the importance of the results sought to be accomplished by the legislation, and I fully approve the establishment of a Division of Water Pollution Control in the Public Health Service." In view of this acknowledgment by the President as to the importance of the legislation, many of those interested in the bill felt that, under all the circumstances, it was unfortunate that such a good cause had to be lost because of what seemed to them to be a technical reason.

MORRISSEY PROPOSAL (H. J. RES. 303) CONTRARY TO PRESIDENT'S POLICY

Therefore, we are faced with the fact that any bill that does not meet the requirement laid down by the President in his veto message would never have a chance of becoming law.

Thus, the so-called Morrissey-Wene proposal would not have a chance of successfully avoiding a Presidential veto, even though it passed Congress, and there would be no likelihood of it doing that. It fails completely to recognize the necessity of Budget control in any of its provisions. Furthermore, it does not comply with the policies or plans laid down by the National Resources Committee composed of representative experts from the Departments of War, Treasury, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from private and State agencies. This committee at the direction of the President, made a study on water pollution in the United States, together with the financial, technical, and administrative aspects of such a program. The report when made to the President, was transmitted to Congress with his approval. Thus it represents the viewpoint of the present administration in Washington.

This report and the President's messages to Congress leave no doubt that there is no intention upon the part of this administration to construct sewage disposal plants for municipalities as provided for in the Morrissey-Wene bill (H. J. Res. 303). The President has made this very clear in his message transmitting the report of the National Resources Committee to Congress. With reference to this subject, he said: "No quick and easy solution of these problems is in sight. The committee estimates that an expenditure by public and private agencies of approximately $2,000,000,000 over a period of 10 to 20 years may be required to construct works necessary to abate the more objectionable pollution. Inasmuch as the needed works are chiefly treatment plants for municipal sewage and industrial waste, the responsibility for them rests primarily with municipal government and private industry."

Another enlightening statement was made by the President in the same message when he expressed his viewpoint with respect to the extent that the Federal Government should participate. He said:

"It is my opinion that pending further experimentation with interstate and State enforcement activities Federal participation in pollution abatement should take the general form of establishing a central technical agency to promote and coordinate education, research, and enforcement. On the basis of recent experience, it should be supplemented by a system of Federal grants-in-aid and loans organized with due regard for the integrated use and control of water resources and for a balanced Federal program for public works of all types. The time is overdue for the Federal Government to take vigorous leadership along these lines."

Thus, it will be seen that the President is of the opinion that the Federal Government is not primarily responsible for the construction of municipal-sewage systems, but that such responsibility belongs to the municipalities and private industry causing the pollution, and, that any Federal contribution can be only on a grant-loan basis to municipalities and loans to industry.

PENDING BARKLEY-SPENCE BILLS PROVIDE SOLUTION

I assume that having called to the attention of the sponsors of the Morrissey-Wene bill that it is not in conformity with the President's program, and, that they are working at cross purposes to the President, that they, as loyal supporters of the President, will cease to advocate the passage of that bill and will give their support, as I do, to Senate bill 1989, introduced in the Senate by Senator BARKLEY, or its companion bill, H. R. 4741, introduced in the House by Congressman SPENCE.

The above mentioned bills provide for water-pollution-control activities in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes. The bills would charge the United States Public Health Service with certain responsibilities and duties in the preparation of comprehensive plans for eliminating or reducing pollution and improving the sanitary condition of the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto after investigation and in cooperation with other Federal and State agencies, the encouragement of cooperative activities by the States, and the rendering of technical aid in specific pollution problems of States, political subdivisions, and industrial plants. The bills would also provide for Federal aid in the form of grants or loans for the construction of necessary treatment works, and authorize appropriations to provide for the costs of approved projects and for allotment to the States for the promotion, investigation, surveys, and studies necessary in the prevention and control of water pollution.

A study of these bills will show that they have been carefully drawn and satisfy the principles and policies laid down by the President as a basis for this type of legislation. These bills should have the support of all municipal bodies and citizens who are interested in remedying the evils of pollution in navigable streams.

I have discussed the question from a legislative standpoint to make plain that the Morrissey-Wene plan is doomed to failure from the very beginning. The bills already introduced known as the Barkley-Spence bills are the only ones that merit and should have the support of all who are sincerely in favor of anti-pollution legislation. No good is accomplished by advocating a bill that is contrary to the President's program and for which administration support could not be obtained. We must be realistic in these matters if we wish to accomplish anything. Knowing as I do the situation, from my years of contact with the subject, I am unwilling to give lip service to a bill that I know cannot be adopted or receive Presidential approval. The Barkley-Spence measures are the only bills that have a chance of surviving a Presidential veto. Therefore, I am wholeheartedly in support of these measures.

CITIES OF CAMDEN, GLOUCESTER FAILED TO TAKE ADVANTAGE OF P. W. A. FUNDS

Now, I wish to bring to your attention several matters that have direct relationship to the overall picture. First, why didn't the cities that are now causing the pollution of the river apply for P. W. A. funds when such were available. Under that program the cities of Camden and Gloucester and all other similarly situated could have received 55 percent of the cost of sewer disposal systems as grants from the Federal Government and the balance of 45 percent on long-term loans at a low rate of interest. They made application for and obtained Federal assistance for many other worthwhile projects, as well as for some that were not so worthwhile. They received hundreds of thousands of dollars, in fact, I think it would amount to several million dollars, to carry on such projects. When such application were made it was my privilege and pleasure as Member of Congress from this district to assist in obtaining such funds to relieve unemployment.

Why wasn't similar application made by the authorities of Camden and Gloucester for the construction of sewage-disposal systems? If they had done so and brought their applications to my attention I would have gladly and willingly done my part in having them approved and funds allotted. But, no man, no matter who he is, or, his standing in Congress, could obtain funds under P. W. A. or W. P. A. without an application first having been made by the municipality sponsoring the project. This was not done to my knowledge by either Camden or Gloucester cities. In fact, according to my information, no detailed plans and specifications have ever been drawn for such sewage-disposal systems. I have been further informed, and, it is a pleasure to know, that Philadelphia has already taken steps to do their part in preventing pollution of the river and their plans are far advanced toward a $42,00,000 expenditure for sewage-disposal systems.

COURT ACTION TAKEN AGAINST CAMDEN AND GLOUCESTER TO STOP THEIR POLLUTING DELAWARE RIVER IN DEFIANCE OF STATE LAW

The situation that now confronts Camden and Gloucester is how to finance their construction of sewage-disposal systems. Unfortunately, they are now faced, as they have been for more than 2 years, with a suit in the New Jersey Court of Chancery instituted by the New Jersey State Department of Health, seeking an injunction to prevent them from longer polluting the Delaware River. For years these two cities have been openly and flagrantly violating a State statute by dumping untreated sewage in the river. When every peaceful means had been tried by the State board of health to get these two cities to desist their unlawful practices without avail, and, their patience having been exhausted by delaying tactics, then, the State board of health took their case into the court of chancery. Although that case was started more than 2 years ago, these two cities have adopted every subterfuge conceivable to trained legal minds to keep the case from being tried on its merits. However, at last Gloucester City has admitted its guilt and consented to a decree being entered against it. The case against the city of Camden is scheduled to come before the court this coming October. It will be interesting to see whether some new effort for delay will be made or, will that city, like Gloucester, admit its guilt.

We all know that pollution of the river has been a continuing offense. Officials of both cities have been aware of it, as well as knowing that the cities over which they had authority were guilty of contributing to it. Why has no interest been taken toward eliminating it until this time? From statements that have been made by some of those responsible for this delay and do-nothing attitude, I am inclined to wonder whether it has not been brought up at this time for political purposes, or, as a further basis of delay of the suit now pending in the court of chancery. It may be contemplated to ask for another adjournment on the ground that Congress is expected to do something by way of constructing a sewage-disposal plant for Camden. Well, if such is the thought of those who now agitate the matter, let me warn again that the Morrissey bill will be a weak straw on which to lean.

It is regrettable from the standpoint of the citizens of Camden and Gloucester that there hasn't been more action and less talk by their officials. It is particularly regrettable that neither of these cities, in the interest of their citizens, did not avail themselves of P. W. A. funds when they were to be had as work relief assistance. If they had done so 55 percent of the cost would have been contributed by the Federal Government and the balance loaned for a long term of years and low interest rate. Today, those funds are not available and yet these cities advocate a bill that would require the Federal Government to pay the whole cost of construction, and the cities supply merely the land.

FUTURE FEDERAL ASSISTANCE UNCERTAIN

Looking into the future no one can tell at this time whether P. W. A. will be reinstated in the post-war period to supply employment by public work. Congress is now devoting its attention to legislation that will provide unemployment compensation. If there is general unemployment during the post-war period, it is a question whether the Federal Government will be in a position to carry on both programs for unemployment assistance. I am certain legislation will be passed for unemployment compensation. As to whether there will be another P. W. A. program, I do not know at this time. The committee having the matter in charge has not made its report as yet. We do know, however, that with a public debt of $300,000,000,000, and the added expense under the G. I. bill, caring for our returning soldiers, which may amount to $6,000,000,000 per year, together with all the other expenses for increasing the number of hospitals, providing hospitalization, disability compensation, etc., there will be little opportunity for the Federal Government making any large grants to municipalities. If the Federal Government does not do so, then the cities of Camden and Gloucester will have a difficult problem to solve.

There is much more I could and would like to say on this subject, but time prevents. Although much that I have said has applied to Camden and Gloucester, yet, it is justified because when you consider the pollution problem, it is necessary to ascertain who is contributing to it. Philadelphia, Camden, and Gloucester are the chief offenders in this locality. Philadelphia is getting ready to do its part to remedy its part of the problem, and, the cities of Camden and Gloucester should do their part or there will be no relief from the noxious odors that now permeate the air.

In conclusion, permit me to say that I have brought to the attention of the United States Public Health Service, the New Jersey Department of Health, and the Interstate Commission on the Delaware River Basin, and also the chief of Army engineers in the War Department, the complaints that have been made relative to something in the air that eats paint off of houses and turns silverware a dark color. By some it is claimed that this is due to the pollution in the river. That may be true, I don't know. It seems strange that this condition did not exist in the past, so far as I have heard, and yet we have had pollution in the river for several years. Therefore, I have asked the agencies of Government to which I have referred to make an investigation of the cause. It may be due to some of the chemical plants operating in this locality.

As to this, as well as the question of pollution, I give my sincere assurance of my desire to cooperate with governing bodies of our several municipalities and their citizens in finding a practicable and worth-while solution of the problem.

Establishment of a Stable Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include Governor Dewey's forthright statement, outlining plainly some of the basic principles on which alone a stable peace can be established. This should clear the atmosphere of any uncertainty regarding his position and that of the present-day Republican Party on this all-important matter, and should thereby contribute materially to the success of the talks soon to begin between the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China.

It is high time we had such plain speaking and vigorous leadership. To straddle or be vague on such a vital matter would be to betray the millions of Americans who are risking their lives to win victory so that we can have another chance to solve our basic problem of getting nations to live together in peace on this planet.

The statement recognizes that what most of us Americans want is not a Republican or a Democratic foreign policy, but an American foreign policy; just as the Monroe Doctrine has always been an American foreign policy, not partisan but national, and therefore stable, continuing, predictable.

Furthermore, it makes clear that while we Americans greatly desire an international organization to work out and maintain peace because we realize its importance for our own future political and economic security, nevertheless we cannot be misled into taking a Four Power alliance as a substitute.

Sovereign equality of nations does not mean that nations are or ever will be equal in size, strength, or power. It means that they are and must be equal before the law—that is, all bound, whether large or small, by the same mutually agreed-upon rules of conduct in their international relations, just as New York and Rhode Island, though unequal in size, population, wealth, are still bound by the same law.

It is daydreaming to imagine we can get real peace under any system which would have, in effect, one set of rules for the strong and another for the weak. There can be no hope for peace except as we succeed in achieving in full, frank cooperation with all other like-minded nations agreement as to the "traffic rules" by which the relations between all law-abiding nations are to be conducted. The Big Four necessarily and properly will make larger contributions than the smaller nations, but they must themselves agree to the same rules and procedures as the weak—otherwise it will not be a fair and just order, will never be accepted by the sixty-odd small nations, and can lead only to early renewal of strife.

We in America, both officials and people, need to be reminded frequently of this blunt fact, and so do the governments with which we are negotiating. It is reassuring to have Secretary Hull disclose that no arrangement based on a return to power politics by the strong is contemplated. It is impossible to avoid alarming speculation and rumors when we have to go for months without authoritative statements from those in charge of our foreign policy. The whole Nation, and our allies as well, are greatly indebted to Governor Dewey for his timely, clear-cut, and unequivocal restatement of these tested and eternally sound principles.

Mr. Dewey's statement follows:

Simultaneously with smashing military victories which bring the day of peace ever nearer, it is good that representatives of the British, Russian, and Chinese Governments will meet shortly with our State Department for preliminary discussion of a permanent international organization to maintain the peace. Partial proposed plans have already been made public by the American, British, and Russian Governments. The American people are agreed upon the need for world organization. It is a bipartisan objective. It has been repeatedly urged by the Republican Party and its leaders. The future of the world will depend upon the ideals, the sound thinking and the justice of the results achieved at these conferences.

I have been deeply disturbed by some of the recent reports concerning the forthcoming conference. These indicate that it is planned to subject the nations of the world, great and small, permanently to the coercive power of the four nations holding this conference.

TWO ASPECTS INVOLVED

In order that there may be no apprehension, I should like to make clear some fundamentals as I see them. The problem of future peace has two aspects. One relates to Germany and Japan. They must, of course, be wholly and conclusively defeated. More than that, they must be rendered permanently powerless to renew tyranny and attack. Their defeat will be achieved primarily by the united power of Britain, Russia, China, and the United States. To insure that Germany and Japan shall never again be able to disrupt the peace of the world, these four allies must maintain their present unity.

I have consistently advocated the maintenance for some time after the war of close military cooperation among the four powers so that if the Germans or the Japanese hereafter seek to evade their disarmament, we may strike quickly, together and with overwhelming might. That is a specific responsibility of the victors. It is an essential part of the winning of the war. This responsibility to keep Germany and Japan disarmed should be shared with liberated peoples, but it cannot immediately be delegated to a world-wide organization while such organization is yet new and untried.

In organizing permanent peace among the rest of the world, after the difficult post-war period, a very different attitude must be taken. In some of these proposals there appears to be a cynical intention that the four great Allied Powers shall continue for all time to dominate the world by force and through individual agreements as to spheres of influence. I hope and pray that no such reactionary purpose will be allowed to dominate the conferences, else the peace of the world will as surely as night follows day again be destroyed.

The fact that we four have developed overwhelming power as against our enemies does not give us the right to organize the world so that we four will always be free to do what we please while the rest of the world is made subject to our coercion. That would be the rankest form of imperialism. Such a proposal would be rejected by the American people.

Within the area of peace-loving nations, peace is a task of cooperation among equal and sovereign nations. Force is essential in any realistic program for the permanent maintenance of peace. But in the long-term solution of international problems, peace and security cannot be left to the sanction of force alone. To leave them exclusively in the hands of a permanent military alliance of four victorious powers would be immoral. It would be a denial of the ideals for which we are fighting.

DENOUNCES IMMORAL FORCE

The millions of Americans are not fighting and dying to dominate the world or impose our will upon freedom-loving people. We are fighting for our own freedom and to establish once and for all the rights of people everywhere to live in peace and freedom, safeguarded from the coercion of more powerful nations.

As Americans we believe with all our hearts in the equality and the rights of small nations and minorities. We believe in the essential equality and dignity of the individual, wherever he lives. We believe in his right to freedom as well as our own. We do not believe that we or any other power has the inherent right to control his destiny. We are fighting this war to a victorious conclusion for these very principles. They must not be lost in a cynical peace by which any four powers dominate the earth by force.

We must not sink into the abyss of power politics. We must rise to a new high level of cooperation and joint effort among respected and sovereign nations to work for and to preserve the peace of the world through all the years to come, based on freedom, equality, and justice.

PLEADS FOR FULL RIGHTS

The kind of world organization we seek must concern itself with the basic causes of world disorder. It must promote a world opinion that will influence the nations to right conduct. It must develop international law. It must create an international tribunal to deal with international disputes.

In the kind of permanent world organization we seek, all nations, great and small, must be assured of their full rights. For such an organization military force must be the servant, not the master. Only thus can we achieve the fellowship of peoples which is the essence of lasting peace. It would be a tragedy if the coming conference among the British, Russians, Chinese, and ourselves should be distracted from the task of planning for a genuine world organization for peace by proposals which amount merely to a permanent four-power military alliance to control the world.

Interstate Commerce Commission

REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, in response to many requests from representative groups of my district, State, and region, I am today introducing a bill to require the continuous membership of some New England resident on the Interstate Commerce Commission.

For many years past, this important section of the country which has made notable contributions to the industrial, financial, and general economic progress of the Nation, and whose present contributions to the war effort continue to be so outstanding and certainly unexcelled by any other section of the country, was represented on the Interstate Commerce Commission by the late and very much lamented Joseph B. Eastman.

Commissioner Eastman, one of the ablest administrators of his time, rendered exceptional service to his country. During a period that saw many revolutionary changes in transportation, industry, and concepts of interstate commerce, and which was characterized by unusual and successful expansion of transportation and commerce, Mr. Eastman played a dominating part in shaping and directing the policies of this most important governmental agency.

Naturally, the people of our section believed that his successor would be selected from New England, whose interests are so powerfully interwoven with American industrial and transportation patterns. For the first time in very many years, if the nomination of Mr. Eastman's successor is confirmed by the Senate, New England will be without representation in this vital field of Federal control.

I am not questioning in any respect either the character, the ability, or fitness of the present nominee to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I know nothing about his background, his availability, or his qualifications, and certainly do not wish even to appear to be questioning them. On the other hand, I am taking this means of emphatically protesting against the omission, perhaps for the first time since its inception, so far as I know, of a representative of the New England States on this Commission.

Many other sections of the country are represented on this body, and it is right and proper that they should be. Every section of our great Nation has special interests in transportation facilities, rates, and the general flow of interstate commerce, and for that reason it is only fair and just that each section should have some representation on this Commission acquainted with its special problems in a position to defend and advance its interests.

As presently constituted, the Commission is comprised of members from Indiana, North Dakota, Oregon, Iowa, Idaho, Washington, D. C., Pennsylvania, Texas, Tennessee, Alabama, and South Carolina. It is obvious from casual examination of this roster that it is out of balance, that it does not take into account many important industrial and agricultural States, and sections.

Undoubtedly, a statute might be drawn requiring specific representation of all the principal regions of the Nation with reference to their particular economic interests, leaving some members to be appointed at large without regard to sectional considerations. For the present, however, because I am intensely interested in insuring appropriate and deserved representation on this Commission for New England and desire to bring the matter forcibly to the attention of the Congress, I have thought it wise to present this measure, and I am certain that the appropriate committee of this House will consider the measure as soon as is practicable with a view to reporting it to the House for action. I will welcome suggestions and perfecting amendments which will make this measure responsive not only to the needs of New England alone, but to the needs of every section and group in the entire Nation.

Shall We Fight a Third World War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. O. C. FISHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Brownwood (Tex.) Bulletin of June 22, 1944:

SHALL WE FIGHT A THIRD WORLD WAR?

The citizens of these United States must decide whether there shall be a third world war.

Parents, wives, brothers, and sisters of men who are giving their lives to preserve the right of Americans to decide such matters must choose which road the Nation shall follow.

It would be quite simple if all were permitted to vote ballots labelled "For" and "Against" a third world conflict. But the issue is likely to be confused; it is likely to be cloaked in elaborate camouflage. And the longer a decision is delayed, the more certain is the issue to be clouded.

Every school child knows that in times of peace the United States has maintained only a token military force; that we have never been fully prepared for any war in which we have engaged. Twice within 25 years the Nation has had to prepare while our citizens were being killed by the enemy. Luck and providence have been on our side.

Whether there shall be a third world war depends upon the American people. No nation would dare attack a fully armed and equipped United States of America.

We were lulled to sleep, after the First World War, by talk of permanent peace. We were told that no one would dare start another such cataclysm; that the world could not afford another war.

Jap bombs falling at Pearl Harbor provided a rude awakening.

The world has never known permanent peace.

Certainly there can be no substantial and lasting peace unless we buy insurance against a third world war.

Universal military training for American youths, coupled with adequate and sustained development of military, naval, and aviation material, is such insurance.

When peace comes again, this Nation can choose one of these two paths:

1. It can become a hermit Nation.

2. It can accept the responsibilities of a great world power.

China once chose the first course. China built a Great Wall to shut out the barbarians. China wanted only peace. Today China is fighting for its national life against invading hordes. Science developed weapons to tear down the Great Wall.

Wide oceans and solemn treaties were our Great Wall after World War No. 1. With Germany, Japan, and other nations we signed an agreement never to resort to force as a means of settling disputes. We negotiated another treaty limiting navies, and sank some warships to prove our good faith.

Then we dozed—and awoke to find bombs falling around us.

If we are to avoid a third world war there must be more than walls, more than treaties. We must have insurance which will protect us against foreign aggression.

Such scientific strides have been made that in the third world war—if we do not prevent it—armies will span wide oceans within the space of a few hours aboard huge warships in the air, on the sea, and beneath the sea. Scientists of many nations are striving to explore and to convert into power the tremendous energy of the atom. When that is accomplished, ocean barriers will fade away. And in the islands of the Pacific and on the beaches of Europe our amphibious forces have demonstrated that walls cannot be built to withstand modern arms. In the next war the power of offensive weapons will be immeasurably greater.

But peace might be perpetuated by building and maintaining a force capable of putting out small fires of conflict before they grow into world-girdling conflagrations.

We can do that through democratic universal military training.

Switzerland, a democracy, has universal military service and has managed to stay out of two world wars without being attacked. That proves false the claim that universal military training is an approach to militarism.

In America, more than a million young men finish high schools each year who need to learn discipline and who need the benefits of military training.

These youths could be trained for 1 year, during which they should be given vocational education along with military training. They should receive college credits enabling them to go from military classrooms and barracks into colleges of their choice as sophomore students.

Thus in 5 years the Nation would have a reserve of 5,000,000 trained youths, all under 25 years of age, ready for any emergency.

A sufficient number would select military careers to provide a regular army of 1,000,000 men.

The advantages of this program are tremendous.

It would protect the Nation against all aggressors.

It would improve the health, mental alertness and habits of these young men.

Remember the profligate youths of the twenties? Some called that a "lost generation." Rather, it was an underprivileged generation, denied the opportunity of training in responsibility. The crimes and wild escapades of some of those youths filled the front pages of American newspapers.

The large percentage of young men rejected by selective service examiners in this war constitutes a challenge to the Nation. Only through a program of disciplined health habits can the physical standard of American youth be raised.

Military training in peace is cheap, compared to the prodigal waste of such training during a war emergency. Twice within 25 years the Nation wasted billions in hurried preparations for war—enough to equip and maintain forever military naval and air reserves sufficient to protect the country against any combination of enemies.

Universal military training in peace time is economical and sound.

We can set an example before the world of a Nation strong and vigorous whose young men will be trained and equipped for the responsibility of protecting their country and who will be better citizens for such training.

We can build here a citadel of high civilization, with intelligent help for less fortunate peoples. And back up that friendly world attitude with the grim determination of a people who twice have paid the high price of unpreparedness, who have banished forever the opium dreams of a false utopia and are prepared to do their share, in concert with other nations whose interests and ideals parallel our own, to minimize and isolate wars, to discourage international animosities and to encourage freedom everywhere.

But an aroused public consciousness that will not be deceived on issues is necessary to prevent a third world war.

Now is the time to act. Now, while men are dying for peace, is the time to make possible a continuation of peace, once it has come, by demanding that America take out adequate insurance against a third world war.

The democratic kind of peace insurance: Universal military training for American youths.

If we do that, we may find that we have set up a permanent force capable of preventing wars.

Eternal vigilance is the price of freedom. Let us call now on our Senators and our Congressmen to strike a blow for a permanent American armed force to preserve and protect the peace and prevent the next great war.

It cannot be done too soon. After this war might be too late.

Address by Mexican Secretary of Foreign Affairs at Rio de Janeiro

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. CHAVEZ. Madam President, the third meeting of consultation of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the American Republics, held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, January 15–28, 1942, was an historical event of unusual importance.

The Secretary of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Mexico, Hon. Ezequiel Padilla, was in attendance at this conference as chief of the Mexican delegation, and delivered several addresses which have come to be recognized as outstanding contributions to the solidarity of this hemisphere.

I feel that it is in the interest of inter-American goodwill that the people of the United States be aware of the contribution made by the Mexican Secretary of Foreign Affairs to the war effort of the United Nations on that occasion. For this reason, I ask unanimous consent that the three addresses referred to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

These addresses are short, but powerful and persuasive.

It has been estimated that the printing of the addresses will require two and three-quarters pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at a cost of $143.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE OPENING MEETING OF THE CONFERENCE, JANUARY 15, 1942

We are here to deliberate on the fate of the Americas. War enfolds and stifles us, and day by day menaces us here, there, and everywhere.

As illustrious Chancelor Aranha has said, all our ideas are in imminent danger of perishing. We may no longer cherish the illusion that we are living in a quiet backwater where we shall be safe from the world catastrophe. Blood flows on every side and suffering lacerates all the continents.

Here, in this very hall, we have just heard from Secretary Sumner Welles' own lips one of the most moving narratives in the history of this continent. On December 7 last Japan treacherously launched an attack on the United States and sank several ships. Since then hundreds of men born in America have daily been falling as the course of war develops.

The first thing we must realize is that this attack on the United States by Japan is not only an assault on that country; it is an aggression by the totalitarian states on the world's democracies. It was not only an attack on the United States, on an American nation; it is an onset by a totalitarian power against the whole of America!

The men who gloriously fell on Wake Island and in the Philippines, wrapped in the folds of that very flag which we here see intertwined with the other 20 flags of the American continent, as a symbol of indissoluble unity, have not fallen in the defense of the honor and sovereignty of the United States alone. They have also met their death in the defense of human liberties and the free destinies of these Americas.

Amid circumstances thrillingly dramatic we have assembled at Rio de Janeiro. It is as though in response to an admonition of fate that we meet on that flank of our continent, which is, as geography teaches us, the most vulnerable point along its whole length. We have assembled not to discuss what cause it is that the Americas defend, for our forefathers have already pointed out the way, when conflict arises between liberty and despotism. We have met to perform our commitments of honor, to sign and seal American solidarity. We have assembled to plan the common defense of our hemisphere, to prepare an America that shall be ever stronger, more united, more invulnerable.

For reasons which we cannot analyze at this time, we were unable to face this terrible crisis with a big enough military force, with material power abundant enough to place at the service of the dramatic contest now being fought out in the cause of human freedom. There is, however, one treasure that all the nations of this continent can contribute: this is the unity of the Americas.

Enlightened minds have beforehand blazed the trails of continental solidarity, but there is something that draws us closer together in heart and will at this time: War, the danger that menaces with phosphorescent eyes that blink all around us in this darksome night that enfolds us.

As I crossed the Andes a few days ago, I sensed in imagination Bolivar's mighty figure and felt that his genius lay in having foreseen the destinies and the duty of the Americas. I called to mind those days so pregnant with unrest, when all the world's tyrannies framed a conspiracy, under the name of the Holy Alliance, to extinguish the urge for freedom of the nations. Then I realized the great resemblance between those times and these in whose grip we quiver.

Now, as then, a group of totalitarian nations, though this time much more powerful, leagued together to efface the very sources of human dignity. Now, as then, the Americas are in danger.

What would happen, what would the future of our Americas be, should war succeed in dividing and separating us from one another? This point has been analyzed by all the previous speakers. We would sink down into slavery. We would be carved up into colonies under masters utterly devoid of sympathy for human suffering. Our peoples would clash with one another, and a heritage of hate would spring up. America would ere long become a replica of what Europe is now: nations torn by discord, racial ferocity and rivalry, thirst for revenge ever unsatisfied.

If this is the international picture summoned up, within our peoples, dissensions easily inflamed by invisible war with all its technical advances, would sweep away, not only our incipient material civilization, but also something worth much more, the loss of which would be more painful still: our progress toward free institutions, brotherhood, and peace.

But it cannot be; I am sure that there is not one, among the noble peoples of the Americas, that will face so tremendous a responsibility. At the hour of the onslaught upon our nations, we shall not hear in the halls of American brotherhood those sinister words recorded in the first book of the Bible: "Am I my brother's keeper?"

On the other hand, if we can, united together, begin to live a truly pan-American life, how great a wealth of blessings will be showered upon the Americas. If we proclaim the pan-American doctrine, without falling into the grave responsibility of leaving it to unilateral initiative, because it is a doctrine that calls for action by all of us; if we pool our potential resources, together with the technics, the capital, and the initiative that we have available throughout our continent; if we can bequeath to our children, as a legacy, those splendid words that say that if any one of our countries is attacked by a nation outside this continent, all the nations will rise up, not merely one nor two, but the whole of America, to repel the invader just as though the outrage upon its sovereignty had been inflicted on its own flesh. Lastly, if we win the right to occupy seats at the council table of peace, what an enormous service we shall be able to render our Americas, by upholding a platform of national and international justice, for only from it may peace permanent and enduring flow.

Twenty-five years ago the victory of the Allies led us to believe that peave would last for ages. A single generation, however, has been sufficient to let loose another war, even more cruel and destructive, to scourge humanity. What was lacking was organized justice between the peoples. And when a single iniquity is left standing, it is even as the stone in David's sling, or a fiery torch in the hand of hatred and despair.

We must, on this continent, build up a world that shall be fairer to all, we must here work out a platform that shall mean justice to all. Iniquity still existent on vast areas of these Americas gnaws the very heart of the laboring masses.

If we can thus succeed in organizing not only an economic system but also in creating an American moral entity, we shall thus be able to show by means of our deliberations that what interests us is not only the building of shipyards and the construction of airplanes, of such enormous value in war, but also that there is something higher that we are anxious to build up—freedom for man in the Americas!

We have need of such things as cadmium, molybdenum, and other strategic material for war, but there is one other product that we must not overlook: free man in America, on whose brow shall shine the dignity of his manhood; man the consumer, the soldier, the custodian of liberty!

We must efface the very last stain of slavery on this American continent. Just as we must tear down the opprobrious gates of the Guiana prisons, for to this continent only men who seek liberty may come. In the same manner we must do away with economic servitude by promoting production free from slave competition in other regions of the earth!

If we can succeed by our own production in bestowing an existence measuring up to the standards set by the dignity of man, on the workers of the Americas; if what we advocate is not self-sufficiency, but only that in commercial interchange, such products be sold only to nations where salaries worthy of men and not starvation wages prevail; if we can, by means of the exchange of our wealth and work, uplift and dignify the life of man in the Americas, then, how grand would this Pan American Union become, how ethically magnificent, how crystal clear, how strong, to win the support of all the masses of the Americas!

The peoples of the Americas listen to the voice of democracy and hear us when we summon them to the defense of the American spirit. But we may not disregard the fact that the peoples of the Americas are still clamoring for justice; we must reflect that totalitarian philosophy is exploiting the pain of the multitudes, to instill into them a mystical force that gives them strength, that turns them into fanatics, that leads them to sacrifice.

If we, in turn, by our decisions, by our clear vision of the future, by our resolution to build up mighty American nations, should yet fail to create a doctrine, a faith, a hope, that will make the youth of the Americas feel proud to live for, they will not, either, be ready to die in their defense.

Arduous is the task that lies before us, but the atmosphere and the omens are favorable. There is unity in all of us. We all realize that we are face to face with destiny. This is a rendezvous in history that we may not fail to keep.

Mexico is a peace-loving country. "Respect for the right of others is peace," said Juárez, endorsing our action in the lawful defense of our soverignty; but Mexico, like all the other nations of the Americas, above all things craves the victory of human liberties. I deem this moment both solemn and propitious to declare that Mexico will, with the same energy, the same courage with which she has marched to sacrifice, to the struggle, often in the teeth of adversity and in unequal fight, to defend the principles of her sovereignty and her dream of social justice, Mexico will on this occasion step forward, full of conviction and devoted to the cause of democracy and the unity of the American peoples.

I want to bring this to a close by acknowledging with emotion that the 21 peoples of the Americas, and we might also say the glorious Canadian Nation as well, if only in the spirit, are here assembled with full conviction of the indestructible power of freedom and democracy. And as I send out, here in this mighty Brazilian Republic—that wonderful nation, the hope and pride of this continent, abounding in limitless material and spiritual wealth, equalitarian, tolerant, generous, and beautiful, for which my own country overflows with affection—a message of brotherhood and unity to all the peoples of the continent, I desire to express Mexico's wish and belief that we, at the deliberations of this historical assembly, shall only be guided by one command—the supreme imperative to defend the free destinies of the Americas.

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE MEETING OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE OF THE CONFERENCE ON WHICH OCCASION A RECOMMENDATION WAS ADOPTED TO THE EFFECT THAT THE AMERICAN NATIONS BREAK OFF RELATIONS WITH THE AXIS POWERS, JANUARY 23, 1942

This is a moment, there is no doubt about it, of transcendent historical importance. It is in itself an episode of the war.

I have listened to the representatives of Argentina and Chile, as they set forth the aspirations of their peoples at this assembly. I now, in my turn, look upon it as a right, a duty that I cannot shirk at this tremendous crisis, to lay the ideas of my own country before you. I feel almost certain that I am also about to express the views of the 19 nations that have seconded the proposal made by Mexico, Colombia, and Venezuela, that relations be broken off short.

Every ideal, including American unity, must draw for nourishment on the strength of all, like the great rivers of this continent. Two streams may appear to be entirely separate as they flow toward the sea, yet lower down they join at the mouth. I feel sure that our continental ideals will thus converge.

We are here today to debate with the picture of war before us. Our discussions are not going to develop with the calm atmosphere of peace for a background. The course of deliberation must necessarily be dissimilar in each case. The arguments of war are not the same as those of peace. Subjects of debate cannot but differ widely when the peoples dwell peaceably together, from when they clash by force of arms, aiming, on the one hand, to subjugate the world and on the other to save freedom from extinction.

In times of peace commerce between the nations is an artery of prosperity which it behooves the governments to promote and defend. In times of peace, however, the very word "danger" should put statesmen on their guard, so that they may avert it by pacific means, if possible. In times of peace, diplomatic courtesies and protection flourish like orchids in the hothouse of world civilization. But when we are faced by the problems of war we must speak another tongue. It could not be otherwise, for the homelands of the peoples, their heritage of freedom and spiritual values, are in jeopardy.

The peacetime merchant furthers the prosperity of his own country and evidences its brotherhood with all other nations. But he who trades with the enemy in time of war thereby enhances the latter's destructive power. Just as every commodity thus sold is potential aid for ships or tanks engaged in inflicting damage on the nations attacked, so in this present war every item shipped under cover of free traffic with the aggressor powers, helps in the casting of shells intended to lay waste the lands of the democracies and slay our brothers.

How, then, can we speak of danger as an obstacle in the way of adopting a decision? Surely there is a contradiction in this. To be halted by the word "danger" at a time when we are called upon to make up our minds to defend the loftiest moral assets of a people, is to disregard the lessons of history. Had our forefathers used that word as an argument, all these nations of ours would still be colonies. No people on earth would ever have achieved and sealed its redemption.

We are not assembled here today to debate with honeyed words of peace, but to speak in terms of that continental security now so gravely threatened. There are many who would only admit that danger existed when bombers were actually diving down over our heads, when people were being machine-gunned, and homes were being blasted from the face of the earth. That, however, would no longer be the hour of peace; it would be the hour of defeat.

We must come here, as we all of us have, in response to the resolution of our peoples, ready to face the pain and burden of battle, if it has to be fought. Battle is no picnic. It means the destruction of material wealth; the sacrifice of life itself. Like a fiercely burning pyre onto which enthusiasts and saints cast their worldly goods to save their souls, so peoples throw their material wealth, their economic existence, the lives of their sons, all that they have, into that gigantic bonfire from which their future will emerge cleansed and purified.

This is no time to defend material wealth—the hour of sacrifice is upon us.

The profit motive, the thirst for gain, the urge to save and hoard, count as nothing when the moral assets of a people are at stake. At such a moment we may only seek closer approach in heart and hand with other peoples that uphold the same cause.

It would be ignoble to hope that others will defend that heritage of liberty and justice, that unity of the Americas which we so loudly advocate, while we ourselves sank back into our own selfishness, lulled by a sense of false security. We are all of us in the same boat. At the fateful hour none will be saved by himself alone. We shall all of us, on this continent, be crushed down together under the iron heel of oppression, or we shall all of us rise up victorious with the banner of American unity on high.

We must not even think of discussing the defense of our homelands in a selfish spirit, nor can we undertake this task with open ledgers before us. If it were thus, how could England at this moment, at this epic and gigantic stage of the conflict, as she sees her wealth swallowed up, her cities and historical relics disappear, and incalculable riches sink below the surface of the waves, continue to resist? And yet her luminous spirit, heroically haughty and full of faith, does not flinch. How could the subjugated peoples withstand and keep alive the flame of hope, when all that they ever possessed has vanished utterly? And yet their soul is undaunted and their mind is set on the future. How, then, are we to regard—and it must be said, for a nation of America is involved—how must we regard the United States? A Nation with the highest living standards of all, a country whose people enjoy every comfort and convenience, how can we rightly estimate its action, as we see it cast into the fiery furnace the fantastic figure of its accumulated wealth, and divert into it the whole mighty stream of its prosperity, without thought of danger or of economy, to defend the heritage of its freedom and the untrammelled destinies of our continent? The answer may only be sought in the spirit of self-sacrifice shown by that Nation, in behalf of the loftiest incentives to the onward march of the peoples.

The ideas I have set forth are those cherished by all the ations of our Americas, without a single exception. And we are here present at the diplomatic negotiations of the peoples themselves, not the vain diplomacy of Foreign Offices. This is why I say, with deep emotion, that this document which we have just subscribed is not merely a record of the hands and pens of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs here assembled. Behind each one of us, free from the hesitations of human clay, and proof against the vicissitudes of governments, stand the shades of the heroes and founders of the Americas. They not only endorse the letter of these glorious documents, but also their genuine inspiration.

Let us, then, return home with the certainty of closer brotherhood between the peoples, from the Argentine and Chile to the United States. We are all of us here firmly resolved. We have subscribed the great charter of our American unity, in the midst of the gravest circumstances, as always happens when such instruments are signed. In this hall the banner of that American unity, of the inviolable liberties of our peoples, floats and waves as a symbol of their readiness for the sacrifice and to contribute, if need be, their savings, their material comfort, everything, to the salvation of our destinies.

We are all of us anxious to hear words of faith and hope at a time like this, when the continents are torn asunder in tragic strife, and the war lords are intent on destroying the weaker peoples. They have put aside all thoughts of brotherhood among the nations, for it is their sinister aim, by mechanized power, to wipe out innocent peoples whose only guilt is their want of strength.

Here, at Rio de Janeiro, something really wonderful has happened. The representatives of 21 nations, great and small, strong and weak, in brotherly fashion, on a footing of equality, in the full exercise of their sovereignty, have assembled to deliberate on how human liberties may best be defended.

And what have they resolved to do? To destroy other nations? To raise estranging barriers? To sentence a portion of humanity to death? No. They have upheld generous principles of respect for the sovereignty of the peoples; the freedom of mankind, the elevation of human dignity, ready response to the cry that goes up from starving multitudes athirst for justice. They have decided to assemble in a compact aggregation to defy adversity, and to merge in a single resolution the fate of all.

They have done so, but this is no romantic dream, nor lyrical outburst of inexperienced peoples.

We have realized the fact that serious danger threatens; resolutely and firmly, with full consciousness of the perils defied, with ample faith in the destines of democracy, we have subscribed covenants of indissoluble soldiarity.

If at times we have faltered or wavered it matters not; the constellations grow in beauty as the night advances. We shall soon see how that other constellation formed by the 21 stars of the Americas, shines resplendent in the western firmament.

We are here full of faith, with the firm conviction that we have subscribed a covenant for security based on honor, with the added certainty that freedom is invincible because mankind will never submit to forfeiture of its liberties. There are men who contrive special philosophies of their own, and prate about the welfare of the peoples. They even think that they can strangle those liberties. What they attempt is impossible, for the soul of man will not brook their loss.

Victories not confirmed in the heart of mankind, triumphs not rooted in the age-old yearnings of freemen, are but fleeting. Victories can only be permanent and enduring when they respond to the noblest aspirations of the peoples and when they are wrought of aspirations for democracy and justice.

And what is this document that we have signed here? We have been able to make but a scanty contribution at a time when armies, ships, and constructive might are called for, but we shall all of us united together create them in due course. In the meantime we have signed and sealed the pact of American unity to defy all onslaughts on our common destines. We have broken off relations with the aggressor nations. Why have we done so? Because we feel that one may not trade with enemy peoples, because this means, not neutrality, which is a word denoting complicity, but actual alliance.

We have accepted the breaking off of relations as the proper course to follow, and have canceled the credentials of the representatives of aggressor nations. Why have we done this? Because every diplomatic agent, in time of war, is the agent of a conspiracy. From his armchair he reports the sailing of every ship from American shores loaded with men and condemns it to bombardment on the high seas. He is the wire over which invisible warfare is conducted. Because it is hardly imaginable that we in the heart of the Americas can grant letters of marque to men whom we know are plotting against the peoples of the Americas themselves.

All of our peoples realize this is why we have broken off relations. We must be confident that Argentina and Chile, although they have not yet done so, will follow suit in due course.

Again I ask, why have we acted thus? Because at a time like this only the ability, patriotism and clearsightedness of statesmen can save the peoples.

Oceans and mountains and distance are no longer defensive bulwarks. We can all of us be reached, and are all in danger. When the time comes, and our consciousness shall fully awaken under this unity of all the Americas, our two great sister republics, Argentina and Chile, will move in accordance with their own convictions and shed the light of their generous action on all our assembled flags, face to face with the tragic destinies hovering over humanity.

We are full of faith, simple faith, the simple faith of democracies.

Democracy is invincible throughout the earth. The world marches resolutely on toward freedom. This calls for sacrifice; in the presence of losses that at times seem irretrievable, it calls for confidence. When afar one asks of the sentry, "What of the night?"; he replies, "The dawn is breaking, the victory of human freedom is nigh."

This has been a wonderful meeting of free peoples, a magnificent spectacle that should fill the hearts of true lovers of democracy, who dream of the brotherhood of man, with optimism. To crown this glorious journey's end we have the wonderful contribution made by two nations, Ecuador and Peru, who at this moment * * * could not but show that American unity is no vain word, that the fact of having signed our covenant of unity, respect and brotherhood, is not a sham modeled on old-time diplomacy.

I speak with truth and sincerity. Ineffable rejoicing floods the heart of all the Americas at the reconciliation between these two sister peoples.

I wish to end by saying a few words of strictly personal appreciation. This was a moment when I could have spoken more at length as a result of concentrated thought pregnant with a sense of responsibility and eager longing, words of faith and hope. As you all know, however, I have come as an extempore orator, on the crest of a wave of affection for my country, something for which I am most deeply grateful.

I want to say something about Brazil. I want to say that my country is profoundly appreciative of the evidences of affection that have been showered on us; that I sense all around me this good will toward Mexico. How can I, then, best word the tribute of my reciprocity? Only by quoting a line from a beautiful Brazilian song: "Brazil, how canst thou, great as thou art, yet find room, all of thee, within my heart"

[1] Just as the meeting was about to adjourn, those present asked that the Secretary of Foreign Affairs of Mexico take the floor and applauded him warmly as he did so.

1917, 1941, 19—?—Must It Happen Again?—The Answer Lies With You

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following pamphlet of the Americans United for World Organization, Inc., and a statement presented to Secretary Hull on August 15:

AMERICANS UNITED FOR WORLD ORGANIZATION PURPOSE

I

To give unity of action in a Nation-wide nonpartisan campaign to help win the war and to establish a just and enduring peace.

To mobilize public sentiment and mass enrollment to attain this goal through political action.

To support candidates of whatever party who subscribe to these principles.

II

To support establishment immediately by the United Nations of a world organization, eventually open to all nations, with authority to adjust disputes and with automatic power to use force to prevent aggression and preserve peace.

To support economic plans to promote the freer flow of trade and to raise the standard of living, so that our fighting men can return to a way of life unshadowed by unemployment.

To promote the conviction that a peace worth winning must be based on the ideal of democracy in practice, remembering that tomorrow's peace is being made while today's war is being fought.

III

To combat subversive activities, and the propaganda of the defeatist, reactionary, and imperialistic minority at home.

PROGRAM

The immediate program of Americans United, in addition to utilization of all the media of publicity, is:

1. To urge acceptance by candidates of the principles contained in this statement.

2. To carry the fight for this policy into State and congressional district campaigns through local committees.

3. To impress upon our war leaders, at every step, the necessity for democratic procedure in dealing with the liberated countries.

4. To promote, for example, a united American observance of Thanksgiving Day—following the elections—as a day of rededication to democracy and good will.

5. To assemble citizens in groups and units and forums in every part of the country to promote all of these aims.

Sometimes, by great good fortune, mankind gets a second chance. This is such a time. What is next done within the next year, yes, within the next few months, will determine whether it will happen again. Can you face your own children and the children you know if you do not put forth every ounce of effort to prevent the third world war?

The only preventive is a world organization in which the United States plays its proper part. The answer lies with each one of us—with you.

SECOND DRAFT OF PROPOSED JOINT STATEMENT

Deeply conscious of the magnitude of the task confronting you and the representatives of Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and China, as you meet to plan the framework of the General International Organization, the undersigned persons take the liberty of urging upon you certain considerations which they believe to be fundamental.

Although we have signed this statement as individuals, the organizations with which we are identified have previously adopted resolutions in which they have generally agreed upon similar essentials.

The United Nations are now at the point of victory because their military strategy has been planned with imagination and daring, because all the United Nations have cooperated, and because timing has been excellent. Plans for the organization of the world to prevent another war must be conceived with equal wisdom and daring; such planning requires the cooperation of all the United Nations and the timing must be equally accurate.

1. We urge strongly that the world organization be established before rather than after Germany collapses. As there is danger that the German collapse may come before negotiations are concluded, we suggest that a provisional United Nations Council be created at the beginning of your conversations so that machinery for consultation may be available.

The creation of a world organization cannot wait upon the conclusion of hostilities. At that time reaction might set in and policies might be adopted by the nations separately which would make full cooperation in an international organization more difficult. We suggest, therefore, that your negotiations must be concluded quickly and the General International Organization established before the ending of the war in the west.

2. We believe that the General International Organization must be democratically organized and must eventually be universal. The need for the exercise of authority by the great powers on the one hand and for democratic world organization on the other presents a serious problem. We recognize that the great nations must bear a heavy responsibility for security and must have corresponding powers. But there is a vast difference between arbitrary power and power authorized by and exercised in the name of the world community. What is needed, therefore, is a democratic organization, in the formation of which all peace-loving nations will have a voice and from which they will derive certain rights. The authority which the great powers exercise must be exercised within the framework and by the authority of this organization.

3. We believe that security is fundamental to the problem. The world organization must provide, among other things, for agreement on the part of the nations for the immediate automatic use of joint military force to prevent aggression.

We look to the eventual development of a truly international police force, which might be begun as an air force. If certain strategic bases, such as the Japanese-mandated islands, are to be occupied by the forces of the nations having the greatest interest in a given area, such occupation should be in the name of the world organization. An imperialist struggle for bases must be avoided.

Decisions of the world organization must not be paralyzed by requirements of unanimity.

4. Hand in hand with machinery for enforcing peace must come means for just and peaceful settlement of disputes. If conciliation and arbitration fail, there must be a final decision by the appropriate body of the general international organization or by a court. We trust that the Permanent Court for International Justice will be utilized as the court for legal disputes.

5. The general international organization should fulfill the principles of the Atlantic Charter and the Moscow Declaration that the nations agree to practical measures which will lighten for peace-loving peoples the crushing burden of armaments.

6. We stand with the declaration of the International Labor Organization that world peace is partially dependent upon social and economic justice. The conference of the I. L. O., U. N. R. R. A., and the Food and Agriculture Administration are most encouraging. We hope that further means will be planned for an expanding world economy and for the improvement of the physical and spiritual well-being of mankind. Any such agencies should be coordinated by the general international organization.

We believe that the overwhelming masses of the people of the earth want a strong world organization to prevent war and to advance the general well-being. On the basis of our Nation-wide contracts through our respective organizations we assure you that there is an overwhelming popular demand for American participation in such an organization.

I Wear a Silver Star

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. SIDNEY CAMP
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem, written by Mr. L. H. Beck, of Griffin, Ga., inscribed to his son, who is a pilot in the Air Forces in France:

I WEAR A SILVER STAR

God has been good to me!
The sun has shined on me.
God gave me a son!

Just took him for granted,
Like things that always are.
Never thought I'd miss him,
Never thought to kiss him;
Now I wear a silver star.

When a little tike I'd tease him,
Never really tried to please him;
Just thought I'd always have him,
Like other things that always are.
Didn't play or listen to him.
Put him off for other reasons.
Now I wear a silver star.

As he grew a little older,
Should have been a little closer;
But I took him just for granted,
Like other things that always are.
Didn't enter in his playing;
Never tried to entertain him.
Now I wear a silver star.

Now—he wears his country's colors
And he's gone to do his bit.
But still I—well I just took it
Like other things that always are.
Now I know how much I love him,
How really proud I am of him,
And so I wear a silver star.

God has been good to me,
The sun has shined on me.
God gave me a son.

Address by Hon. Hugh A. Butler, of Nebraska, Before Rivers and Harbors Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. OVERTON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] before the Rivers and Harbors Congress at New Orleans, La., on July 27, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a pleasure and a privilege to have this opportunity of speaking a few words to this great Congress on Rivers and Harbors.

I want to tell you very briefly exactly how I feel about one of the most important matters with which this Rivers and Harbors Congress and the Congress of the United States are concerned. That problem is how to accomplish the objectives of improving the navigability of our navigable waterways, without infringing upon the beneficial consumptive use of water in the West.

The day has long since passed, when the policy of developing one part of the country at the expense of another can be tolerated. In the early days of our history we know that Great Britain followed a policy of preventing the development of manufacture in the New England colonies. It was anxious that they should be dependent upon the products of the mother country. Our British allies, fighting so valiantly at our side in this war, have reason to know that the policy followed in those early days was unwise. There appears to exist, in some high quarters today, a notion that the development of the great western area of the United States might well be retarded in order that the production of other areas may find no competition. I am glad to be able to say that this notion is not widespread. I am glad to be able to say, on the contrary, that I find, generally speaking, a strong sentiment prevailing throughout the country, as well as in the Congress, in favor of not merely allowing but of encouraging the fullest development in the 17 Western States.

Anyone who has given thought, as I have, to the needs, not merely of Nebraska, but of the West as a whole, is bound to reach the conclusion that the primary need of the West is water for beneficial consumptive use. Much of the area within the Missouri River Basin is not arid in the sense that it never gets a drop of rain. On the contrary, we know from our own experience and the writings of experts on agricultural matters, that there are periods in parts of that area when irrigation is not needed, when the rains have been sufficient for the needs of the farmer. So true is this that the farmer in those areas is likely, during the years of sufficient moisture, to forget about saving water for the lean, dry years ahead. During these periods, he is likely also to forget about pressing for the construction of water conservation works. Then come the dry years. When drought arrives, it is too late to do much about it. There is pressure then for the undertaking of water conservation and irrigation works. But these works must be planned. They must be financed. They must be constructed. It may take years to do all that. In the meantime we see the tragic consequences of lack of foresight: Parched lands, dying cattle, ruined farmers. I hope that the farmers in my own State of Nebraska and in the other areas of the lower Missouri River Basin will see and practice and insist upon assistance from their Federal and State Governments in following the policy of building water conservation works in order to prepare for the periods of drought. In much of our great West, however, we do not have those periods when rainfall affords sufficient moisture for agriculture. In those areas, agricultural development is wholly and completely dependent upon irrigation. There can be, as we know, very little irrigation without stored water.

The Federal Government has made great strides in the field of irrigation. Beginning in 1902 with the enactment of the Reclamation Act, the Congress has, year by year, encouraged and developed irrigation for agriculture in the West. I am proud of the part I have had in this work. I hope to have a share in promoting, in the Senate of the United States, the further enactment of legislation which will make possible in the future much greater development of the western half of this country of ours. I am convinced that great strides will be made in the future. The report recently submitted to the Congress by the Secretary of the Interior on the Missouri River Basin is a revealing and inspiring document. It shows what is needed and what can be done for the States in the Missouri River Basin by way of irrigation and other developments. But, most important of all, it shows that the Bureau of Reclamation has come a long way from the time when investigations and plans were made only with respect to one small project, affecting one small area. It shows a degree of imagination and foresight that is worthy of particular note. I congratulate the Commissioner of Reclamation and those who were associated with him in the preparation of that document. I congratulate the officials and private citizens of the State of Nebraska and of the other States in the Missouri River Basin who cooperated in the great work of gathering the necessary information. It can rightly be said that the plans revealed by the Missouri River Basin report of the Bureau of Reclamation involve the expenditure of millions of dollars. But it can rightly be said also that these plans involve the creation of many more millions of dollars in production facilities, both agricultural and industrial. They involve insurance against the hazards of drought, and they will be repaid. Let me emphasize that. These expenditures are not lost to the Treasury and the taxpayer. They will be repaid directly by the farmers, the users of power, the users of municipal water supplies. They will be repaid indirectly through the benefits received from doing away with the losses caused by floods. How much more sensible it is to invest this money in the future of the United States than to pour it unwisely into the laps of our neighbors.

No one feels more deeply than I do the need for flood control. No one feels more deeply than I do that not enough has been done as yet to prevent damage from floods. I propose to continue to lend my support to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers in their flood-control program. The so-called Pick report is, to my mind, on a par in the field of navigation and flood control with the report on the Missouri River Basin by the Bureau of Reclamation. In my judgment, both of these reports fall short of recommending everything that should be done for Nebraska. But I would not for that reason fail to give them my support. I am not willing for one instant to consider these reports from the point of view of one State alone. I congratulate General Pick and those who were associated with him in the preparation of his report.

There are very few points of fundamental conflict between these two reports. I see no reason why these differences cannot be ironed out. The Congress of the United States may be able to do something about that. This solution should and could do full justice to navigation and flood control and to the need for protecting and promoting the beneficial consumptive use of water in the West. I do not pretend that the task of finding and applying the solution will be easy. I propose to do my best. If other Senators and Representatives will join in a cooperative manner, the job can be done. The support of the Rivers and Harbors Congress will be needed. This is your opportunity.

Former President Theodore Roosevelt once said that the rivers of no other civilized country are so poorly developed, so little used, or play so small a part in the industrial life of the Nation as those of the United States.

In the years since that pointed criticism was spoken, we have come a long way. With the approval and authorizations by the succeeding Congresses, our Federal agencies entrusted by law with responsibilities for the use and development of our rivers and streams have made voluminous surveys and studies. With the active support of the national rivers and harbors congress, and other far-seeing, progressive-minded, and public-spirited organizations, the factual data thus acquired have resulted in the initiation of effective improvements for flood control, for navigation, for irrigation, for the development of hydroelectric power, for stream-pollution abatement, for the prevention of erosion, and for other beneficial purposes.

Having been born and lived most of my life in close proximity to the Missouri River, I have a very real concern with the problems imposed by that great, unpredictable stream. I have seen the Missouri on its biannual rampages again and again leaving death and destruction in its wake. And I have seen it dwindle to a stage where lack of water supply and pollution constituted serious problems for the cities in the lower basin, and imposed severe hardships on farmers and stockmen in the upper reaches.

It is only natural, therefore, that a plan to alleviate these conditions, and a program to develop the virtually untapped water resources of the Missouri Basin should hold my interest and command my support. Its basin, an empire of 539,000 square miles, remains the last great river basin in the United States for which no comprehensive plan of development has been initiated.

As a member of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of the United States Senate, I am intensely interested in irrigation. As a long-time businessman in the city of Omaha, on the navigable stretch of the Missouri, I am aware of the importance of cheap water-borne transportation. But as a lifelong resident of the Missouri River Valley, I recognize the fact that our first and foremost problem in that basin is flood control.

The Congress has before it now for authorization H. R. 4485, which contains the plan of the Army engineers for the control of Missouri River floods, and which provides also a broad and flexible framework for the development of the basin. The plan, with which many of you are familiar, was prepared in compliance with a resolution of the Flood Control Committee of the House of Representatives. It consists of a series of multiple-purpose reservoirs above Sioux City, Iowa, a system of main stem levees on both sides of the river from Sioux City to the mouth, and a series of tributary reservoirs in the lower basin.

This bill, H. R. 4485, has been passed by the House of Representatives, and has been reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

In considering the plan for the Missouri River Basin, I believe that the House Committee on Flood Control, the House itself and the Senate Committee on Commerce, were impressed with the common sense approach to a variety of problems imposed by the great length of the river and the geographical climatic and economic differences of the vast area which it drains. The plan is primarily a flood control plan, but it also would make available for irrigation, for navigation, for power and other uses, the excess waters of the flood seasons, which in the past 2 years alone have caused $112,000,00 damage and the loss of 30 lives.

I have not found, in the discussions of the comprehensive flood-control plan for the Missouri River, that any responsible agency or interest objects to the fullest use of the water resources of the basin for the irrigation of arid and semi-arid lands therein. There seems to be a unanimity of opinion that the agricultural possibilities of the basin should be developed to the maximum feasible extent. We have been assured by the Army engineers and the report of the committee of State engineers of the nine Missouri River States that the water resources of the basin are adequate to meet all practicable demands for irrigation, navigation, industrial and all other beneficial consumptive uses, if they are properly conserved. The comprehensive flood-control plan provides for such conservation by the construction of strategically located multiple-purpose dams throughout the basin, having a total storage capacity of well over 70,000,000 acre-feet.

In the light of this information I hope Congress will not deem it desirable to attach an amendment to the authorizing act (now before it) that would set up a priority of use of the waters in favor of any particular interest.

In conflict between those favoring the use of water for irrigation and those favoring navigation is relatively minor. This is apparent when one considers that the dams which are to control the releases for navigation purposes are downstream from the large bulk of the irrigable areas in the basin. In other words, the irrigable areas receive the water first. Of a total of about 8,000,000 acres of irrigated and irrigable land within the basin, there are only 1,200,000 acres which are proposed to be irrigated from reservoirs that are operated for combined irrigation and navigation purposes. The total requirement of this 1,200,000 acres is 1,800,000 acre-feet of water per year. When we consider that the total storage capacity of the proposed reservoirs from which this water must be obtained is approximately 54,000,000 acre-feet, the chance of any real or serious conflict between navigation and irrigation practically vanishes. It certainly would appear reasonable that any and all differences should be easily and readily adjusted, so as to avoid a delay of authorizing legislation.

There is also before the Congress at this time a Rivers and Harbors omnibus bill, H. R. 3961, which includes in a list of projects to be authorized for post-war execution, the proposal for a 9-foot channel in the Missouri River from Sioux City to the mouth instead of the 6-foot channel previously authorized and now virtually completed. Deepening of the river channel would be obtained in a manner similar to that used for the Mississippi River, contraction works serving generally to confine the wide shallow portions of the river to narrower and deeper sections, thereby attaining the authorized depth without any additional demand upon the water resources of the basin over that presently authorized.

The 9-foot channel in the Missouri is not a part of the so-called Pick plan for flood control and multiple purpose water utilization. It is, however, a coordinate development. In the same sense, plans and works of the Bureau of Reclamation, the Department of Agriculture, and the Federal Power Commission for the Missouri Basin are coordinate developments to supplement the broad and flexible framework provided by the Pick plan. The authorization of the Pick plan can offer no hindrance or obstacle to the programs of these other Federal agencies which are expert in their respective fields. In fact, the essence of the Pick plan is to hold back excess flood water and conserve it by storage for all useful purposes, thus making more water available for all needs. I am in favor of furthering all of the proposals to bring to the 12,000,000 people of the Missouri Basin the benefits and advantages that await the intelligent development of their too-long neglected streams. I am satisfied that there is adequate water supply for all purposes if properly conserved as proposed in the Pick plan. Any doubt on that point should have been dissipated by the report of the impartial committee of State engineers representing the 9 States of the basin, which determined that the annual run-off at Yankton, based on a 30-year period, was adequate to meet all estimated requirements for the 9-foot channel, for irrigation proposed by the Bureau of Reclamation, and for domestic and sanitation purposes. I am convinced also that should a shortage of water develop at some future time—a condition that does not seem likely—the solution of any temporary problems will be solved by the common sense and good will of the people of the basin.

I know that because of low water in the river my own city of Omaha spent $100,000 to lower its water supply in-take, and river shippers lightened their loads, and neither the city nor the navigationists considered asking the upper basin to curtail by so much as a single drop the use of the water for irrigating the several millions of acres that was depleting the flow downstream. Common sense and good will established the prior use. No legal priorities were sought or invoked. We didn't need them then and we do not need them now.

The urgent problem confronting us today is the control of the destructive floods of the Missouri River. It is conceivable that any restrictive legislative limitation on the plan would prevent the fullest use of the proposed flood-control dams for the prevention of floods. If further legislation is needed to insure the greatest beneficial use of the waters impounded by these dams let us base it upon the experience we gain as the plan develops and upon the conditions that obtain at the time.

Socialized Medicine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS
OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from a recent issue of the New York Daily News dealing in part with the question of socialized medicine. I may say now that I am against the movement to socialize medicine.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EDUCATION BY GREAT BRAIN

The Roosevelt administration's efforts to communize the United States via socialized medicine and Government control of all forms of insurance are ominous enough to any American who doesn't feel ready for totalitarianism yet. But perhaps the most ominous of these efforts is the continuing attempt by the administration, including especially Mrs. Roosevelt, to make education more and more dependent on the Great Brain at Washington.

There is the trick 10 percent deduction, for one thing, in the new simplified income-tax law—a provision which permits income taxpayers in the up-to-$5,000 brackets to deduct 10 percent for bad debts, alimony, interest, and educational and religious contributions, without having made such contributions, as one means of paving the way for eventual Government taking over of all educational institutions.

MUSCLING INTO SCHOOL SYSTEM

The present administration has long been hot for more and more pumping of cash into State school systems. The United States Office of Education, an old-time Government bureau set up in 1867, has been greatly enlarged under the Roosevelts. Its activities, directed by Commissioner John W. Studebaker, have been consistently aimed at muscling the Federal Government deeper and deeper into public education, hitherto regarded as mainly an obligation of the States, of such churches as wish to operate schools and colleges, and of privately endowed schools and colleges.

The usual excuse is that some States don't or can't spend enough on education. Habitually ignored is the fact that Government cash almost always means Government bureaucrats to direct the spending of it. In the case of the schools, that will mean uniform education, which will turn out mental robots, all cut to the same pattern. The war has considerably helped this effort along, what with the Government necessarily taking over a lot of college plants for various kinds of specialized training.

Hitler began to do this sort of thing in 1933, as soon as he came to power. One of his policies was to round up children of 8, 9, and 10 into what he called the Hitler Jugend (Youth) and what many others called the Hitler goslings. These kids were herded into camps, drilled strenuously, and indoctrinated with Nazi beliefs. Many of them are the robot-minded fanatics whom our men are running into (and knocking the socks off of) on the European fronts today.

GETTING 'EM YOUNG FOR TOTALITARIANISM

What many of us tend to overlook now that Russia is our semially, is that the Russian Communists started this mass-molding of youth long before Hitler did. Lenin's idea was to get 'em young, and pour communism and nothing else into their defenseless little beans, so that their adult minds would be bombproof against any other thinking.

The plan has worked well for the Communists and well for Hitler. Hitler and Stalin, indeed, run two governments which are soul mates in spite of their differing labels and their present mortal war on each other. Both are totalitarian systems.

But is the fact that totalitarianism suits most of the Russians and the Germans a reason why we should be willing to let ourselves be led blindfold into totalitarianism?

There are of course defects in capitalism, as there are in any other human economic and social set-up. A couple of these defects are in the papers just now, namely, Barbara Hutton and Doris Duke, a couple of young ladies who inherited huge fortunes which seem to have done neither them nor anybody else any real good.

DO WE WANT ROBOT MINDS?

But those are just flyspecks on the American capitalist system. Its real power and value are evidenced by such things as the fact that it has furnished the Russians in this war with more than 10,000 airplanes, half the trucks used in their current offensives, great quantities of food and clothes, and so on. Russia has 60,000,000 more people than the United States, and at least as many natural resources. Yet it is a fair though unprovable bet that Germany would have licked Russia if it hadn't been for United States lend-lease.

Our present educational system is an integral part of our capitalist system. If the Great Brain gets control of United States education, all our schools will sink to a dead level of uniformity, turning out millions of robot minds. If we maintain our public and parochial and private schools, our State universities, our privately run universities like Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Dartmouth, Chicago, etc., etc., and such church universities as Notre Dame and Fordham, we'll continue to have variety in the products of our education, plus continuous improvement through competition. The Roosevelts, though, don't plan it that latter way.

New Orleans Sea Channel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "New Orleans Sea Channel Truly a National Project," written by Walter Parker and published in the Official Daily Court Record, New Orleans, La., in the issue of August 15, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS SEA CHANNEL TRULY A NATIONAL PROJECT

(By Walter Parker)

Obviously the less cost assessed against transportation and port services the greater the net returns on exports to producers, and, on imports, to consumers, and also broader market outlets. A saving of as little as 10 cents on a ton can have the effect of changing trade routes and extending markets.

Some very far-reaching changes in the economy of the world's commerce will result from the war. War debts are monumental, and to service them great burdens will fall upon all people.

Waste, loss motion, and extravagance will be impossible.

The port of lowest natural resistance for the exports and imports of the entire Mississippi Valley is New Orleans.

New Orleans had dug into its taxpayers' pockets for considerably more than $100,000,000 for equipment to make the way in and out for the trade centers of the Mississippi Valley easy and at low cost.

But further great economies are planned.

In order to lower costs to ships and to encourage the largest ships afloat and to become afloat to serve the commerce of the Valley States, New Orleans is asking the Federal Government to extend, widen, and deepen an existing 20-mile channel to deep water in the Gulf so as to give the valley access to the sea via a deep, straight tidewater route, thus avoiding the winding channel of the Mississippi River, its swift currents, and its varying water level.

Equally important, this sea-level channel will make available many thousand acres of now unimproved sea-level lands for the most perfectly coordinated harbors in all the world, where the most complete terminals, commodity handling devices and the like can be installed for the benefit of Mississippi Valley commerce, and for the reduction of costs.

The benefits that will accrue to the Mississippi Valley are many. Low cost boat traffic will be facilitated and made more efficient. Larger ships will come for Valley commerce, which will mean the lowest possible freight rates. Ample ground space will enable the railroads to handle their cars more expeditiously and at less cost. Shipside warehouses, where the time cost between the periods of production and need will reduce costs and facilitate financing. Finally, it will create an opportunity for the United States Navy to set up the kind of navy yard with graving docks for the accommodation of the largest battleships, facilities which it will greatly need on the Gulf coast, and which it needs now.

Other ports will necessarily have to meet the competition of the perfected port of New Orleans, and thus direct benefits will accrue generally.

Any economy that will facilitate and reduce the cost of handling the commerce of the United States will make a definite contribution to the country as a whole throughout the years ahead when the strain of rehabilitation and the financing of the national debt will be great.

The New Orleans project is, in fact, a movement for the Mississippi Valley and for the Nation, and would supply many jobs at a time when jobs are needed, and afterward when the country will endeavor to further raise the standard of living.

United States Neutrality as Reported by the Papers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to read the press reports concerning the announced policy and the application of the Government's neutrality program, appearing in this morning's papers, the Herald and Post, submitted herewith:

[From the Washington Post of August 18, 1944]

HULL DISAVOWS POWER POLITICS—DENIES ANY COERCION OF SMALL NATIONS

(By Fred Pasley)

Tartly assuring Governor Dewey his fears of power politics and coercion of little nations by the Big Four are groundless, Secretary of State Hull yesterday revealed that the international security talks starting here next week are but a curtain raiser to a full-dress conference of all the United Nations allies to be held this fall.

A world organization will be set up at that time and its delegates will draw up a tentative program of post-war collaboration for submission to the legislative bodies of their various governments.

Hull's blast at Dewey, generally regarded here as the opening administration gun in the 1944 political campaign, was considered so important by the Secretary that he issued it as a formal statement.

While he disclosed no details of existing understandings between this country and Great Britain, Russia, and China, Hull vigorously disclaimed any intent by the Big Four to ride herd on their lesser allies and the world at large.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of August 18, 1944]

UNITED STATES HALTS FLOW OF GOLD TO ARGENTINA

The United States applied a single premonitory turn of the economic screw to recalcitrant Argentina yesterday, halting the homeward flow from this country of gold owned by the South American nation.

It was the first positive action since Secretary of State Hull several weeks ago described Argentina as a deserter from the cause of the United Nations.

Argentina has been withdrawing gold from the United States for several months, shipments aggregating $20,000,000 to $30,000,000. The Treasury's Foreign Funds Control Division recently refused to permit a shipment from New Orleans of about $2,000,000, and it was understood that no further shipments will be allowed pending clarification of the diplomatic situation.

The possibility of a general freeze of Argentina's assets has been under consideration for months. The order actually has been drawn, but never issued.

The stop on gold shipments is not regarded here as a particularly drastic curb. Argentina, in effect, now acquires the status of a neutral, and loses a preferred status. Neutral countries are not allowed to withdraw gold, but this policy is not applied to Allied or associated nations.

When the Lights Come On Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following short poem by Horace C. Carlisle:

WHEN THE LIGHTS COME ON AGAIN

When the glory-bells of peace ring everywhere,
May they never, never cease, is vict'ry's prayer—
For we'll sing the song again,
"Peace on earth, good-will to men,"
When the glory-bells of peace ring everywhere.

CHORUS

When the lights come on again on Capitol Dome,
There'll be joy again in every Washington home—
And it's peace will radiate
To the homes in every State,
When the lights come on again on Capitol Dome.

When this war of carnage ends, and hatreds cease,
And upon the earth descends the dove of peace,
We will, 'neath the Stripes and Stars,
Write the epitaph of wars—
When this war of carnage ends, and hatreds cease.

Then our swords can into plowshares all be cast,
And our spears can into pruning-hooks, at last,
All be made, and we shall be
From war's devastation free—
Then our swords can into plowshares all be cast.

—Horace C. Carlisle.

Keeping 'Em Rollin'

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, all railroad workers are vitally concerned with the operation of the railroad retirement and unemployment insurance systems. They justifiably regard these systems as their major bulwark against the economic hazards to which most of us are exposed. All of us who live will one day become too old to continue with our regular jobs.

Railroad employees are loyal American workmen. The railroad brotherhoods representing thousands of railroad employees have earned the esteem of not only the Congress but all the American people for their fair representation of the railroad workers' various problems. One has been the recent case for a wage increase. An excellent case was presented by Mr. A. F. Whitney, president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, an outstanding labor statesman. He and his splendid staff have definitely proven in my humble judgment that—

First. An increase was necessary to correct maladjustments and inequalities. Statistics prove that wages of transportation workers did not keep pace with the rising cost of living.

Second. An increase was justified and necessary to correct gross inequities as compared with the wage rates in other industries.

Third. An increase was necessary to aid in the effective prosecution of the war because it would maintain the morale of the workers and halt the alarming flow of manpower from the vital railroad industry to other war industries.

Although Mr. Whitney and his staff adhered to established policy that the earnings of the carriers would not be regarded as relevant to the wage issue, they did develop a line of proof and argument which asserted that the staggering increases in the railroad wartime profits and the inflationary rise of living costs were injurious to workers' morale and contrary to the equitable principles of President Roosevelt's stabilization program.

The railroad employees also encountered obstacles with their vacation pay. That I understand has now been satisfactorily adjusted. These employees are entitled to every consideration, for railroad labor has performed an unbelievable task in carrying on the greatest transportation job in world history. Regardless of their wage rate case and other obstacles—no strikes by the railroaders. Let us salute the railroad employees of America for their magnificent job of "keeping 'em rollin'."

Efforts of Hon. Scott W. Lucas, of Illinois, to Obtain Greater Production of Farm Machinery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL A. HATCH
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I hold in my hand three impartial news articles relating to the activities of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] in connection with the increased production of farm machinery. One of the articles carries a highly commendatory statement by the President himself about the activities of the Senator from Illinois. The other article, also highly commendatory, is based on a letter by Mr. Donald Nelson, chairman of the War Production Board. The third article appeared in the column entitled "The Washington Merry-Go-Round," and bears the heading "LUCAS got the tools."

I ask unanimous consent that these articles be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD in the order in which I have numbered them—1, 2, and 3.

Mr. President, on Wednesday, August 9, 1944, I asked and received consent to publish in the RECORD editorials from the Chicago Sun, Quincy Herald-Whig, and the Chicago Daily News, relative to the candidacy of the Hon. SCOTT LUCAS for reelection to this body. I now request consent to amend those remarks by adding thereto the statement as is pointed out in those editorials that many Republicans are actively organizing in behalf of Senator LUCAS throughout the entire State of Illinois.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I do not wish to object to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from New Mexico. I merely wish to say that before we adjourn today I intend to make a speech showing the lack of farm machinery throughout the country, and also that the farmers of the Northwest are unable to gather their crops because the big farm machinery companies have not manufactured grain binders or combines. I expect to show that in one county of North Dakota, namely, Hettinger County, the farmers suffered a loss of more than $1,000,000 because the machinery companies had not manufactured the machinery which they agreed with Government officials to manufacture.

With that understanding, and with the further understanding that I may be permitted to put into the RECORD statistics and figures in support of my statement, I have no objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from New Mexico.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico?

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROOSEVELT TELLS LUCAS' AID IN FARM MACHINES

WASHINGTON, May 26.—President Roosevelt today credited Senator SCOTT LUCAS (Democrat, Illinois) with being the person responsible for pushing for an increase in production of farm machinery, details of which were announced by the President himself.

The President just before introducing Prime Minister Churchill to the American press, told of the work the Red Cross and the Army are doing in the Middle West flood crisis. He wound up by discussing what the flood had done to food production.

The War Production Board, he announced, has allotted enough additional steel to construct 18,690 additional harvesting machines and the total of 55,000 will be ready for this harvest. For the 1944 season manufacturers will be permitted to make up to 80 percent of their 1940 production and have been given an AA2 rating, which is the same as for battleships and planes.

Senator LUCAS, the President said, has been the chief person pushing this effort.

Senator LUCAS has had conferences with the President, the War Production Board, the Agricultural Department, and Stabilization Director Byrnes to get the production of farm machinery, particularly corn pickers and combines, increased.

[From the Washington Post of June 27, 1943]

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND—LUCAS GOT THE TOOLS

There was more than meets the eye behind the President's statement that Senator SCOTT LUCAS of Illinois was the man responsible for the W. P. B. order increasing the production of farm machinery to 80 percent of 1940 production.

Actually, Lucas crusaded for more than a year to put this over, ringing doorbells from one end of town to the other. Sometimes the fight seemed pretty hopeless, for he was bucking the combined opposition of Army-Navy brasshats and the W. P. B.

When all avenues failed, however, Lucas appealed to his close friend, the President.

"Something's got to be done right away about releasing more steel for farm machinery, or we're going to have a serious food shortage on our hands, Mr. President," he pleaded several weeks ago. "I know, because I come from a farm State. Most people in Washington don't seem to realize that food is a weapon as essential in wartime as guns."

The President agreed wholeheartedly, promised to take the matter up with Jimmy Byrnes. Lucas waited for a week then wrote Byrnes a bristling letter threatening to stage a "one man show" on farm machinery on the floor.

This ultimatum got results. Byrnes referred the letter to the President, who sent it to W. P. B. Boss Donald Nelson, with a notation to consider an increase of steel for farm implements.

The next day Lucas was called to Nelson's office to help draft the steel-increase order.

[From the Chicago Times of June 11, 1943]

NELSON REVEALS FARM MACHINE BOOM PLANS

WASHINGTON, June 11.—Details of the program to increase production of farm machinery, a great proportion of which is made in and near Chicago, were revealed today in a letter sent by War Production Board Chairman Donald Nelson to Senator LUCAS (Democrat, Illinois), who recently was complimented by President Roosevelt for taking a leading part in getting such action taken.

The letter follows.

"DEAR SCOTT: I am happy to inform you that a substantially increased program for the production of farm machinery will get under way July 1.

"A total of 300,000 tons of carbon steel, with other materials in proportion, has been allocated to the farm machinery program for the quarter beginning July 1. To assure continuous and balanced production, advance authorizations totaling an additional 200,000 tons of steel have also been approved for each of the three quarters from October 1, 1943, to July 1, 1944.

"During the third quarter of this year, special emphasis will be given to the manufacture of harvesting machinery for this year's crops.

"The total authorizations for the quarter and for the year beginning July 1 will make it possible to meet the farm machinery production program requested by the War Food Administration.

"Within a few days the War Production Board will issue a new farm machinery order to replace L-170, under which the industry has been operating. Farm equipment manufacturers are being authorized today by telegram to place orders for materials for the new program. The telegrams include allotment numbers under the controlled materials plan which will make it possible for the companies to place authorized orders immediately. Detailed certificates of authorization will be mailed within a few days.

"In order to assure adequate production, distribution, maintenance and repair facilities, the new order will eliminate the concentration features of L-170. It will provide for production of new machinery at approximately 80 per cent of the 1940 level.

"The whole farm machinery program has been stepped up by advancing the completion dates for the quotas established in L-170 for the year which began October 1, 1942, and placing the farm machinery industry on a new annual basis beginning July 1. Of the 300,000 tons of carbon steel allotted for the third quarter of this year, 83,723 tons will be used for completion of the increased program of harvesting machinery decided upon in March and the remainder will constitute first-quarter authorizations under the new order."

General Brereton, Airborne Commander

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the editorial from the August 12 issue of the Shreveport Times entitled "General Brereton, Airborne Commander":

GENERAL BRERETON, AIRBORNE COMMANDER

There is reason for a surge of pride in this region over the news that Lt. Gen. Lewis H. Brereton, former commanding officer at Barksdale Field, has been named commander of the new airborne army formed to operate on the front in western Europe.

General Eisenhower's announcement of the choice means that this unprecedented organization, welding both American and British airborne forces with total manpower estimated at from 60,000 to 90,000 men, is in the hands of an air-force leader who has demonstrated time and again his fitness for such an important and difficult wartime assignment.

Remembered here as a quiet man, dedicated heart and soul to the Air Forces, General Brereton saw service in this war at Manila, in the East Indies, Australia, India, and Egypt before going to England where he was placed in command of the Ninth Air Force, that ravaging arm of vengeance and offensive power which has done so much to ease the path of the invaders of Hitler's fortress on the west.

Once again, the Barksdale Field of pre-war days appears in the role of trainer and preparatory ground for the giants of America's far-flung air forces in combat. Only a little more than a decade has passed since Barksdale became a sturdy unit in what at the start was a small but ambitious air force. Yet now the field has a rich heritage of tradition, an unexcelled record of combat accomplishment which will inspire thousands of young men who will train at Barksdale in the years to come.

Our good wishes, and the good wishes of this entire region, go to General Brereton in his new post of responsibility. He deserves, in fullest degree, the high tribute which has come to him in General Eisenhower's appointment.

Oklahoma

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered over the radio by Grover B. Hill, Under Secretary of Agriculture, at Oklahoma City, Okla., on August 8, 1944. The address was delivered over the facilities of radio station WKY, at Oklahoma City.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am proud to have a place on the initial program of this new radio service to southwestern agriculture. This is a farmer's radio program. And I'm glad to represent the U. S. D. A. on it because ours is the farmers' part of your Government.

I am especially glad to do this here in this country which I know and love. I have been in every county in Oklahoma and in most of them many times. I know this State better than any other next to my native State of Texas.

I want to take this opportunity to pay my respects to your Governor who has become a national figure and has done much to bring Oklahoma to the attention of the Nation. Governor Kerr is justly proud of his State, just as was that matchless citizen of Oklahoma, Will Rogers, who seldom failed on any occasion to refer to his native State of Oklahoma.

We can all be proud of the part this State has played in the all-out war effort. You have sent your sons to the fighting front. And you who have not been privileged to serve in the armed forces have done your job here at home in backing up the fighting front. In the production of livestock and crops, in supplying food and fiber, you have made a contribution that is vital.

Oklahoma farmers are forward looking. They are out here in a world in the making. They are the sons of those who looked forward in 1889 and who have built the future which was visioned in the dreams of the pioneers.

The eighty-niners saw the possibilities that nature had stored in the soil of Oklahoma. But before the dust from the greatest horse race in history had settled, the need for conserving that soil was clear. Oklahoma was quick to realize the importance of soil conservation, although it is said that erosion had damaged more land in less time in Oklahoma than in any other State. Today Oklahoma is in the first rank of all the States in a united State-wide effort to save and to protect and to guard for future generations that God-given natural resource, the soil. Oklahoma farmers and ranchers have already organized 59 conservation districts covering almost 32,000,000 acres on 140,000 farms and ranches. Three million acres are already operated on a soil-conservation basis, which increases production while saving the soil for the future.

We have learned that a State, like nations in history, rises or falls with the productivity of its soil. Oklahoma rose on the productivity of her soil and is determined that she will not fall.

It is easier to keep the soil than to regain it when it is once gone. Oklahoma was fortunate that not too much damage had been done by the time our national consciousness was awakened at last to the problem of soil conservation a dozen years ago.

The pioneering spirit is still alive in Oklahoma. Many of the people are the first generation of the forward-seeing pioneers whom hardships and problems did not stop. We can be thankful for that, because the end of this war will bring new problems to this Nation and to this State. We will be living in a different kind of a world—a new world. But you are used to that. You have faced new horizons before.

Let me suggest one of these problems to you now. You have just harvested the greatest wheat crop in your history. You have more livestock on your farms than ever before. You are producing more total food and fiber than you had ever thought possible. You have been doing this short-handed and with limited machinery and supplies.

That record of the past few years suggests what you can do when your boys come home to help and when you can get plenty of machinery and equipment besides. Your guess is as good as mine as to what that tremendous production can be.

This production is what we want. There is no place in America for a philosophy of scarcity. Abundance is the soundest of national policies, and it is plain, common sense to produce all that we can consume and export, within the limits of soil-conservation practices, at a reasonable profit to the producers. The farmer has proved he can do the producing. The problem—and the genius of America will not rest until this problem has been solved—is to make the best use to the State and to the Nation and to the world of that production. It is a challenge equal to that which faced the pioneers when they looked across the unplowed prairies of Oklahoma. I know it is the hope of everyone that we in this generation can meet that challenge as successfully as the pioneers met theirs. History has written their record; the same ruthless history will write ours.

Without going into details, there are two ways to use this food. These are to consume ft ourselves and to export it to others. But we are now eating more food per capita in the United States than we have ever eaten before, because of our record purchasing power. Whether we can eat still more, or even continue at our present record rate, depends on whether we can maintain our national purchasing power.

Then, in spite of the fact that we are now consuming here at home more food and fiber than ever in our history, we are still exporting great quantities of it overseas. We are able to export this because we are producing more than we consume ourselves, even at our present record rate of consumption. Whether we can export still more, or even continue at our present rate, depends on whether the world continues to buy it, and that depends on how wisely world trade is handled. Just as our domestic consumption depends on sound conditions of domestic trade, just so does the other great outlet depend on sound conditions of world trade.

Perhaps in the past we have been so busy developing our own country that we may have overlooked some of the value of the broad two-way highway of foreign trade, which furnishes an outlet for our own production and which brings us the real value of the production of others for us to consume ourselves.

Now it seems more necessary than ever to work for a greatly expended foreign trade in farm products. We can and should be the best fed people on earth with plenty left over to sell to the other people of the world.

There is no place now for isolationism. Through the growing pains of the war we have come to the mature status of a world power; and we can take advantage of the opportunities that this position affords. This is generally considered a responsibility; it is also an opportunity. If we are to avail ourselves of this opportunity for foreign outlets for our abundant production, we must trade on a two-way highway with the rest of the world.

I am not proposing how this be done. I am simply suggesting the challenge to the forward-looking pioneers of Oklahoma, knowing that when public opinion demands anything it eventually will come about some way.

Hungarian Jews Must Be Saved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following copy of an open letter to President Roosevelt from the editor of the Jewish Forum:

NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Nazi-Hungarian Government paper, it was reported by the J. T. A., issued the savage threat that 1,000 Jews will be sentenced to death for every air raid the United Nations will make on Budapest. Thus the United Nations are virtually made partners to the murders. Terror may frighten off individuals. It is only a people hoping against hope that the inevitable will thus be delayed, that can resort to such sadism with a view to frightening off whole armies.

The Hungarians, like the Rumanians, may claim that they adopted Hitler's savagery against the Jews under duress. But after people like the Dutch, the Czechs, the Belgians, and the Danes have shown how they could resist such duress, the Hungarians will just have no defense when the day of reckoning comes, as by now they know it must.

Eighty thousand Jews of the Carpathian Provinces have already disappeared by mass extermination, after being sent to the murder camps in Poland. One million Hungarian Jews are doomed unless drastic measures are immediately taken to end this brutality. Such savagery will, of course, be repeated in other satellite countries if the United Nations fail to take the necessary action. A lesson to all who would carry out the Hitler program of murder must be taught the Hungarians.

We appeal to you, Mr. President, to propose to the military leaders of the United Nations to help prevent a constant repetition of such savagery. For the sake of saving many thousands of Jews among the other vassals of Hitler, Hungary must be taught a lesson in a manner similar to that of Berlin. Air squadrons must be sent to Budapest until it is wiped off the face of the earth. That will be a clear indication that the United Nations are concerned for the lives of Jews and will remove the impression among the enemy that Jewish lives have no value. And it should deter other vassal nations from following such Nazi-Hungarian example.

Wherever possible, the destruction should, of course, be limited to structures, so that a minimum of lives be lost.

Such a step will actually stem the oceans of bloodshed, bring a quicker end of the war, save an untold number of lives, including many thousands of Jews, and hasten the return of a normal attitude towards all human beings generally.

Of course, as a token that the lives of Jews are dear to the United Nations, exchange of prisoners for Jews would help.

For the sake of all humanity, we trust such action will be taken speedily.

ISAAC ROSENGARTEN,
Editor, the Jewish Forum.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speeches delivered by me during the Seventy-eighth Congress:

CONGRESS SHOULD RAISE WAGES OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES

(Speech of Hon. CHARLES W. VURSELL, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives Wednesday, November 24, 1943)

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, having discussed this matter some weeks ago, I want again today to speak very briefly in support of the appeal of the railroad men to the Congress for a raise of their wages in the meager sum of 8 cents an hour.

I want to say to the Members of this House that I believe we should vote to give them the small amount they ask. Let me submit my reasons.

First, their wages are too low, compared with the average level of wages. I say average level in order to exclude workers in most of the war-producing plants, because in most war plants the workers are getting at least 50 percent more than the railroad men will get after this increase has been allowed.

Second, they can be granted this raise without breaking the "hold the line" order because such raise will not yet bring them above the wages they are entitled to in comparison with the cost of living or the Little Steel formula.

Third, to grant them this raise will not, in way, raise the cost of living because such raise will not cause the railroads to raise their rates in a single instance.

Fourth, it will settle the discontent and restlessness that the administration and Mr. Vinson's denial of their rights has stirred up among them and it may prevent a general railway strike. The over a million men in these 15 organizations have seen their rights kicked around from one commission to another in a continuous game of "buck passing" till they are becoming aroused.

Fifth, collective bargaining between labor and management is an established institution in this Nation. It is regarded by the laboring men as the foundation of labor's bill of rights. The railroad management and the representatives of the men have met collectively, bargained, and agreed upon the increase of 8 cents an hour, and if we believe in what we have written into the law, that agreement, especially due to the fact that it does not even tend to raise the cost of living, should have been approved at once by Judge Vinson.

Sixth, when precedent and law is being evaded, bypassed, and usurped by bureaucratic and dictatorial methods, it is time for Congress to assert itself and act swiftly and effectively.

Mr. Speaker, sometimes I fear by our environment we allow ourselves in our thinking to get too far away from our people in our district. We forget the human equation. I want you to think with me for a moment so we can have a meeting of the minds and try to settle this question before this matter results in a Nation-wide strike and the Government finds an excuse to step in and take over the railroads. You remember, I am sure, the miserable and costly failure the Government made in operating the railroads in the First World War. None of us who remember that tragedy want to take a chance on it happening again.

The over a million men who are asking for this raise have not caused by a strike the loss of a day's time in 22 years. They have done a marvelous job in helping to keep the roadbeds and rolling stock in a shape that has made it possible to move twice the amount of freight and passenger traffic since war was declared than has ever before been transported in this Nation. They are among our most respected and patriotic citizens of the Nation, yet over one-half million of these railroad men receive an average of less than 70 cents an hour, and 120,000 of these railroad men receive 46 cents an hour or less. This Congress, in my judgment, should pass the Truman-Crosser resolution, settle the matter, and remove this gross inequity in wages.

OPPOSITION TO NATIONAL SERVICE ACT

(Extension of remarks of Hon. CHARLES W. VURSELL, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives, Wednesday, March 15, 1944)

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, today I want to voice my opposition against any sort of a national service act. I am against the Austin-Wadsworth bill, and will oppose any other bill under any name, whether it be one drawn under the suggestion of the President sometime back when he indicated to the Congress and the people that under certain conditions he would favor a national service act that would draft all people to serve under the centralized power and control of the Federal Government here in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed for the past many years the centralization of power and control of the people which has been constantly increasing year by year. Naturally, under the impact of war and the great struggle we are in, there has been less opposition to Government control, because all of the people want to do everything they can do, and all of the people are willing to sacrifice and are anxious to coordinate their efforts toward the winning of the war. There has been much necessary extension of control and regimentation of the people, but under the guise of war there has been much unjustified control fastened upon them and much unjustified centralization of power.

There is a great danger in such times of stress and struggle of such controls and regimentation and centralization of power being carried entirely too far, and it is my candid opinion, and I believe the opinion of the majority of the Members of this Congress, that that point will have been reached and passed if this Congress should approve and pass a national service act.

Certainly such an act should not be passed unless there is unquestioned proof that it is necessary. Certainly such an act is not in step with democracy. It is in step with the theory of a totalitarian form of government. The questions arise, Will it help to increase production of the implements of war? Will it help to increase the production of food on the farms of this country? Will it help to move more goods and materials over the transportation systems of America? Will it release more manpower for the military service of our country?

Of all the articles I have read upon this subject, and of all the speeches I have listened to, I must confess that I have not been convinced that there is a necessity now for a national service act and I have not been convinced that such an act will lead to greater production from our mines, in our industrial plants for the winning of the war, or that it will bring any greater production from the farmers of our Nation, or that it will hasten the delivery of goods over the railways or the transportation systems of our country. In fact, I fear that the passage of a national service act would retard all these endeavors which are so necessary to the well-being of the Nation in these times of stress. Freemen will bring forth greater production than men who are forced and regimented.

Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to depart from the democracy of this country which has served it so well and embark upon such a totalitarian course unless it be proven without doubt that our manpower situation is so desperate that we must take in this country such a dangerous step in a last final effort to get the production that is necesary to win the war. And if we take this step, we are following in the very footsteps of the Nazi government which early in the war did the same thing to all of the people of that nation.

I think the American farmers and the American workmen, all of them, whether or not they belong to any labor organization, when we take into consideration the miracle of production on the farms and in the factories that has been turned out under the democracy of this country, that they and we have demonstrated that democracy in action can be swift enough even during wartimes to maintain its democracy and at the same time develop the greatest food supply and war machine in the world. There is no question but that the men and women of this Nation have not only produced the best and greatest army in the world in the shortest length of time but they have produced the greatest amount of food, munitions of war, including airplanes, tanks, trucks, guns, and battleships, of any nation in the world. And, in addition, the American people, through production and lend-lease, have sent billions of dollars' worth of farm products and of war equipment to all of the nations of the world. They now have their fighting men on all of the battle fronts of the world, and they have poured twice as much money into this fight, money sacrificed from the savings of the people of this country, than all of the rest of the Allied Nations combined. Yet we are told we must do more, that we must draft every man and woman from the ages of 18 to 65 years, and that under such a law all of these people would be at the beck and call of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, the right of workers to higher wages or their right to transfer from one job to another without permission would be denied under the law. All of them would be subject to the assignment and call of the Government.

This step should not be taken. We had better look back into the history of this country and try to hold to some of the sound, fundamental principles that have made this country great. We had better be a little more proud and a little more satisfied with the accomplishments that the American men and women have been able to bring to bear in this great crisis because they have achieved miracles in production on the farms and in the mills and factories, and they have laid out their money and sent their boys throughout the world in this struggle with a devotion to this Nation exemplifying as deep a patriotism as can be found in the history of any nation in the world. The American people are still sound. They still respect the fundamental principles of American democracy and they want to maintain this country along the same lines of Government that have made it the greatest nation in the world.

Forced labor and regimentation, in my judgment, will slow down production—hence, slow down the war effort. I do not believe it can be justified on any premise. It is my opinion that if there ever was any excuse for a national service act that time passed over a year ago. Even Mr. McNutt, at the head of the War Manpower Commission for the past year, while there has been talk of the national service act, has said, "It is not necessary."

Such an act will place too much power in the hands of any government.

Such an act is too far a departure from democracy in this country.

Such an act, in my opinion, is unjustified and should not be approved by this Congress.

RAILROAD EMPLOYEES OF AMERICA

(Speech of Hon. CHARLES W. VURSELL, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives, Tuesday, October 12, 1943)

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the Members of this Congress today to a matter that should have consideration which affects one of the finest groups of laboring men in the Nation, who have backed the war effort to the limit and who have not cost their Government the loss of 1 hour's time during this war by calling a strike. They need our moral support now.

I refer to the railroad employees of America.

There is probably no group of laboring men in the Nation who have rendered a greater service to the people of the Nation and to the war effort than have the men who belong to the various railway brotherhoods and nonoperating organizations who, by their long hours and constant effort, have delivered the greatest amount of freight and passenger traffic over our American railway systems that the world has ever known.

During World War No. 1, at the peak of business in 1918, railroads almost broke down in handling 405,000,000,000 ton-miles of freight and 43,000,000,000 passenger-miles.

With 55 percent fewer locomotives and 26 percent fewer freight cars, last year, in 1942, the American railway men put over the road 638,000,000,000 ton-miles of freight—an increase of 58 percent over the 1918 movement. In the same year they moved 54,000,000,000 miles of passenger traffic, extending the 1918 volume by 26 percent.

It is estimated that in 1943 our freight traffic will reach 725,000,000,000 ton-miles, representing an increase of 80 percent over the business handled under Government operations during World War No. 1. The passenger increase is even greater.

Mr. Speaker, had it not been for over 1,000,000 employees of the railroads who are known as the nonoperating class, this outstanding record could not have been accomplished. This class of railroad men start with the maintenance men, some of whom are known as section hands, and continues on into the railroad yards and shops with the boilermakers, boilermaker helpers, machinists, and machinist helpers, car repairers, blacksmiths, and so forth. They are the men who have kept the roadbeds in shape, who have repaired and kept the rolling stock in such condition as to get this transportation over the road.

It may surprise you to know that a great amount of this unskilled labor during these wartimes and during these high prices start as low as 36 cents an hour and that the top pay for machinists in railroad work, which represent a body of the finest mechanics in America, is only 95 cents an hour.

These men are subject to the same taxes and are up against the same high cost of living as are the more fortunate millions of workers in the war factories of the Nation, who, in most instances, draw twice those amounts in salaries. You know the type of men I am referring to. There are thousands of them in my district who are among our most conservative and respected laboring men. In my district they make up a part of the citizenry of Centralia, Salem, Mount Vernon, Effingham, Palestine, Mount Carmel, Bluford, and other cities. You have them throughout your districts throughout the Nation. They are among our best citizens, they support the schools, the churches, and the bond drives.

These men are underpaid and have been since war was declared. They are asking for more money now and their plea has been almost utterly disregarded up to the present time in the face of the fact that the railroad companies, due to their heavy volume of business, are making more money than in the many years past, because of such increase in business and in increases granted them in rates.

The railroad men of this Nation have given the country little trouble with regard to work stoppages. There has not been a major railroad strike since 1922, a period of 21 years. Due to the fact that living has increased rapidly since the war began, on September 15, 15 organizations, representing 1,000,000 nonoperating employees served notices on the companies that they expected an increase of 20 cents an hour with a minimum hourly wage of 70 cents. This request was denied by the management and later referred to the local mediation board. This board failed to agree and the President, by executive order, appointed an Emergency Board to take the matter under advisement.

On May 24, 1943, this Board recommended an increase of 8 cents an hour. On June 22, 1943, Mr. Vinson, who was appointed recently by the President as Economic Stabilization Director, denied the increase as recommended by the Emergency Board. On August 7, the railroad management and representatives of the various crafts, negotiated an agreement based on the findings of this Emergency Board. Mr. Vinson, the President's right-hand man, who apparently is following the dictates of the President, has consistently refused to approve this small raise, and the railroad men have been refused the meager sum of 8 cents an hour increase.

Every fair-minded citizen who will give any thought to the situation knows that the price of living, within the past 2 years, has increased to a greater extent than the 8 cents an hour raise now refused to the railroad men. The pay of this great group of our citizens is below the average standard pay for the class of work they do and it is hard to understand why Mr. Vinson, who speaks for the President, continues to turn his back against this great group of men who have contributed patiently and loyally to the enormous task of railway transportation in this country.

It is to be hoped that the President and Mr. Vinson will take note of the unjust treatment these men are receiving and grant this meager raise in salary. If they do not the blame should be placed where it belongs. The President and Mr. Vinson, and no one else must be held responsible.

WAR LABOR BOARD SHOULD APPROVE ILLINOIS MINERS AND OPERATORS AGREEMENT

(Speech of Hon. CHARLES W. VURSELL, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives, Monday, October 4, 1943)

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, it is about time the War Labor Board changed its attitude toward the rank and file of the coal miners of the Nation and began thinking of getting coal to keep the people from freezing this winter rather than to continue dodging the issue in an effort to embarrass the labor leaders who represent the miners. If the War Labor Board and the Government are willing to give up their pet peeve, settle the coal mine dispute, and get greater production of coal for our citizens and the war effort they now have their chance.

The United Mine Workers of Illinois and the coal operators have reached an agreement on the proposed 8½-hour day. All the War Labor Board has to do now is to approve such agreement. Doubtless, if this Board will approve this agreement, its terms will be accepted throughout the Nation with a new wage contract entered into between the mine workers and the operators. It is to be hoped that the President and the War Labor Board will see the urgent necessity of such action. I refer to the President because there is little question but that none of the bureau heads, in an important matter like this, would make a decision without his approval.

Without the renewal of a wage contract the coal miners have carried on with the exception of a short time out on strike, and they have done a good job in production for the Nation. As a class they have not received the consideration and credit that is due them. It should have been evident from the beginning that with the increase of the cost of living that the wages of the miners, either by allowing portal to portal pay or in other ways, must be increased.

Their scale of wages has been far below the scale of wages in the munitions factories. Their work is and has been more hazardous than that of most industrial workers. All over the Nation women with no experience and with only a few weeks' training have been drawing higher wages than the miners, who have spent years in acquiring the skill of their trade. It should have been evident to those in charge of the War Labor Board that you cannot keep a group of men, who are organized and whose ranks number into the hundreds of thousands, at a wage level far below what their neighbors are making in less hazardous work and in better working conditions than are those of the miners. It is to be hoped that the War Labor Board will abandon its hard-headed attitude and that peace may come to the mining industry with a greater production of coal because our output now is lagging behind production goals by over 500,000 tons per week.

This Nation faces a serious fuel shortage during the coming winter. Thousands upon thousands of American homes will be cold because of an inability to obtain fuel. The responsibility for this fuel shortage must be accepted by the War Labor Board, inasmuch as its unreasoning attitude toward the miners is as directly responsible for the strife in that industry as the refusal of the miners to work under conditions which they regarded as intolerable.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the great majority of the Members of this House, if they had an opportunity, would vote for the proposal that is now before the War Labor Board. I am sure the coal miners have the sympathy of the majority of the Members of this House who recognize their hazardous employment and who also recognize that this group of men has been underpaid for many months when taking into consideration the high cost of living and the wage standard set for other industrial workers.

It is to be hoped that the War Labor Board will abandon its arbitrary policy, approve this agreement, and stop the uncertainty and strife in the mining industry in the interest of the men who work in the mines and in the interest of the war effort and our civilian economy.

MAKE MEDIATION DECISIONS FINAL

(Remarks of Hon. CHARLES W. VURSELL, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives, Friday, June 9, 1944)

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the Banking and Currency Committee for writing into this price control bill section 10, in which the committee provides that the decisions by the Railway Mediation Board, or such agencies settling matters of dispute between railroad management and railway employees, shall be final when rendered.

If this amendment is approved by this Congress it will prevent the playing of politics and the shameful practices by those high in official authority here in Washington who, by their buck-passing and delay, caused a strike to be called by the railway labor men of the Nation which hurt the cause of railway labor organizations unjustly, during the latter part of last year and which brought about a situation which gave the President of the United States an opportunity to seize the railroads all of which could and should have been avoided and which will be made impossible in the future if this amendment is approved by the Congress.

Members of this House will remember that for a year prior to the calling of the railway strike in December of last year through the Board set up for the hearing of such disputes every legal step had been taken as between the railway employees and railway management. The facts are the railway management recognized the railway employees were entitled to more money and the two groups had agreed upon the amount. At that point through the operation and on the advice of O. P. A. the matter was appealed to Director of Stabilization, Mr. Fred Vinson. He ruled against it on the theory that it might increase the cost of living.

The President came into the picture and set up a new Board to make a restudy and a recanvass of the entire matter which had been restudied and recanvassed for an entire year and when the facts were brought in again Mr. Vinson offered some increases but wanted it done in his particular way which was inequitable to the men involved. It was at this juncture that the President seized the railroads, apparently in order to prevent a Nation-wide tie-up of transportation. After the railroads were seized and held for 48 hours they were turned back to the companies and a settlement was made with the men involved at as much or more costs than would have resulted from their contract had the matter never been appealed to Mr. Vinson, to Mr. Byrnes, or the President.

I protested the delay in a speech on the floor of the House at that time; urged that the 15 nonoperating groups and that the 5 operating groups representing over one and one-half millions of among our finest laboring men in the Nation be given the small raise in salary they and the railway management had agreed upon. The official delayers and stabilizers, from Judge Vinson to the White House, would not do it. They delayed the matter and forced the men to vote to strike.

If this legislation is approved, the decision of the Board will be final. Neither Mr. Vinson, the President, nor anyone can delay the execution of the Board's order.

This amendment provides for the using of the Railway Mediation Board and other well thought-out plans for arriving at just decisions between railway employees and railway management growing out of collective bargaining.

It removes the possibility of delay in the future and the possibility of playing politics at the expense of the railway workers and railway management. It compels such disputes to be adjudicated and settled in an impartial way and in a way that has proven satisfactory in the past.

It is the right step in the right direction to settle labor and management controversies by sound principles of mediation which is so necessary to the economy of this country.

The Hand-Out Complex

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted, I wish to include an editorial appearing in the Bratleboro Reformer of August 8, 1944, entitled "The Hand-Out Complex":

THE HAND-OUT COMPLEX

The Democratic administration in Washington has developed a severe hand-out complex, the latest manifestation of which is a proposal to increase the amount paid to the unemployed up to $35 a week. This would be accomplished by taking over the present unemployment compensation systems operated by the States and dumping in a lot more money.

This is a telling self-indictment of the Democrats. They are so conditioned to unemployment, the dole, and depression that they don't think in terms of anything else. They have mentally drifted into a world where such things are normal and permanent. All the post-war planning they do consists of more W. P. A., more public works, more hand-outs. They are perpetually proposing to do something to improve the lot of the common man, but so far have never been able to think of anything to do except spend some more Government money. It does not seem to have occurred to them that what the common man wants most of all is an honest job.

The people of this country don't want to go back to dole, unemployment, and depression when the war is over. They want to go back to the kind of America they used to know, where good workers could get good jobs, where people paid their own bills and didn't expect some alphabetical agency to bail them out of all their troubles. The people want to put Washington back on the American style and the first step will be taken in November.

Aid for Dependents of Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, while I have been in Rhode Island I have received innumerable requests for information relative to aid to dependents of men and women in the armed forces. I wish it were possible to explain to every relative of a man or woman in the service that he should write to his Congressman if he has any difficulty, or if there is any information he wants on this subject.

In the Second Rhode Island Congressional District, folks should write to me, JOHN E. FOGARTY, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. I shall be happy to see to it that their problems are taken care of properly.

Any dependent of a man or a woman in our armed forces who is paid $138 a month or less is eligible to receive a dependent's allowance from the Government. It must be remembered that this act applies only to men and women in service whose base pay is $138 a month or less. Those men and women in service who get more than $138 per month come under another system. The new act passed by Congress, effective November 1, 1943, provides a monthly family allowance as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife may get up to $42 per month if she is named specifically in the court order to receive alimony and she receives the amount named. If this amount is in excess of $42, she cannot receive over $42. The child of a divorce, where there is no wife receiving family allowance, can get up to $42 per month regardless of the amount given in the court order. If there is a wife receiving family allowance this amount is $30 and if there are other children it is slightly less. Therefore, if the divorce or court order does not name the child to receive support or name the child for less support, this is disregarded and the above amounts are given. Illegitimate children are also considered as class A dependents of the serviceman if they are proven to be his children either by his sworn statement to that effect or by a court order adjudging him to be the father.

Class B dependents: A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent or two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37. Note: Class B dependents, it must be clearly understood, are dependents who are only partially dependent upon service men and women for support. In other words, if the dependents are dependent upon the service man or woman for 50 percent or less of their support they are classed as B dependents. Those who make application for this family allowance, therefore, should be careful to prove that they are more than 51 percent if they actually need chief support from the man or woman in service, and especially if they have no outside income. Persons who have other means of income unless it is small will as a rule be classed as B dependents. Those who need a great deal of assistance will be classed as B–1 dependents.

Class B–1 dependents: One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; and each additional brother or sister, $11. Two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $79, plus $11 for each additional brother or sister; a brother or sister but no parents, $42, with additional $11 for each additional brother or sister. Note that here again it must be remembered that it is important to prove more than 50-percent dependency where the parents and brothers and sisters actually are greatly dependent. If it is not proven, they are classed as B dependents and receive considerably less money, as outlined above.

HOW TO GET FAMILY ALLOWANCE

Wherever possible, as soon as a man or woman enters service they should make application for the allowance to their dependents. They should do this immediately when they are inducted. The allowance payments do not go back but start with the date of application. Therefore, if the man or woman in service waits a month after induction before they file an application, 1 month's family allowance is lost. The longer they wait to file an application, the more money is lost. It is important to file for this the day they enter.

The man or woman in service should submit the application on a form they can get from the commanding officer. In filling out this form it is good to be careful to spell all names correctly and give exact information as to marriage, dates of birth, and so forth. Many of the troubles dependents have in getting their family allowances are due to the fact that the service man or woman is careless in filling out the blank. An extra minute filling out the blank may save several months' time in getting the allowance approved. The application after careful study and filling out should then be handed to the commanding officer.

In the case where a class A dependent must apply, the Army provides a blank to be filled out, but the Navy requires only a letter in the handwriting of the dependent stating the facts and giving the serviceman's full name and serial number. Class A family allowance is approved regardless of the serviceman's desire for it.

If the man or woman in service with class B or B–1 dependents refuses to make an application for them, no other person can apply, and there is no way it can be given to them. They cannot be forced to apply, and it is started or discontinued at the will of the serviceman. If the man or woman is in the Army and his class B or B–1 dependents know that he will approve their application, they may make the application for him providing he is overseas. When the application is received, he is contacted for his approval. If the man or woman is in any other branch of the service, they must make application regardless of whether or not they are out of the country.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN FAMILY ALLOWANCE AND ALLOTMENT

It is well for both the serviceman and the dependents to know the difference in these terms. Family allowance is a sum of money partly paid by the service man or woman and partly paid by the Government. No matter how small or how large the family allowance is $22 is deducted from the service man's or woman's salary and the balance is paid by the Government. Dependency must be shown for class B or B–1 dependents to receive family allowance.

An allotment is a voluntary deduction from a man's pay to anyone he wishes to give it and it is not increased by any amount from the Government. These are referred to as class E allotments and no dependency needs be shown to receive it. The service man or woman is the only one who can request that this deduction be made from his pay.

PARENTS AND BROTHERS AND SISTERS CAN RECEIVE ALLOWANCES AT THE SAME TIME AS WIFE AND CHILDREN

It is also important to know that parents and brothers and sisters can get family allowance even if the serviceman's wife and children get one. In other words, if men or women in service have parents and brothers or sisters dependent upon them as well as a wife and children—all of these dependents can receive family allowance. Because a serviceman has a wife and child receiving this allowance, it does not prevent his parents and brothers and sisters from also receiving it. In order to name them, he has to make an additional $5 contribution toward the family allowance. For example, if he has a wife and child or children receiving family allowance, he is having $22 deducted from his wages in part payment of it. If he wishes also to name his parents or brothers or sisters, he has $5 more taken out or a total of $27. The balance in both cases is paid by the Government.

PARENTS CAN GET FAMILY ALLOWANCE FROM MORE THAN ONE SON OR DAUGHTER IN SERVICE

If parents are dependent upon more than one son or daughter or both in service they can get more dependency allowance. They may get either a B rating from both sons or they may get a B–1 rating from one and a B from another. They may receive family allowance from no more than two sons or daughters in service. This is given where the need is shown to be sufficiently great enough to warrant it.

If you need any further help, contact your Congressman. It is a Congressman's duty to help with such matters. He is your representative in Washington. If you have any trouble at all in this respect, your Congressman is the person to take it up with.

Your Congressman has already helped in more than 5,000 cases. Only 100 of these are now pending. Your Congressman will settle your case for you and get you every cent you have coming.

FOR THOSE WHO RECEIVED A CUT IN FAMILY ALLOWANCE

Many people received a cut recently in their family allowance. No explanation is given when the reduced checks arrive so here is the explanation.

To begin with, all those who were cut were reduced to $37 per month. In other words, they were given a class B dependency. No matter how many dependents there are in a family, a class B dependency under the new law gives only $37.

What is a class B dependency? A class B dependency is one where the parents or brothers and sisters are dependent upon the soldier or sailor 50 percent or less.

All dependents some time ago were sent a blank to fill out. On that blank they were asked to list their monthly living expenses for the last 12 months and their average monthly income for the last 12 months. If the difference between monthly expenses and income listed on this blank was $37 or less, they were cut to a class B dependency rating. Even if the difference between the monthly income and monthly expenses listed on this blank was $43 or less, they were given a class B dependency, because $43 is closer to $37 than $68—which is the amount for a B–1 rating.

In other words, the dependents' own figures as put on this blank were used as the basis for rating them as B instead of B–1 dependents.

Another thing that reduced many people to $37 per month was the way they filled out the part of the blank which asked how much the soldier or sailor contributed before he joined the armed forces. Many parents put down that they did not know, or put in that the boy contributed nothing to their support or very little before he joined. The more the boy contributed to their support, the better are the chances of the parents to a B–1 rating.

If those who have been cut cannot make ends meet on $37 per month they should take the matter up with their local Veterans of Foreign Wars or local American Legion head or local Red Cross chairman; and if any further information or assistance is needed write me: Congressman JOHN E. FOGARTY, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Here Is the History of Events at Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an article appearing in the Buffalo Evening News, Buffalo, N. Y., under date of July 31, 1944, entitled "Here's the History of Events at Democratic Convention":

HERE'S THE HISTORY OF EVENTS AT DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

(By James L. Wright)

WASHINGTON, July 31.—Maybe it is not too late, even now, to look over the bloody trail stemming from the Democratic National Convention in Chicago.

Political heads went on the chopping block there. Brave hearts were left bleeding from the rapier thrusts of politics; loyalty was trampled underfoot. It was an amazing week of chicanery and deception unequaled in the palmiest days of bossism.

Long has it been said of President Roosevelt by his critics that he is "all things to all men." Senators and Representatives go to the White House with legislation or proposed administration policies, and after discussing them leave the Chief Executive convinced of his support, only to find out later when the show-down comes they have his opposition instead. Again and again and again that has happened.

But never before has this double-talk, if not double-cross, been recorded in black and white, spread on the record over the President's signature, as it was during the hectic week of the nominating convention in Chicago when Mr. Roosevelt was sure of his own nomination for a fourth term, and was being looked to for guidance in the selection of a Vice Presidential running mate.

First one man appeared as the White House favorite, then another and then another. Various letters, contradictory in character, but all written on the familiar light-green stationery the President uses for his personal correspondence, and signed in his own handwriting, appeared mysteriously at psychological moments, and from undetermined places.

First, there was the letter on which Vice President HENRY A. WALLACE counted for renomination. Days before the correspondents left Washington it became known that such a letter would be put in the hands of Senator SAMUEL D. JACKSON of Indiana, slated for permanent chairman of the convention, but as late as the Saturday before the convention opened Democratic National Chairman Robert E. Hannegan said he did not know anything about such a letter.

The next day Mr. Hannegan confirmed the report there would be such a letter from the President and said, "I have an idea what is in it," though he would not say he had read it or had had it read to him. However, even Senator JACKSON, to whom the letter was addressed, told one of his closest confidants that he did not know about the letter, what it contained, or where it would come from, or how it would be placed in his hands.

On Monday an unidentified messenger appeared before the Indiana legislator, asked if he was Senator JACKSON, and being assured that he was handed him the President's letter. The messenger did not say where he came from or who sent him, but the letter was on White House stationery, and the signature was undeniably the President's, so the Senator read it over the radio. On the day before, so it leaked out much later, Mr. Hannegan had had a secret rendezvous with the President on his private car in the switchyards of Chicago.

Of course, the letter was the one which endorsed HENRY WALLACE as a personal friend. "I like him and respect him, and he is my personal friend. For these reasons I personally would vote for his renomination if I were a delegate to the convention," the President wrote.

Not a word about HENRY WALLACE'S loyalty to the President. Not a word about his loyalty to the New Deal. Not a word about the 4 years' work he had done as Presiding Officer of the Senate in getting through the administration's policies.

On the contrary, the President reminded the convention that it had the responsibility of selecting the Vice President, and said it "should give great consideration to the pros and cons of its choice."

Poor HENRY! Former National Chairman James A. Farley is credited with branding the letter as "the kiss of death for HENRY." Turner Catledge, brilliant writer for the New York Times, said: "It's the first time I ever saw a man's throat cut below the belt."

Disemboweled as he was, he fought on, remained loyal to his chief, even after other letters had come to light on the same kind of White House stationery, and over the President's signature, in which he said of Senator HARRY S. TRUMAN and Associate Justice William O. Douglas that "I should be very glad to run with either one of them and believe that either one of them would add strength to the ticket."

That was more than he had said for HENRY WALLACE, the man he had handpicked and forced a rebellious convention to select as his running mate 4 years earlier. HENRY WALLACE and his supporters just wouldn't believe there was such a letter. "We have a letter we can show. If they have one, why don't they show it?" trumpeted Senator JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, of Pennsylvania.

Subsequent developments lent more than a suspicion that even before the pro-Wallace letter was made public, the other letter had been written, and still a third man, James F. Byrnes, Director of the Office of war Mobilization, had rushed out from the White House to Chicago, believing that he personally had been given the President's blessing for Vice President. After all he was "close in," and had been serving as "assistant President" for many months.

When word of the President's Truman-Douglas endorsement circulated, Senator Truman was as excited as a teen-age girl just proposed to.

"I wouldn't believe it myself until I saw it with my own eyes," he said excitedly. "I have just read it. Part of it is typewritten and part of it is in the President's own handwriting. He says I'll add real strength to the ticket. It looks as though I'll have to take it."

Then the row developed in Wallace circles as to whether or not there was such a letter. Finally, Mr. Hannegan accepted the challenge and exhibited that letter, but by that time it bore the date of July 19, and was written in its entirety on the typewriter.

Before that the boom for Mr. Justice Byrnes had grown, budded, bloomed, withered, and died completely under a hot blast from the C. I. O. Over the coffee at breakfast one morning in his ritz hotel suite at the Ambassador-East, where Sidney Hilman was staying, that labor leader "talked turkey" to Senator TRUMAN. Be it remembered that that Missouri solon had promised his old friend, former Justice Byrnes, he would nominate him for the Vice Presidency. Bluntly, Mr. Hillman, with the backing of the Communist-inclined C. I. O. Political Action Committee, told the Senator that labor never would take Byrnes, that it would take him (TRUMAN) as a compromise if Wallace could not make the grade.

That put the Senator in a box. He was most uncomfortable. But he had been tapped with the magic wand. Mr. Byrnes bowed to the will of the President—and the C. I. O. Next morning he issued a formal statement: "In deference to the wishes of the President," it began, "I ask that my name be not placed before the convention as a candidate for the democratic nomination for Vice President." It was curtain for Jimmy. He slipped out of town, back to Washington, like a stranded tragedian.

Last Thursday the Associated Press carried a report from Jimmie's home town, Columbia, S. C., saying that he would remain by the President's side until after the November elections out of a sense of loyalty, but then would resign as Director of the Office of War Mobilization. The report quoted the Columbia Record as saying he had "750 convention votes pledged to him when he went to Chicago—more than enough to nominate, but withdrew his name after party leaders bowed to the will of Sidney Hillman, C. I. O. political boss."

Anyone who knows Mr. Byrnes, the man who stepped down from a lifetime job as an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court to assist his personal friend, the President, in handling his wartime troubles, knows that he would not have gone to Chicago at convention time, opened political headquarters and asked Senator TRUMAN to nominate him unless he felt he had the blessing of Franklin D. Roosevelt. When he learned later it was otherwise, he withdrew "in deference to the wishes of the President."

And "Dear ALBEN" BARKLEY, much wooed in the days of yore. He, too, is left with a bleeding heart, after a touching forgive-and-forget session with Roosevelt, following his sensational break with the President when he vetoed the hard-won tax bill in this session of Congress. BARKLEY believed the Vice Presidential race was a free-for-all, and that he had had the hobbles taken off. Before going to Chicago he had promised to nominate the President for his fourth term and believed he himself would be acceptable to the President as his running mate.

Consequently BARKLEY for Vice President headquarters were opened by his fellow Kentuckians. But 'Dear Alben" was not mentioned as an "acceptable" in any of the letters written by the President. He WAS ignored. Angered, BARKLEY withdrew his nominating speech for the President, as put out in advance, debated with friends all evening and until 2 o'clock in the morning of the day it was to be made whether he would deliver it at all. He finally issued a formal notice to correspondents that they could use it as written upon delivery. He had decided to make it.

But the way in which the old-line political bosses, the Kellys, Flynns, Hagues, and Pendergasts, at first fought and then worked with the newer labor bosses to run the show at Chicago, and get nominated the man both sets of bosses could agree on, is one of the behind-the-scenes manipulations of transcending importance to the American people. It shows complete boss rule.

The truth is that after the President had written his letter saying that either Senator TRUMAN or Justice Douglas would add strength to the ticket, the bosses wanted the word "right from the 'hosses' mouth," so Mr. Hannegan called the President, while Mayor Frank Hague of Jersey City, Mayor Edward J. Kelly of Chicago, and Edward J. Flynn of the Bronx were in the room, and Mr. Roosevelt then "gave Truman the nod," choosing him over Douglas, with whom he had been bracketed in tne second letter.

Asked how he knew he had been "given the nod" and had been chosen over all other candidates, the truthful HARRY TRUMAN said:

"I listened in on the telephone conversation with the President."

Chairman Hannegan, who had never wanted WALLACE renominated and finally openly admitted that he hoped Senator TRUMAN would be nominated, probably never heard of the principle enunciated by Will H. Hays when he was chairman of the Republican National Committee:

"The business of the chairman is to elect—not select."

But then, times have changed.

The Robot Bomb Attacks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, when Representative SCOTT and I recently visited supreme headquarters of the Allied Expeditionary Forces in England, Maj. Gen. Fred Anderson, who has immediate charge of all bombing over the European and Mediterranean theaters, arranged for Sgt. Frank Kelly, of Indianapolis, to take us in the general's car for a survey of the robot bomb damage.

Driving through Wimbledon, we had a blow-out, and we all pitched in to change tires and get under way. We had trouble with the jack, and a smiling lady came out of a notions store to tell us we could use hers. She had in her hand a copy of London's Sketch, with a picture of Representative SCOTT and the speaker. Recognizing us, she introduced herself as Mrs. Mayhead and asked us to autograph the picture. In signing my name, I obtained a promise from Mrs. Mayhead to write me in a few days and tell me about the robots which were then crashing nearby.

Last week I received here the following letter:

WIMBLEDON, S. W. 19, LONDON, July 15, 1944.

(At this moment we are on the "alert.")

DEAR MR. CANFIELD: I am keeping my promise to write to you.

When I came across to ask you if you would like a bigger jack for your car, I had no idea I should be speaking to two gentlemen from Congress.

I must be frank. I WAS indeed surprised to find myself speaking to such friendly men as yourself and companion. It is real proof to me that your country and mine are allies in a good cause—to defeat an enemy that has no honor and kindness.

Now London is going through a new phase in this war, but with God's aid we shall come through with our flag flying high.

Your countrymen are the first to help in the flying-bomb damage and destruction. They have rendered invaluable help to the sufferers of Hitler's missiles, and they, too, have suffered from them and not far from here.

My eldest son is attached to the headquarters of the British Increment Section G. L. V1 (U. S.) Corps in Italy, and he has told me all about your countrymen there. My youngest son is in Egypt serving with the R. A. F.

Please tell your countrymen that with the A. A. F. and the R. A. F. we shall soon have quiet nights and days in London.

England kept her chin up in 1940–1 and she will do it in 1944. Only a beaten enemy would resort to this new and terrible method of warfare.

My husband and I wish you a safe return to your country.

Sincerely yours,

MRS. MAYHEAD.

I wish I could have taken Mrs. Mayhead to S. H. A. E. F. and shown her the large writing on General Anderson's wall. It is a quotation from Virgil's Georgics written approximately B. C. 40, and it is as follows:

Germany heard a clashing of arms over all the sky; the Alps trembled with uncommon earthquakes—never did lightnings fall in greater quantities from a serene sky—or direful thunders blaze so often.

Quit Kiddin', Lady

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank C. Waldrop, from the Washington Times-Herald of August 18, 1944:

QUIT KIDDIN', LADY

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

When it comes to pious eye-rolling coupled with fast in-fighting, we give you as No. 1 Anna Eleanor Roosevelt Roosevelt, who long ago quit the role of First Lady of the Land for that of a New Deal politician.

Consider her syndicated column of yesterday on the Senate-War Department fracas concerning political propaganda to the troops.

On the one hand, Mrs. Roosevelt said that she thinks "all of us rejoice" that the Senate has reworded the law which the War Department has been interpreting so strictly that the troops are denied a chance to see a movie of Fibber McGee and Molly.

On the other hand, she said she didn't think it "fair" for Senator TAFT, of Ohio, and others to accuse the War Department of having deliberately misinterpreted the original law and reduced it to nonsense by extravagant enforcement tricks.

And then she wrote:

"The motive behind the original action by Senator TAFT and the Congress was, of course, an entirely correct one. No voters should be so restricted that they do not get all possible information before exercising their franchise, and the information certainly should be impartial."

Mrs. Roosevelt neglected to tell her audience the background that caused the "original action" she mentions. But it so happens that only today there came to this writer's hands eight items that tell the story to anybody who looks at them.

These eight are representative samples of what we are told was a 6,000-ton (yep, six thousand ton) bundle of magazines and pamphlets dumped on a certain pier from a United States Army transport, with directions to let the 6,000 tons' worth go into circulation, at once, in one of the greatest assembly points for United States troops anywhere in the world.

Incidentally, we apologize for such roundabout language, but a closer description of the troop assembly point would be in violation of military censorship, and identification of the man who got the 6,000-ton bundle would put our source of information (a United States Government official) on the Washington hot spot.

We simply tell you the eight samples are here on the desk as this is written. Seven of the eight are labeled "Published by the Government of the United States of America." The eighth is a beautiful four-color photograph on a handsome backing, and only bears the signature of the man pictured—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

But that eighth sample has something in common with each of the seven booklets, namely, that every one of those, too, has a handsome picture of Franklin D. Roosevelt. And further, that all were put out by the Office of War Information, commanded by none other than Uncle Elmer Davis, the celebrated radio baritone reader of news bulletins.

Mrs. Roosevelt did not inform her readers yesterday, though it is true, that Congress had to restrain Uncle Elmer from plastering the United States of America with many thousand tons of such Roosevelt propaganda.

For example, one of the eight samples on my desk is vol. 1, No. 1, of the O W. I. publication, Victory, a beautiful, slick paper job made up something on the form of Life magazine, except better, and containing an article, Roosevelt of America. The opening sentence of this little dithyramb reads:

"From out of America, cradle of democracy, there has come a new Declaration of Independence for the whole world. Its author is Franklin Delano Roosevelt, President of the United States."

Mr. Roosevelt is then described as "a brilliant statesman of great sincerity * * * whose social and economic philosophies once before saved his country in a crisis * * * a warm-hearted and companionable man * * * a kindly, loving, and beloved man * * *."

After that subdued beginning, it goes on to credit F. D. R. with practically everything short of invention of the wheel and payment of Europe's World War No. 1 debts to the United States of America.

The campaign for term IV was getting off to that sort of hot start at the expense of all the American taxpayers, when Congress forbade the O. W. I. to circulate any of its tripe inside America.

But that didn't prevent the clever sideslip somebody thought up for Uncle Elmer of dumping thousands of tons of things like Victory in the vicinity of United States troops abroad. Which he has done.

Some of the other samples of his handiwork include: Report from America: The United States Goes to War, with a picture of F. D. R. and 2,000,000 airmen, with a picture of F. D. R. and 185,000 airplanes, with a picture of F. D. R. and the Four Freedoms, with a picture of, etc., and the United States Navy with—sure. Even I Am Not Crazy Enough to Want a War, a study of Hitler's contradictory statements, is decorated with the usual.

Mrs. Roosevelt might have enlightened her readers, yesterday, that it was because of such things, done at the United States taxpayers' expense, that Congress had to put a strong curb bit on the Roosevelt propagandists in Government jobs.

But she, like all the other New Deal politicians, has thrown restraint to the winds to seek a term IV for her husband. So there is no use expecting anything but tough partisan campaigning by her or her husband, either, until they are at last dethroned.

In 1964

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Globe of August 10, 1944:

IN 1964

With the look of a woman bent on keeping a very important date, she was, so she explained, on her way to New York City to meet her soldier-husband of World War No. 2. Her children, a boy and a girl of an age to be in uniform in World War No. 3, provided the present interval of 25 years between the outbreaks of such conflicts is maintained, she had left in charge of her mother on the Massachusetts shore.

Pleased with the immediate prospect, she spoke lightly of many things, but one of her remarks made a listener start with astonishment. It was when she said, "There have always been wars and, of course, there always will be."

That reminded this person of what another woman, a generation older, had been saying a few days before. She was explaining her own interest in the problem of attaining lasting peace. "You see I have four small grandsons." Her own anxiety about the sailor-fathers of two of these small boys is much less than it was, but she looks ahead, beyond her own life expectation. To her those four tiny toddlers just learning to say "Granny" represent the most important group upon earth. Whatever line of national action seems best adapted to save them from the intensified horror of fighting in World War No. 3 will receive her support.

Before the human mind can give itself to thorough consideration of the prevention of future war, it is very necessary to shake off the obsession that wars always will be because they always have been. After all, some progress has been made through the ages. There were many centuries, stretching back into prehistoric times, when human beings were killed by pestilence that would wipe out whole communities. The prevailing theory held by those reputed wise was that nothing could be done about them, except perhaps by appeasing the powers of darkness by some sort of magic.

Modern sanitation and medicine have made such progress in relegating visitations of pestilence to the dim past that only in remote places of the earth is any such calamity feared. And when signs of it appear, strong repressive measures are employed promptly.

Early in the past century, features pitted from smallpox, souvenirs worn by the survivors of that disease, were often seen. But vaccination, backed by law widely enforced, has practically put an end to that. It could not have been accomplished by voluntary action or by fervent exhortation.

It was only at the beginning of this century that United States Army doctors pinned the responsibility for carrying the germs of yellow fever on a certain mosquito. And now the conquest of that disease may be regarded as assured.

At present most people are thinking that aggressive dictatorships, exemplified by the systems set up by Mussolini, Hitler, and long flourishing under the Mikado, are the chief causes of war. It is a pressing question of how to bring certain countries to a better viewpoint once they are defeated in battle.

Something along this line has come about in the memory of those still living. No people that ever lived were more eager for war than the Turks. They gained possession of north Africa and obtained a strong grip on Spain. But taking up the sword for conquest apparently has ceased to interest the Turks. To be sure they have broken with Germany, but only when it seemed certain that the Axis could not strike back. Apparently the Turks, the fiercest fighters of the old world, have lost their appetite for war.

Of course, it will be a tremendous undertaking to discover the ways of making war impossible, but that should be regarded as the major project of the human race. If it cannot be accomplished, there is no hope for anything else. If only the men and women who have a say in our national affairs keep in the forefront of their minds the boys, and also the girls, now under 15 and the babies that will come into the world in the next 5 years, there will be a real prospect of ridding this earth of the most fearful of all afflictions.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Information for Returning Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I have become convinced, through my talks with veterans of World War No. 2 who have returned to their homes, that all are not fully informed on the subject of benefits provided for them by the so-called G. I. bill. If any of the boys who are now returning home have any questions on this subject I would be mighty glad if they would get in touch with their Congressman. In the Second Rhode Island Congressional District, I wish they would write to me, JOHN E. FOGARTY, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Among some of the provisions of present law are those which enable the veterans to do the following:

They can buy or repair a home, buy and stock up a farm, start a new business, get a high-school or college education, draw special unemployment benefits if unable to find work, be assured of free and adequate hospitalization.

Benefits extend to men and women of the armed services who have other than dishonorable discharges and who have served 90 days since September 15, 1940, or less than 90 days if they have service-connected disabilities.

It is important to know exactly what the Government now offers, what the terms, the conditions, the opportunities are in each field.

FIRST, TAKE THE OPPORTUNITY FOR HOME BUYING OR FOR BUYING A FARM

A qualified veteran will be able to get the Veterans' Administration to arrange for a Government-guaranteed loan for buying or building a home or for making repairs, alterations, and improvements on a home. Such loans also may be obtained by a veteran to pay off back taxes or delinquent debts on homes. The Government will guarantee 50 percent of the loan up to $2,000 and will pay the first year's interest on the part of the loan that it guarantees. Thus, a veteran can borrow up to $4,000, with the Government standing behind half of it.

These loans can be made by a bank, loan association, or any other lending agency, including an individual or friend of the veteran. If you are a veteran who obtains such a loan, you would have to satisfy the lender as to collateral on your share. But, in the case of buying a home, the home could be used as collateral. Interest on these loans cannot exceed 4 percent, and they must be repaid in full within 20 years.

In addition, the Government will guarantee fully a secondary loan up to 20 percent of the cost of the property. But the total amount guaranteed by the Government in both loans cannot exceed $2,000. This provision makes it possible for veterans to get cash for original down payments on homes. Interest on such secondary loans can run up to 5 percent. Veterans have until 2 years after the war or 2 years after their discharge—whichever is later—to take advantage of the loan opportunities.

Loans on the same basis are available for veterans who want to buy farms. Money from the loans may be used to purchase land, buildings, livestock, machinery, or other equipment, or for making repairs and improvements. But if you are a veteran and want to buy a farm, you must show that you know something about farming and are likely to make a success of the undertaking.

SUPPOSE A VETERAN WANTS TO SET UP HIS OWN BUSINESS

Here the procedure and conditions for getting loans are about the same as those for buying homes or farms. The money may be used to buy an established business or land, buildings, supplies, equipment, machinery, and so forth. Secondary loans also are available for down payments. But if you are getting a loan for this purpose, the Veterans' Administration will want to know something about your background and experience in this business. In other words, you will have to show that there is a reasonable likelihood that you will make a success of it. Even so, it is expected that many veterans will want to start their own business and will be helped.

IF IT IS A MATTER OF EDUCATION OR TRAINING

When a veteran qualifies for a college, school, or training course, the Government will pay up to $500 a year to cover tuition, laboratory fees, cost of books, and so forth. The student also will get $50 a month living allowance, plus $25 a month if he has a wife or other dependents. He may choose his school, but he must keep up with the work or he will be dropped.

If a veteran was under 25 when he entered the service he may return to school even though his education was not interrupted. That is, he may have left school and been working when he entered service. But anyone who was 25 or over when he went into service must show, in order to qualify, that his education was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with. However, any veteran who desires a refresher or retraining course may take such a course for 1 year.

A veteran who qualifies for college or other schooling will be able to remain at Government exense for 1 year. Then, if he qualifies for further education, he can remain for the length of time, up to a total of 4 years, that he served between Setember 15, 1940, and the end of the war. He has until 2 years after his discharge or after the war ends to return to school. This Government-paid education program stops 7 years after the war ends.

NEXT, AS TO UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Ex-service men and women will be able to claim unemployment benefits of $20 a week for up to 52 weeks if they cannot find jobs. They will be entitled to 4 weeks of unemployment benefits for each month of service, plus additional time allowance for the first 90 days of service. But they are supposed to register with a public employment agency, such as the United States Employment Service, and accept suitable work if offered. Furthermore, they will be disqualified from unemployment benefits if they give up suitable jobs without reason, are fired for misconduct, or, in certain cases, go out on strike. Unemployment benefits will be available to a veteran until 2 years after his discharge or 2 years after the war, whichever is later.

Cash benefits also are provided for self-employed veterans who make less than $100 a month. They can have the Government make up the difference between their net earnings and $100 a month. Like the unemployment payment, this benefit is allowed up to 52 weeks according to length of service.

A Tribute to Pompey Smash

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. GLENN BEALL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a poem writen by Mr. P. J. Grimes in which he pays tribute to the place of his birth:

A TRIBUTE TO POMPEY SMASH

There was a town called Pompey Smash
Made up of Irish stock
Not very far from Cherry Lane,
Just north of Old Dan's rock.

Two miles west of Clarysville
Stands this old fashioned town
Of Scotts, and Smiths, and Flannagans,
Of Sleemans, Drumes, and Browns.

There were Sharps, Longs, and Parkers,
Gilmartins, and the Ryles,
And then there came in later years
A family they called Giles.

There are Leakes, and Cains, and Henrys,
And Higgins galore
And on the old Alex Davis farm
You'll find a Stanley Loar.

There are Martins, Coles, and Barbers,
The Fatkins and the Finns,
The latter lived down the road
Just where the town begins.

There was a Thomas Stapleton
And there were Radcliffes too,
Who lived beside the railroad track
Like Murrays used to do.

Then there are the Irish Kellys,
These folks I 'most forgot,
The Hawthornes and the Mahers
Were too, among the lot.

There were Brodes, McGanns and Haleys
And a family named Legeer:
Who came from Ireland—County Cork
And brought the family here.

And there was Granny Lewis,
The Fagans, and LaVelles,
The Winters, Welfords, Beechies,
Who came here from Montell.

There were Bernard Dilleys
For years and maybe more,
The head man of the depot,
They lived by Parker's store.

I think the Tom Delaney's,
As near as I recall,
Lived near, where older folks
Say Pompey got his fall.

The Joneses, Hughes, and Carters,
We knew them very well;
Remember old man Carter,
And the stories he could tell.

The Sherizers and the Hansels,
We nearly forgot to mention,
But if there's anyone we've overlooked,
It wasn't our intention.

There was a place called Meadow Row,
A place they called the tank,
Where people got their water
And horses often drank.

It was pure mountain water for everyone,
For everyone 'twas free,
It came here from the Sand Spring,
Piped through to Number Three.

There was a spring at Sleemans,
'Twas known as the Spout,
Right along the lower road
The wooden pipe came out.

There was Bill Fatkin's blacksmith shop,
Walt Parker's general store,
Where Mr. Parker and Squire Finn
Played checkers near the door.

There was an old Hibernian hall,
Willie Martin's grocery store,
Pat Pryles across from Coles shoe shop,
John Drum's place was next door.

Many a good, old-fashioned dance
I've seen there at the hall,
Swing your partner right and left
You'd hear Muff Maher call.

The Coles were the fairest
You'd find most anywhere,
How the boys and girls would strut about
At the old Hibernian fair.

There was a place they called the Cliff
Near where the school stood,
Miss Teeny Barber taught the kids
As only Miss Teeny could.

The old home town has changed a lot
Since I was just a kid,
They even changed the name a bit
What matter if they did.

The people haven't changed a bit,
They're friends of royal blue,
They'll lend a hand when trouble comes,
They'll help you see it through.

They'll help you out in trying times,
They'll lend a helping hand,
There's not a better lot of folks
In the State of Maryland.

Most of all these old folks are gone,
For them we've shed our tears,
For those who toiled and labored here
Throughout the early years.

Those folks were our grandparents, sir,
Pioneers they were I'd say,
They didn't have the many things
That we enjoy today.

They didn't have the modern things
Things we enjoy it's true,
The men walked miles to do their work,
Walked home again when through.

My very best respect for them,
My deep regard for all,
To each and everyone who lives
Where Pompey had his fall.

I was born in Pompey,
For me that's no disgrace,
In the little old log shanty
Next door to Radcliffe's place.

The old log house is standing still,
Though almost tumbled down,
It was that place we called our home,
When we lived in Pompey town.

Let's drink a toast to Pompey town,
Vale Summit is now the name,
But for me and lots of other folks
It's Pompey just the same.

The Recent Treason Trial in Colorado

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON
OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, Colorado has just completed her first treason trial wherein three American women of Japanese origin were accused of assisting two German war prisoners to escape. Thomas Ferrill, Colorado's most famous present-day poet and author, reporting this trial paid not only a fitting tribute to American jurisprudence, but produced a classic in its interpretation of real Americanism. I ask unanimous consent to have this editorial, appearing in the Rocky Mountain Herald of August 12, 1944, printed in the Appendix of the RECORD and especially invite the Nazis and the sons of the Rising Sun to copy.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOOTS AND FLO AND BILLIE

I'm writing this Thursday noon. Half an hour ago I saw Toots and Flo and Billie go down the hall to lunch. Twelve men had just gone out another door to decide whether Toots and Flo and Billie were guilty of the one crime defined by our Constitution—treason. These American sisters of Japanese ancestry were charged with having helped two German soldiers escape from a prison camp.

It sounded odd to hear Kenneth W. Robinson, defense attorney, using words like "Bienerhasset" and "overt act." There were people long dead I could have wished to be in the courtroom to hear it: Aaron Burr and John Marthall, yes, and Jefferson too and General Wilkinson, for both of whom Burr became an unsuccessful scapegoat. But more than these, I wanted Nazi judges to be present, and Japanese judges, and Moscow judges. I'd like to have had them sitting there beside Judge J. Foster Symes, listening to Kenneth Robinson, Ivor Wingren, and Tom Morrissey. If anything could have made me happier about being an American citizen, or prouder, I don't know what it could be. Such courteous treatment of the Nazi prisoners, such consideration for the rights of the foolish girls, such emphasis on the specific charges, their meaning and their implications. If we're confused sometimes as to what America is fighting for, this treason trial was at least a reminder of something we possess, have long possessed and must not lose. No outsider can take it from us and we must not jeopardize it from within.

At the press table was a girl from Macon, Ga., and her husband, a Yankee. Their forebears had fought it out. Across from them was a Negro reporter. His being there had been made possible by that conflict, and near me I could see people of Irish and Jewish and Italian characteristics. Outside the door, too late to get in, was a corporal of Oriental origin, whether Japanese, Chinese, or Filipino, I wasn't sure, but his American service ribbons had overseas stars and decorations. Deputy Marshal William P. Dolan was riding herd on the crowd and, as Jack Carberry of the Post told him, "It must be tough, Bill, to have to kick out so many good Democrats." But those who came first were seated, Democrats and Republicans alike. In Germany only the Nazis would have been admitted.

All this made Denver's first treason trial, and one of the few in the history of our Nation, much bigger than it was if you thought it through. At this writing I don't know the fate of the sisters, Mrs. Tsurako Wallace, Mrs. Shivze Otani or Mrs. Billie Tanigoshi, American born citizens in a relocation camp far from their homes. Had they been taken in by the lad from Rommel's Afrika Corps who claimed he was anti-Nazi? Who claimed he'd been in a concentration camp 2 years? Who claimed he'd been beaten by storm troopers and wanted to get back to fight them? "That's a hell of a lot to tell a girl when you're sorting onions," as one of the boys at the press table put it. Clearly, the portentous overtones of their folly were grave despite the character witnesses, their school honors and the pictures of their being baptized in a Christian church. But in Germany or Japan any counterpart of this sordid little tale of love in an onion patch would have resulted in 10-minute justice at the hands of a firing squad. If frailty be treason, they'd have made the most quick work of it, those Nazi judges, those judges of Japan. The brilliant defense by Kenneth Robinson, appointed by the court, the handling of the case by Judge Symes, and the procedure of Messrs. Wingren and Morrissey for the prosecution may be remembered with admiration by Colorado and the Nation.

Post-War Highway Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram:

WORCESTER, MASS., August 17, 1944.
Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Organized motorists in Massachusetts represented by the Massachusetts Federation of A. A. A. clubs urges your support for immediate favorable vote on pending post-war highway legislation. Failure of Congress to act before adjournment for election may do unrepairable damage to post-war program for Massachusetts. Most important the Massachusetts Federation of A. A. A. clubs would like to know what we can expect in Federal aid for Massachusetts. We urge your immediate action.

Maneuvers of the Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS
OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the pen of Westbrook Pegler, which article I am pleased to entitle "Maneuvers of Communists."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK.—During the last 2 or 3 years it has been bruited about Washington that Felix Frankfurter has lost much of his old power in the New Deal. If this be true, the fact remains that many of his old pupils from Harvard, men indoctrinated by Frankfurter during their impressionable years, are still planted in Government positions in which they can impart to their judgments and interpretations the Frankfurter twist, which, in the minds of some, seem to give the law a meaning contrary to the intent of Congress. It is a fact worth noting, too, that the Communists have a way of "going underground" as they put it, when they feel that they have made themselves too conspicuous. The entire United States Communist Party did this a few months ago when it disbanded and assumed the harmless guise of an educational society. A year before, the International Communist Party or revolutionary movement, directed from Moscow, went underground by means of a complicated and deliberately confused document which appeared to announce its dissolution but actually announced no such thing.

Frankfurter's apparent retirement from politics and informal but effective Government administration may be a similar stratagem.

In his reply to the late ex-President Theodore Roosevelt's letter accusing him of writing a misleading report to President Wilson in the Bisbee deportation case, Frankfurter denied that the men deported from Bisbee, in 1917, were planning insurrection. He went into a discussion of organized opposition to social justice in the copper mines which seems to have been beside the point on which Roosevelt had challenged him.

Roosevelt's point was that there was imminent danger to an unarmed community, and this contention was supported by much testimony of reputable men and finally proved in a trial in a State court, of one of the deputized citizens. In his test case, tried in 1920, Harry E. Wootton, a Bisbee hardware dealer, was acquitted in 16 minutes by a jury from which employees of the railroads, copper companies and other big interests were barred. The case is celebrated for the charge to the jury by Judge Samuel L. Pattee, expounding "law of necessity."

The charge was kidnaping. The defense was imminent danger to the community.

Pattee told the jury they could acquit Wootton if they believed there was a "real, threatened, and actual danger of immediate destruction of life and property."

After the test case the other indictments were dropped and no person ever was punished by the Federal Government because it was found that no Federal law had been violated.

Frankfurter ignored, or gave no weight to, powerful evidence that many strangers had sifted into Bisbee, that men and women had been threatened, and that the I. W. W., predecessors of today's Communists, were violently obstructing this Nation's war effort in many western areas.

"The apologists for anarchy are never concerned for justice," T. R. wrote to Frankfurter. "They are solely concerned in seeing one kind of criminal escape justice precisely as certain big businesmen and corporation lawyers have in the past been concerned in seeing another kind of criminal escape justice."

He did not call Frankfurter an apologist for anarchy in so many words but he did say, flatly, "you are engaged in excusing men precisely like the Bolsheviki who are murderers and encouragers of murder."

A recent issue of the Catholic Worker, a radical, but, of course, not communistic paper, the organ of the Catholic worker movement, discusses Frankfurter's friendship for Harold Laski, the English Communist whose writings attack religion and who, also, is well received in Washington, and is more influential there than any other Englishman except Churchill.

Arthur Sheehan, the editor, writes that in 1937 he went to a forum at Ford Hall, Boston, to hear Laski. Sheehan says David K. Niles, now one of President Roosevelt's confidential and anonymous advisers in the White House, was manager of these forums. And he reports that Frankfurter introduced Laski to the audience with the remark that the day he looked forward to in the year with the most joy was the day when Laski came to stay with him in his home in Massachusetts.

No Chips for Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, between the C. I. O. bosses and the big city bosses the farmers apparently got little consideration at the recent Democratic National Convention. This is the view taken in an editorial of the Daily Oklahoman. Under leave to extend my remarks I include this editorial comment:

NO CHIPS FOR FARMERS—CHICAGO DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION DOMINATED BY FORCES SEEKING CHEAP FOOD

In the Chicago convention's battle over a Vice Presidential nomination the two opposing forces were the big city bosses and the C. I. O. No other element had any chips in the game. No other element amounted to anything at all.

In such a contest where was there any place for the farmers of America? Where was there any place for the farmers of Oklahoma? The farmers nowhere belong to the C. I. O. Nowhere do the farmers belong to the big city machines.

In that sulphurous and highly odoriferous convention battle it did not matter one rupee to the American farmer which faction won. If the C. I. O. had won its fight for Wallace, the triumph would have been achieved by a force that fights constantly for increased prices for manufactured products and reduced prices for agricultural products. The triumph of the bosses was a triumph for men who want to buy farm products at the lowest prices possible. The workers who constitute the rank and file of the C. I. O. are determined to win, if possible, cheap bread, cheap meat, and cheap vegetables. The workers who make up the big city machines are determined to have cheap bread, cheap meat, and cheap vegetables. And cheap bread, and meat, and vegetables spell ruin for the tillers of the soil.

So what difference did it make to the feeders of the country whether the prize was won by the cheap farm-product promoters of the C. I. O., or the cheap farm-product promoters of the city machines? No matter who won, the farmers lost.

Both the C. I. O. and the city machines are determined to employ the Federal Government as an instrument in beating down the prices of the products of the farm. In this the two warring forces are in complete agreement.

For several years now the two warring forces have employed the powers of Government to obtain cheap bread and meat and vegetables. At no time since the Republic was established has less recognition been accorded to the farmers of the country in making up the personnel of the national administration. From the 34 agricultural States of the South and West come only two members of the President's Cabinet. From the other 14 States (all highly industrialized) come the other members of the Cabinet.

Of the nine members of the Supreme Court, only one resides in that vast agricultural empire that lies west of the Mississippi. Five of the nine justices reside northeast of Pittsburgh.

Another Democratic national administration promises a continuation of an uninterrupted discrimination against the agricultural States. The Chicago convention emphasized that discrimination. Neither the farmers nor their interests were represented in that convention. Even the delegations from the agricultural States have boasted of how closely they were in touch with Boss Hannegan of St. Louis. And if they had not accepted orders from Hannegan, their only alternative was to accept orders from Sidney Hillman of the C. I. O., for nobody was taking orders from the farmers of America. In that convention the soil tillers of the country were the forgotten men.

Why I Am an American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK L. SUNDSTROM

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, Why I Am an American, sent me by one of my constituents, Mr. George J. Chryssikos. The author has dedicated this address to "every American regardless of race, creed, sex, or birthplace, who is consecrated to the cardinal principles of liberty, justice, and equality, and maintains the high ideals and sacred duties of American citizenship":

In these critical and momentous times, when the United States of America is fighting for its life, and millions of young men and young women are risking their precious lives for our right to exist as a free nation, it is incumbent upon all of us to be self-conscious and deeply cognizant of our duties, opportunities, and responsibilities as citizens of this democracy. We hear it said every day that we are fighting to preserve the American way of life. To understand the meaning of that expression, it is necessary to know what characteristics make one an American. Once these are determined, one proceeds automatically to search for them throughout the depth and length of one's innermost self in order to be convinced of their possession. It is then only that we consciously ascertain why we are Americans.

The need of every American to participate actively as a real citizen in the affairs of this great Republic led, so significantly, to the consecration of "I Am an American Day." To be an American, new or old, is more than a privilege. It is a responsibility, a trust, to be administered for humanity. On this day, in the midst of this unprecedented war, which has taken the Stars and Stripes to all continents, the American Nation lifts its heart and awakens its mind in veneration of the splendid traditions, the high ideals of its forefathers, and the virtues which enabled the American people to rise from their lowly beginnings in the time of the Revolution to their present unequaled position in the world.

But it is not only on "I Am An American Day" that the question is asked of us: How are we going to prove ourselves worthy perpetuators of these traditions and these ideals? And on every day the answer is the same, and it is always a simple one: By being good Americans! We call ourselves Americans, don't we? The Americans who made the United States such a wonderful country, were good Americans. Were it not for the fact that they were good Americans, this would not be so good a land to live in. And how did they start, those Americans who made America for us? What was their equipment for the tremendous task which they undertook on the morrow of the Revolution? Nothing but their will to create a better world for themselves and for all American generations to come; nothing but their individual virtues, their faith in themselves and the Almighty, who helps those who help themselves; nothing but their hard-working habits, their perseverance and, of course, their intelligence. They did not even have the benefit of previous examples set for their guidance or of traditions from which to draw inspiration. On the contrary, they knew that they had to create traditions for their successors and to inspire them with their example. The knowledge of this, perhaps, made them more deeply conscious of their responsibility and fanned the flame of their enthusiasm for their great undertaking.

Yes, this is a good country to live in, in fact a country unique in the world, and we ought to be thankful to the men and women who made it. Let us not forget, however, that goodness is an infinite quality—a quality capable of endless expansion. Even good America can become a better America. And this is precisely the job of young men and young women. Let us not forget also that goodness in this imperfect and ever-evolving world of ours is always found mixed with evil. It is the job of every succeeding American generation to weed out evil from the field of American goodness and to leave the positive elements of the character of this country in a purer and nobler form.

Past generations have performed their tasks with the result that American history presents a picture of continuous improvement and progress. To do our part we must, above all, know ourselves. "Know yourself," admonished Socrates, and it is as true in our day as it was in his. When we have achieved that, our Americanism will enable us to strive and to struggle successfully for the continuation of the process of improvement of our national home.

We call ourselves Americans. But what does it mean to be an American? A purposeful restudy of American history will give us the answer. It will reveal to us the moral character of the American we should strive to be—his attitudes, his soul, his aspirations, his motives, and his creative tools. Let us search ourselves thoroughly and persistently and we will find ourselves possessors of the same moral character. Let us dig it out, awaken it and put it to work for our country and for ourselves.

Let us ask ourselves these questions: Why am I an American? Simply because I live in America and call it my country? Because I was born of American parents or of naturalized American citizens? Or is it because I have something intangible in common with the Americans of the past who put the seal of their spirit and the imprint of their hands on this land?

A little thought will convince anyone that the latter is the correct answer. Americanism is a spiritual quality, a disposition of the mind and the heard. It is the will to be an American, a good and useful citizen of this country. Objectively, Americanism is the treasury of American tradition, the moral inheritance of the Nation. Subjectively, Americanism is one's eagerness to follow the American examples of the past, to make active and full use of the capital of American tradition, to develop and enrich the American heritage and to further embellish the American picture.

Loyalty to the country and to her flag is, of course, included in the meaning of Americanism. Loyalty alone, however, is not sufficient to make one a real American. Loyalty must be accompanied with acts which are typically American, acts which are of the same character and have the same effect as those of the men and women who made this such a wonderful country.

Our country is in a war which it must win in order to survive and to preserve its liberty. Knowing this, should we consider it sufficient for a citizen to declare his or her loyalty to the flag? Certainly not. One must also be ready to defend the flag even at the risk of losing one's life or limb. But even this is not enough. Americans must strive at all times to make the national flag the symbol of high ideals, a flag worth fighting for, a flag which stands for all that is noble and sacred and worthy among civilized people.

Our flag is the symbol of freedom; it is in our hearts, however, that the love of freedom resides. One of the reasons, therefore, for which we call ourselves Americans is that we are a liberty-loving people. Our flag is the symbol of justice, because we who call ourselves Americans believe in justice. Our flag is the symbol of humanity, because we Americans are humane. Our flag is the symbol of civilization, because we Americans are dedicated to the preservation and advancement of civilization. Our flag is a symbol of progress, because American generations have devoted their lives to progress, have shown themselves capable of progress. They have believed that the realization of the hopes and aspirations of humanity lies in continuous progress. Our flag is, finally, the hope of humanity, because the American people believe in the brotherhood of man within and without the boundaries of their homeland. By word and deed, they have shown their devotion to that principle and are ready to do everything in their power to bring about its universal adoption as the basis of international relations.

To be an American, then, means to share all the ideals of the American people and to be ready to serve them. To make real Americans of our youth is the task of school, church, and family. That is their supreme duty. Let it be understood, however, that they are not required to develop any peculiar or novel type of human beings because the moral values which the term Americanism expresses are those which make better men and women in any climate. They are the moral values which the term "Americanism" recognized through the ages as the imperishable treasures of civilized society. Any good man and any good woman can be a good American. No matter what our ancestry has been, no matter where we or our parents were born, no matter what our race or creed is, if we are bent on being good, we are first-class Americans.

In some other countries and in recent years mad adventurers have undertaken to recast human character in order to create a new type of man to suit their purposes. Their moral code and their political principles are the exact opposite of all that is inherent in the meaning of Americanism. They have used the school as a factory of distorted souls. They have reduced the family to the status of a purveyor of living robots without conscience, without ideas of their own, without an independent will, without self-respect, and without that sense of responsibility and self-reliance which are the characteristics of good citizens and worthy members of society. They have even tried, and with some small measure of success, to make the church an instrument of the policy which tends to separate man from God by infusing an evil spirit where the Creator planted the seed of goodness. This sacrilegious policy has borne fruit—the only fruit that could be expected from it—violence, bloodshed, and misery among men and the threat of extinction of civilization.

Americanism condems all that. We are at war with the countries where such distorted ideas prevail, and we are going to defeat them. Our system of government, guaranteed by the vigilance of freedom-loving citizens, precludes the possibility of tyrants turning the people into a herd of animals marching at their command. Our schools, instead of forging tools for malevolent despots to use for their own purposes, are trying to bring forth the best that is in youth, so that they can serve themselves and society with the aid of the positive qualities of their nature. American schools do not subscribe to the doctrine of certain German pedagogues who teach: "Break the character of the child and make a new one for him." Our teachers believe that all that a child's character needs is selective cultivation and the development of those elements which bring him nearer to his Creator.

To all who want to assure themselves that they are Americans and to all who want to know just why they are Americans, I would recommend careful reading of the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights. The Founding Fathers recognized and publicly proclaimed certain truths, which have become the guiding principles of American policy and American life. If we believe in them, we are Americans. And, vice-versa, we are Americans because we believe in them. As Thomas Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence, so we affirm that "all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed,".

This political creed of America is supplemented by the recognition of certain particular rights, without which there can be no liberty and the pursuit of happiness becomes impossible. As a result of this recognition, we enjoy, in this country, all the privileges which are denied to the peoples of countries ruled by autocrats. We can express our opinions without fear of punishment; we have a free press, which keeps us informed of what is happening about us and exercises the right of criticism. We can worship our God in our own way without interference from public authority or from private persons.

American citizenship is a priceless possession. However, Americanism implies duties as well as rights; but the duties which are imposed on us are such as to work for the benefit of the citizenry as a whole and not of individuals or groups invested with power to exact their performance from us. America is our common garden to which every citizen is expected to contribute his share of work and from which every citizen is entitled to reap his share of the fruit.

Senator Austin on the Kilgore Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent heretofore granted me, I am including as an extension of my remarks a newspaper account of an interview recently had with the senior Senator from Vermont, the Honorable WARREN R. AUSTIN, with respect to the so-called Kilgore bill.

The interview as reported in the Burlington Free Press of August 16, 1944, follows:

AUSTIN SAYS GEORGE BILL MARKS TURNING POINT IN UNITED STATES HISTORY AWAY FROM "SOCIALISTIC SYSTEM"—SENATOR DECLARES KILGORE BILL, DEFEATED FRIDAY, WAS A DIRECT THREAT TO SPEED-UP OF WAR AND WAS BASED ON CENTRALIZATION OF POWER SECOND ONLY TO NULLIFIED N. R. A.

Charging that the Kilgore bill, which was defeated Friday in the United States Senate, was "a direct threat to the speed-up of the war," Senator WARREN R. AUSTIN, 43 Williams Street, hailed the passage of the alternate legislation, the George bill, as a turning point in the country's history away from a socialistic system.

In criticism of the bill as a whole, Senator AUSTIN, speaking informally at his home on Williams Street on the eve of his departure for Washington after a few days here, said the bill's sponsors, Senators JAMES E. MURRAY, of Montana, and HARLEY M. KILGORE, of West Virginia, carried the theory of Federal centralization of power over affairs that reached into every household to a greater extent than any measure heretofore considered by the New Deal, with the exception of the N. R. A.

WOULD STEM WAR SPEED

AUSTIN described the N. R. A. as less extensive "insofar as bureaucracy went," but that it was "still so bad that it had to be nullified by the Supreme Court because it violated fundamental rights vested in the States' governments alone."

The Kilgore bill, as it was popularly called, dealt with the establishment of a double-headed Federal agency to handle the mobilization and reconversion problems of industry now and after the war. It would have consisted of a director and a deputy director, a board of advisers, and a set of industrial and area councils. This was criticized by AUSTIN for its overlapping features.

"This war moves swiftly," AUSTIN said. "Production changes often. We must be able to carry on the war efficiently as the demands for war supplies change in the changing stages of the war from light aircraft and light trucks to more B–29's and B–32's, to bulldozers, heavy trucks, and bigger tanks. In view of these facts, speed is essential in ordering concelations and cutbacks in items no longer needed, for the amount of surplus products mounts with every day's delay."

WOULD DELAY CUTBACKS

He charged that under the Kilgore bill, the cutbacks would be delayed and efficiency hampered for they would have to be deferred until conferences had been held with councils, and advisory boards, and until some agreement had been reached between the two directors.

AUSTIN added that the possibility of conflicts between the two directors had been proved in the old days of the Office of Emergency Management when Knudsen and Hillman were deadlocked, and had led to the establishment of the War Production Board, with a single head, Donald Nelson.

SAYS BENEFITS TOO GREAT

Turing to the controversial title II of the bill, which proposed a Federal system of unemployment benefits for war workers and veterans, AUSTIN charged that the high level of benefits would have been an "incentive against voluntary transfer" of manpower from areas where labor is no longer needed to areas of shortage.

AUSTIN called the situation at the Brewster Aircraft Corporation this spring an illustration when the Navy canceled its contracts suddenly, leaving 13,000 workers jobless.

"The Government found places for 9,000, but the jobs were refused, for the workers were quite comfortable on savings they had made and the unemployment benefits to which they were entitled. Instead of helping to win the war, the Kilgore bill would have increased inducements not to win the war by increasing benefits in money and increasing the length of eligibility of payments." Senator AUSTIN, who is a member of the George Post-war Planning Committee, said that "veterans must return to find a sound economy, not a country impoverished by the cost of this bill, estimated conservatively at ten billions in 3 years."

SAYS VERMONT SHOULD RAISE PAYMENTS

He was firm in his belief that the States were in a far better position than the Federal Government, strained by the cost of the war, to finance unemployment benefits, adding that States with low level of payments, like Vermont, should raise their payments by legislation.

"There is not a State in the Union," Senator AUSTIN said, "that cannot take care of its own unemployed."

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION WOULD GO

The senior Senator from Vermont also specifically objected to the Kilgore proposal to set up a new bureau for the administration of veterans' legislation, and discard the Veterans' Administration, which is the product of years of experience. He added that if this had been his only objection to the bill, it would have been enough.

He stressed the fact that through the long debate, opponents of the Kilgore measure had had alternate proposals in mind that would serve the same general aim, without the defects of the other bill. Approving the passage of the George bill, proposed by Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, of Georgia, Senator AUSTIN said "it provided for an advisory board representing labor, industry, and agriculture, making a tight, effective Federal organization that will not tie up the progress of mobilization or demobilization."

AUSTIN called the choice of the latter bill "an important turning point in the history of this country, for the difference between the two bills represents the difference between a free system of government on the one hand, and a socialistic system on the other."

A Message to Members of the Armed Services and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I herewith include an address which I delivered before the Virginia Department of the American Legion at Hotel Roanoke, Roanoke, Va., August 21, 1944:

I am very happy to have this opportunity of adding my word of welcome to the Virginia Department of the American Legion, and to join the mayor in assuring you that the city of Roanoke now, as always, considers it a great honor to have this splendid organization meet within its gates.

The principles for which the American Legion stands and for which it has fought, are of much interest in this critical period in the history of our country. Although you fought a war to end all wars, yet your sons are on foreign soil, ready to make the supreme sacrifice to save the land and the way of life which we love so much. While they fight abroad you and I have some duties on the home front. Duty No. 1 is to support and back them in their war effort, and I think, considering handicaps, America has done a good job along that line. Duty No. 2 is to prepare for the home coming of those who will return. Some will not return. In that case, we must deal adequately with their dependents. It is with regard to these matters that I wish to address you briefly this morning. We learned many lessons from World War No. 1 and, while I do not wish to dwell on the subject, I do want to say in passing that it is my fervent hope that after the shooting stops in this war, we will not make the fatal blunder we made after the other war when we junked and scrapped all of our defense facilities and were thus caught totally unprepared for the present conflict. Upon some other occasion, I shall dwell more in detail upon this subject. Like the American Legion, through the years, I have fought for an adequate defense establishment.

Another lesson that I hope we have learned is that we were not very well prepared to take care of the veterans who returned from the other war, either from the standpoint of facilities and services or from a standpoint of reemployment. In this instance, we have tried very hard to make suitable provisions. I want to very briefly tell you something about that. In the meantime, however, lest I forget, I wish very much to suggest to you that through the facilities of your organization and in any other way that you may have to reach the men and women in the fighting services, either at home or abroad, that you give them this piece of advice, which I am sure is borne out by your experiences:

VETERANS SHOULD BE ALERT

In order that the veteran may be able to establish, whenever the occasion may arise, his or her entitlement to the benefits which have been provided, it is most important that they observe the following:

1. That they keep a careful and accurate memorandum of the time, place, and circumstances whenever they report for sick call or for treatment, either to a hospital or to a field station. This should be done even though the ailment be then considered trivial. It is hardly necessary to elaborate on the necessity for these records, for some time or other, the veteran will be called upon to furnish such proof in an effort to establish his or her right to benefits, and we know from experience that we cannot always rely upon official records. They may be inaccurate, incomplete, or they may become lost. It would also be well to jot down the names and home address of companions who may know about the case.

2. The veteran must be most careful when he or she is discharged from the service to report to the physician making the examination at the time of the discharge, such facts and information about any physical defects which they may have had in the service or which may exist at the time of discharge. Many veterans of World War No. 1 in their haste to get demobilized, and to get home, and through fear of being hospitalized for tedious examinations, etc., signed forms showing that they were in good physical condition at the time of discharge when this was not the case. Perhaps years after, this statement was laid before them when they made a perfectly just claim for consideration. I hope these suggestions may be passed on.

3. At the time of discharge from the service, in case the veteran has suffered any disease or disability while in the service, or has any reason to believe he or she has any ailment of any description, it is very important that the veteran should immediately have a complete and thorough physical check-up, either at a veterans' hospital, at an Army or Navy clinic, or by a private physician. This is very important because experience has shown that so many times in later years, when the Veterans' Administration is considering whether or not the veteran is entitled to benefits, it becomes necessary to know his or her condition at time of discharge and these facts are often most difficult to obtain.

The procedure which I have set out in paragraphs one, two, and three are most important if the veteran is to have the benefits that Congress has provided and to enable the Veterans' Administration to pass quickly and intelligently on claims. It would be an excellent idea if these simple suggestions could be passed on to the veterans in the service.

VETERANS' BENEFITS

Congress has sought, well in advance of the end of this war, to make proper provisions for the veterans. The legislation may not be perfect and no doubt experience will make it necessary to make changes and alterations but certainly we have laid the foundation of a good set-up.

This program is going to cost money. I feel, however, that the American people want the very best care possible for the boys who have gone through this unspeakable horror. We will, of course, use every possible precaution to prevent waste and to conserve funds and materials and services, but I am sure that I voice the sentiment of the American people, as well as Congress, when I say we are not going to let these boys down.

The work of making benefits available to World War veterans at the conclusion of World War No. 1 was divided between the Bureau of War Risk Insurance under the Treasury Department, the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and the Public Health Service. On August 9, 1921, all activities concerning World War No. 1 veterans were consolidated into the United States Veterans' Bureau, and on July 3, 1930, the then Veterans' Bureau, together with the Pension Bureau under the Department of the Interior, and the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers were consolidated into the present Veterans' Administration, which handles benefits for all veterans of all wars and their dependents.

May I say here, in passing, that for the past 12 years I have been chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that has handled the vast sums appropriated for the Veterans' Administration. Something in excess of $11,000,000,000 has passed through my committee. I have had close and intimate contact with the Administration and its able Administrator, Maj. Gen. Frank T. Hines. In my judgment, this is one of the best-conducted agencies in the Government service. It is devoted to the welfare of the veteran and strives to carry out the provisions of laws passed for his benefit. In addition, it is managed on a businesslike basis with efficiency and economy. Unfortunately, this cannot be said about all Federal bureaus.

Much has been learned by reason of our experience with veterans following World War No. 1, and the Congress has taken action prior to the conclusion of this war to assure that veterans of this war and their dependents will be given every opportunity of becoming reestablished in their proper places in civil life.

MONETARY BENEFITS

At the conclusion of World War No. 1 in 1918, there began the demobilization of 4,750,000 men, many of whom were disabled and in need of assistance of various types. At that time, monetary benefits were available to those suffering from disabilities due to service, amounting to as much as $30 a month for those totally disabled. These rates are now from $10 to $100 per month for total disabilities, with additional amounts in certain instances, such as where the veteran was totally blind or suffered the loss, or loss of the use, of both arms, both feet, or one arm or one foot, etc. Payments are also authorized in amounts up to $60 per month for disabilities not due to service. Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, increased certain rates for service-connected disabilities by 15 percent, effective June 1, 1944.

At the end of World War No. 1, hospitals available for treatment of service-connected disabilities only were those of the Army, Navy, and Public Health Service. Later, hospitals for the specific use of the veterans were established, at the present time there being 94 facilities situated throughout the United States, with a total capacity of 88,569 beds, of which 73,602 are for hospital cases and 14,967 for domiciliary care.

Hospitalization and domiciliary care is now available to veterans of all wars, whether or not the condition requiring treatment is due to service. Priority, of course, is given to those suffering from disabilities of service origin. Similar benefits are available to veterans of the Regular Establishment if discharged for disabilities incurred in the line of duty for the receipt of pensions for service disabilities. The G. I. bill authorized an appropriation of $500,000,000 for the construction of additional hospital facilities and there has recently been recommended to the President projects totaling 16,000 additional beds in 20 different States. Following the cessation of hostilities, the bed capacity of the Veterans' Administration will be further augmented by facilities which will be made available by transfer from the Army and the Navy.

VIRGINIA FACILITIES

At the present time there is in the State of Virginia a hospital at Roanoke for the care and treatment of neuropsychiatric patients, where 1,687 beds are now available and where 656 additional beds are under construction. At Kecoughtan there is now available 1,121 beds for domiciliary care and 538 beds for general hospital patients. It is contemplated that immediately following the cessation of hostilities, 300 additional beds will be made available in or near Richmond for the care of general medical and hospital patients.

In addition to these facilities of the Veterans' Administration, there will also be available in Virginia and nearby District of Columbia, certain facilities of the Army, Navy, and Public Health Service Hospitals. We have made every possible effort in advance of the end of the war to have provisions that will ably take care of all returning veterans who are in need of hospital or medical service.

INSURANCE

War-risk insurance, was available to World War No. 1 veterans, and a large number took the full amount, $10,000. The original Insurance Act was modified to provide not only for payment in case of death of $57.50 per month for a period of 20 years to the designated beneficiary but in the event of total disability suffered by the insured while his policy was in force, $57.50 per month during his lifetime, in addition to any compensation or pension which is payable.

National service life insurance is available to present members of the armed forces, to a maximum amount of $10,000 at rates approximately the same as in World War No. 1. As a result of our experience in paying insurance benefits to beneficiaries of World War No. 1 veterans, the present law provides that in the case of beneficiaries who are over 30 years of age, monthly payments based on the age of the beneficiary will continue throughout the lifetime of such beneficiary, rather than for an arbitrary period of 20 years.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Vocational rehabilitation was provided for World War No. 1 veterans suffering from service-connected disabilities constituting a handicap in pre-war occupation where further training into employment appeared necessary. A similar program has been authorized for veterans of this war by Public, No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved on March 24, 1943. This act provides for a maximum of 4 years' college or school training or for training into employment on the job. In addition to having the cost of training paid by the Veterans' Administration, up to a maximum of $500 per year, the veteran is provided with books, supplies, and equipment up to $300 in order to enable him to pursue his training properly. For his support during the period of rehabilitation, there is authorized, in addition to the compensation or pension payable on account of disability, additional amounts sufficient to bring his monthly allowance up to $80, if a single man, with $10 additional for wife and additional allowances for children and dependent parents.

G. I. BILL OF RIGHTS

The most comprehensive act for the relief of ex-service personnel, commonly known as the G. I. bill of rights, was approved on June 22, 1944, as Public, No. 346, Seventy-eighth Congress. This has a number of provisions for the readjustment of returning men and women of the armed forces, whereby the change from war assignments to peacetime pursuits may be readily accomplished with a minimum of delay. The various provisions of the act comprise a schedule which will extend for several years subsequent to the cessation of hostilities and allow any veteran, who has the desire, to become readjusted. Specifically, the benefits are for any person who served in the armed forces for a period of at least 90 days, unless sooner discharged for disability incurred in line of duty between September 16, 1940, and the termination of this war, and has been separated under conditions other than dishonorable.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

The principal benefits under this act are to provide educational aid to veterans even though not disabled; to guarantee loans under certain conditions for the purchase or construction of homes, farms, and business property, stock, machinery, etc., with interest for the first year paid by the Government on the amount guaranteed; readjustment allowances for veterans during periods of unemployment for as much as 52 weeks; provisions for the construction of additional hospitals for the care of veterans. It gives the Veterans' Administration the status of a war agency insofar as priorities on personnel, equipment, supplies, and material are involved; and specifically provides that certain recognized veterans' organizations will be allowed to send representatives into naval and military installations in order to begin their service to veterans at the time of discharge, so that there may be no loss of time in transplanting a service man or woman into his or her proper place in civil life.

EDUCATIONAL AID

In addition to training which may be available to men and women disabled during the present conflict, the G. I. bill provides education or training for a period of 1 year or the equivalent thereof, for continuous or part-time study for education or training, in any approved school or institution chosen by the veteran, in any subject or subjects desired and for which he or she is fitted. This is available to "Any person who served in the active military or naval service on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of the present war, and who shall have been discharged or released therefrom under conditions other than dishonorable, and whose education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of his entrance into the service, or who desires a refresher or retraining course, and who either shall have served 90 days or more, exclusive of any period he was assigned for a course of education or training under the Army specialized-training program or the Navy college-training program, which course was a continuation of his civilian course and was pursued to completion, or as a cadet or midshipman at one of the service academies, or shall have been discharged or released from active service by reason of an actual service, incurred injury, or disability, shall be eligible for and entitled to receive education or training under this part: Provided, That such course shall be initiated not later than 2 years after either the date of his discharge or the termination of the present war, whichever is the later: Provided further, That no such education or training shall be afforded beyond 7 years after the termination of the present war: And provided further, That any such person who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service shall be deemed to have had his education or training impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with."

To establish entitlement to education or training beyond 1 year, it must be shown that the veteran's education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with because of entry into the armed forces; but this will be assumed in the case of those who entered service prior to reaching the age of 25 years. The total course of training cannot exceed 4 years in all, and cannot exceed the period of service in the armed forces and is contingent upon satisfactory progress in the course pursued. The Government will pay a maximum of $500 per school year for tuition, books, supplies, equipment, and necessary expenses, and a substantial allowance is authorized in the amount of $50 per month, if without dependents, or $75 a month with dependents.

If the training is taken on the job and the man receives payment for productive labor performed as a part of his apprentice training at an institution, business, or other establishment, he may be entitled to receive such lesser sums of subsistence or dependency allowance as may be determined proper by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

Educational institutions have met this challenge by making extensive plans for adapting methods and curricula to the contemplated needs of the returning veterans. Some institutions have arranged for veterans to enter classes at the first of any month, and at least one large metropolitan university has developed a program by which veterans may be admitted at the beginning of each week. Time will be an important factor to the men who have lost so much time from the classroom or jobs, and accelerated courses and educational or training courses on a part-time basis while employed will probably be popular, particularly to the older men. Others will wish to secure the cultural phases of a liberal education which were omitted from accelerated courses in service.

Surely this phase of the law will become of incalculable benefit to each returning veteran who is educated for personal development and social responsibility. The cost must be counted as a wise investment which will bring the strongest fortification to our democracy.

VETERANS' LOANS

Title III of the G. I. bill authorizes the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to guarantee under certain conditions a loan or loans for the purchase of homes, farms, and business property, repairs, additions, stock machinery, equipment, etc., in an aggregate amount not to exceed $2,000. The Veterans' Administration is in contact with established agencies experienced in the handling of loans, exploring all possibilities of expediting this program. The law itself includes certain safeguards designed to give stability to the loans and to protect the veteran against exploitation, such as the proviso that the guarantee of a loan be subject to a determination that the loan applied for appears practicable. It is stipulated that the purchase price or construction cost shall bear proper relation to the veteran's present and anticipated income and expenses, and that the purchase price or construction cost, including the value of the unimproved lot, does not exceed the reasonable and normal value as determined by proper appraisal.

BUSINESS ASSISTANCE

To illustrate the interest taken in the establishment of returning veterans in civil life, I refer to a series of pamphlets that have been issued by the Department of Agriculture for the enlightenment of persons who contemplate selecting, financing, and operating a farm or obtaining loans for farm equipment or operation. Information contained therein shows that farms generally are priced much higher today than they were 4 or 5 years ago and prices are still rising. Practical advice is given on this complicated subject.

The Department of Commerce, upon request of the War Department, is now preparing a series of books on the problems of establishing and operating various kinds of business. Each of these books is devoted to basic considerations, such as capital requirements, location, cost, display, lay-out, credit policy, etc., of a specific business which may attract veterans. These books will be used as texts in courses which the Army proposes to give soldiers before demobilization. The lines covered include metal working shops, sawmills, building contractors, painting contractors, hardware stores, service stations, grocery stores, drug stores, electrical appliance stores, shoe repair shops, auto repair shops, heating and plumbing, real estate and insurance, beauty parlors, bakery stores, restaurants, dry cleaning, laundries, apparel stores, and general merchandise stores. This list has been designed to cover the most likely areas of opportunity for returning veterans in this field. As a result of years of experience in advising with business interests the Department of Commerce is in a position to be of constructive assistance to a loan agency in providing factual information and guidance on business problems.

EMPLOYMENT

To give all possible help to the employment of veterans, there is authorized a Veterans' Placement Service Board consisting of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs Chairman; Director, National Selective Service; and Administrator, Federal Security Agency, or whoever may have the responsibility of administering the functions of the United States Employment Service. This Board will determine all matters of policy relating to the administration of the Veterans' Employment Service of the United State Employment Service. While the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is made responsible for veterans' employment, this is not a function of the Veterans' Administration but is retained in the United States Employment Service. The plans and policies will also comprehend the voluntary services of reemployment services of reemployment committeemen on the local draft boards authorized in subsection (g) of section VIII, Selective Training and Service Act of 1940.

UNEMPLOYMENT ALLOWANCES

Unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed are authorized subject to the following conditions:

The week of unemployment must have (a) begun after September 3, 1944; (b) occurred not later than 2 years after discharge or release from active service or the termination of the war, whichever be the later date.

The person is not receiving subsistence allowance for education or training.

To be eligible, the person must (a) reside in the United States; (b) be completely unemployed—or if partially employed, at wages less than $23 a week; (c) be registered with, and reporting to, a public employment office; (d) be able to work and be available for suitable work; however, no claimant shall be considered ineligible in any period of continuous unemployment for failure to comply with the requirements of this paragraph if such failure is due to an illness or disability which occurs after the commencement of such period.

Persons will be disqualified from receiving allowances if without good cause they leave suitable work voluntarily, are suspended or discharged for misconduct; fail to apply or accept suitable work; fail to attend an available free training course; or if participating in strikes or labor disputes causing work stoppage.

Within the 52 weeks' limit the total eligibility for these benefits is determined by allowing 8 weeks of allowances for each of the first 3 month of service, and 4 weeks of allowances for each month or major fraction thereof, of further service.

The allowance of $20 per week may be reduced by any Federal or State unemployment or disability compensation (other than pension, compensation, or retired pay received from the Veterans' Administration), received by the veteran for the same period of time. Allowances may also be made in the case of veterans self-employed, whose incomes do not reach certain specified amounts. Benefits will be administered by the Veterans' Administration office in the area where the veteran resides, through the State employment security agencies, inasmuch as there is already in operation a widespread organization for the convenience of those concerned.

ADDITIONAL PROVISIONS OF THE ACT PROVIDE FOR

(a) Adequate organization of the Veterans' Administration to administer all veterans' benefits, except employment.

(b) The right to have explained to him before discharge or release from active service all rights and benefits to which he may be entitled to as a veteran, and an opportunity, if he so desires, to file a claim therefor.

(c) The right to adequate prosthetic appliances and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefit in the use of such appliances.

(d) Adequate safeguards as against forced statements against interest.

(e) Prompt transfer of the essential records of service departments to the Veterans' Administration and prompt adjudication of claims for benefits.

(f) The right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service (1) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether the person at time of committing the offense was insane, in event of which determination benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited; (2) except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal; (3) any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

NOTE.—Under both (1) and (2) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever be the later.

Much of these provisions for the veterans of World War II are due to the past experience of, and interest shown by, the veterans of World War I who do not want to see their sons experience the difficulties which they themselves encountered upon discharge from war service. The G. I. bill of rights is evidence that the people have learned through experience, not to repeat mistakes. When signing it, President Roosevelt said that it "gave emphatic notice to the men and women in our armed forces that the American people did not intend to let them down."

Attack on Pearl Harbor

REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon I picked up a copy of Collier's magazine of August 26 and read the article entitled "Our Armed Forces Must Be Unified" by HARRY S. TRUMAN, United States Senator from Missouri and Democratic candidate for the high office of Vice President of the United States. Mr. Speaker, I was astounded. I could not believe what I read. I could not believe, but there it was in black and white, that an aspirant for the second highest office in this great country would publicly condemn a man before he was given an opportunity to be heard.

The would-be Vice President of the United States bases his argument for the consolidation of the Army and Navy upon the Pearl Harbor catastrophe, contending that the Japanese surprise attack was successful because of a lack of coordination of forces under the command of General Short and Admiral Kimmel. The would-be Vice President goes so far as to imply that General Short and Admiral Kimmel were not on speaking terms. This is what he says—and I quote from the would-be Vice President's article:

In Hawaii, General Short and Admiral Kimmel could meet, if they happened to be on speaking terms, or exchange cables and radiograms.

There is no basis whatsoever for that statement.

Mr. Speaker, let me read a paragraph from the letter which Admiral Kimmel addressed to the would-be Vice President, which appears in this morning's issues of the Washington Times-Herald. This is what the Admiral wrote:

Your innuendo that General Short and I were not on speaking terms is not true. Your statements alleging failure to cooperate and coordinate our efforts are equally false. General Short and I, as well as our subordinates, coordinated the efforts of our commands in close, friendly, personal, and official relationships.

For over 2 years General Short and Admiral Kimmel have been waiting court martial. Time and again Admiral Kimmel has appealed for a public trial in order that he may explain exactly what took place immediately before Pearl Harbor. All that he has asked is to be heard, to be given an opportunity to defend himself publicly. Not only has the administration refused an open trial, but we now have the would-be Vice President publicly condemning the two men. The would-be Vice President does not even wait until the investigation now in process has been completed before passing judgment.

The would-be Vice President bases his case on the so-called Roberts report. As I stated in my remarks on the floor of the House on June 5:

At very best the inquiry of the Roberts commission was cursory.

And further:

The Roberts commission was more interested in getting out some kind of a report, fixing responsibility on someone, than it was in learning the real facts.

My statement has now been confirmed by the following from Admiral Kimmel's letter of yesterday. He wrote the would-be Vice President:

The real story of the Pearl Harbor attack and the events preceding it has never been publicly told. * * * The Roberts report, upon which you rely, does not contain the basic truths of the Pearl Harbor catastrophe.

Mr. Speaker, the Roberts report is nothing more than a political document. It was designed to allay the public clamor for information as to the party or parties responsible for our armed forces being taken by surprise. It was designed not to present truth but to prevent the people from knowing the truth. I am personally convinced, and I believe that a true investigation will substantiate me, that the people really responsible for the Pearl Harbor catastrophe were here in Washington on December 7 and not in the Pacific. The administration knows that is true. How can one otherwise explain the unwillingness of the administration to hold the court martial of General Short and Admiral Kimmel? How can one otherwise explain the administration's opposition to the resolution which we passed for the investigation that is now being made by high-ranking officers of the Army and Navy?

The Roberts report states that at about noon—6:30 a. m. Honolulu time—or 1½ hours before Pearl Harbor, a warning message was sent to General Short and Admiral Kimmel of an almost immediate break in relations with Japan. Assuming such a message was sent, I should like to know how long before it was sent the President, the State Department, and the War Department knew that it was Japan's intention to attack Pearl Harbor. If the President knew 3 or 4 days before the attack that such an attack was being prepared, why were not General Short and Admiral Kimmel apprised of that fact immediately? When the whole story of Pearl Harbor is made known, as some day it will, I am inclined to believe that the reason we were taken by surprise was negligence in Washington and not negligence on the part of the commanders in the Pacific. As a cloak to this fact, the Roberts report was devised and to prevent this from being known by the people the court martial of General Short and Admiral Kimmel has been postponed for 2½ years.

There is another interesting development in connection with the Pearl Harbor catastrophe which is beyond understanding. You will recall that two privates operating a detector unit sent a message to headquarters that planes were approaching and they were told by the lieutenant who received the message to forget it. That same lieutenant, one Kermit A. Tyler, is today a lieutenant colonel. Think of it. An officer who obviously was not alert at the time of Pearl Harbor has subsequently been promoted by the Army to the rank of lieutenant colonel. It is beyond understanding.

Mr. Speaker, there are a great many facts to be learned about Pearl Harbor, events preceding and subsequent, and when they become known I believe the country will be shocked. From the article by the would-be Vice President it appears that he would condemn the two commanders—General Short and Admiral Kimmel—even before they are heard. I wonder why.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of August 21, 1944]

TEXT OF ADMIRAL KIMMEL'S LETTER TO SENATOR TRUMAN

MY DEAR SENATOR TRUMAN: In an article appearing under your name in Colliers magazine of August 26, 1944, you have made false statements concerning my conduct as commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet at Pearl Harbor prior to the Japanese attack.

Your innuendo that General Short and I were not on speaking terms is not true. Your statements alleging failure to cooperate and coordinate our efforts are equally false. General Short and I, as well as our subordinates, coordinated the efforts of our commands in close, friendly, personal, and official relationships.

The real story of the Pearl Harbor attack and the events preceding it has never been publicly told. This has not been my decision. For more than two and a half years I have been anxious to have the American people know all the facts.

The Roberts report, upon which you rely, does not contain the basic truths of the Pearl Harbor catastrophe. This is evident from the fact that no official action has ever been taken upon the basis of that report. The Congress of the United States, of which you are a Member, has recognized the inadequacy of the Roberts report by directing that the War and Navy Departments undertake a full investigation of the Pearl Harbor disaster.

Until I am afforded a hearing in open court, it is grossly unjust to repeat false charges against me, when, by official action, I have been persistently denied an opportunity to defend myself publicly.

I suggest that until such time as complete disclosure is made of the facts about Pearl Harbor, you refrain from repeating charges based on evidence that has never met the test of public scrutiny.

I ask for nothing more than an end to untruths and half truths about this matter, until the entire story is given to our people, who, I am convinced, will be amazed at the truth.

I am releasing this letter to the press in the belief that the historic American sense of fair play will approve this action.

Very truly yours,

H. E. KIMMEL,
Rear Admiral,
United States Navy (Retired).

Is the C. I. O. Political Action Committee Above the Law?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by one of the most outstanding newspapermen of this country. This man discusses a question which must be uppermost in the minds of a great many people in this country today and that is "Is the C. I. O. Political Action Committee Above the Law?"

(By George Rothwell Brown)

In the fourth-term campaign of 1944 Republicans for the first time in our history are being compelled by law to contribute money to the opposition, to be used for the defeat of candidates of their own party, including President, Vice President, Governors, Senators and Members of the House of Representatives.

This is only one of the many developments of the left-wing technique now being unfolded throughout the republic which is as alien in its origin as it is foreign to the American tradition of fair play.

These campaign funds which Republicans are now chagrined to see being used to purge Republicans from public life, have been collected in the guise of union dues.

As the subtle leaders of the labor end of the Roosevelt New Deal coalition began to lay their plans for taking over the political control of the moribund Democratic Party, they succeeded in having the "check off" given statutory authority.

Immense sums poured into the treasuries of organized labor unions.

These sums became fabulous as America drew the sword and prepared for war on every world front.

Thousands of new workmen were needed to build barracks and hospitals for the soldiers, to lay the keels of ships, to make tanks, and planes, and guns, and munitions.

There they found the union collector awaiting them. They made the painful discovery that they could not serve the Federal Union without first paying tribute to a labor union.

They could not work for Uncle Sam, in his great hour of need, until they had joined a labor union and had paid their dues.

Some unions, more arrogant than others, demanded initiation payments that bordered on the exorbitant.

A committee of the House of Representatives went into the subject, and produced startling evidence of a labor racket.

What, wondered our unsophisticated Congressmen, did the unions intend to do with all the hoard of money they were piling up?

Well, they know now. The C. I. O. has an immense fund, hundreds of thousands of dollars of which were contributed by good Republican voters who wanted to work for their Government in time of war, and found themselves forced to become dues-paying members of a labor union.

To get around the Hatch Act the C. I. O. has invented a couple of devices to enable it to spend money for campaign purposes notwithstanding the law.

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee is above the law.

Thus conservative Democrats and an army of Republican working men and women behold the money they paid into the coffers of the union bosses being used to defeat conservative Democratic and Republican candidates for office, and to perpetuate left-wing control of Government through a fourth Roosevelt term.

Dewey and Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MICHAEL J. KIRWAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial from the Dayton (Ohio) News:

DEWEY AND FOREIGN POLICY

Seizing an interval in the war news, Governor Dewey breaks into view this week with an expression of apprehension lest President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull are planning to be insufficiently international. His dread of the moment is that they might lead our country into a four-power alliance with our present allies, leaving the little peoples of the world out in the cold. "Beware," Governor Dewey says in effect, "I've got my eyes on you."

If Governor Dewey had read the papers he would know that both the President and Mr. Hull have time without number and time out of mind held to the view that the coming world cooperation must be world-wide, with every nation in it as its equal right, with even Japan and Germany, once their present evil controls were loosed and proof given of peaceful intentions, to be received. The full course of the administration, beginning with the good-neighbor policy, has expressed this view.

Roosevelt and Hull, as we pointed out yesterday, were upholding this course when Dewey himself, speaking in isolationist Wisconsin in 1940, was saying: "We cannot possibly remain strong and free unless we reject every entanglement in the affairs of Europe."

The man who said those words 4 years ago is complaining that the administration at Washington is not sufficiently entangling itself in the affairs of Europe and the world. It is about as if Colonel McCormick, arch isolationist, should suddenly attack the administration for isolationism.

One of the chief problems of the political campaign now opening is evidently to be to get a line on Governor Dewey's international views without collapsing from dizziness. Dewey, as his past commitments on this subject are scanned, has been on all sides of all the issues of the pre-war years, and all the issues yet to come with the post-war years. So strangely diverse and contradictory have his statements been that one is compelled to wonder whether he actually has any views on this vital subject of his own. Can it be that, as events call for an expression from him, he merely puts on a phonograph record and gets the wrong one as often as not?

Here he is attacking the President for an alleged plan to form an alliance with our allies in the war. Heaven help us, and last September 5, at the Mackinac Conference, Dewey was pronouncing himself in favor of a permanent alliance with Great Britain. A reporter asked Dewey: "Do you advocate or recognize the possibility or probability of a military alliance between the United States and Great Britain, to continue on a formal basis?" Dewey replied:

"I should think that would be in our interest. We have long had close military relationship with Great Britain, and the American people never suffered such a shock as they did when they felt that the British Navy might be seized by the Nazis."

For an alliance with Great Britain 11 months ago; attacking the administration now on a trumped-up charge that it is for an exclusive alliance with Great Britain—and our two other allies—now.

Dewey went on in this interview of last September 5 to express the hope that Russia and China would be included in the alliance which he favored. This makes the total alliance which he attacks today. About that time the horrified Colonel McCormick cracked the Governor fiercely on the head for his heresy. Is this week's somersault of the Governor an effort to placate the great Chicago anti-Russia, anti-Britain isolationist?

Dewey included Russia last September in the circle of his benevolence. This in itself was another bewildering swallowing of his own words. He had said in a speech in New York in 1940 that "a conspicuous and most unfortunate departure" of the New Deal from sound foreign policy "was the recognition of Soviet Russia." Dewey went on to say: "We need no such partnerships." In Cleveland, in November that same year, Dewey gloried in the fact that it was no Republican "accorded recognition to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

So in 1943 Dewey was proposing that partnership with Russia for which in 1940 he had said we had no need. And now, this August 1944, he attacks the administration with the allegation that it favors such a partnership.

Examples of such unbelievable contradictions and back trackings by Candidate Dewey in the past 4 or 5 years can be multiplied by the dozen. In 1941 he was at first against lend-lease. It "would bring an end to free government," he said. A month later he was for lend-lease, for making an end, we must suppose, to free government. In 1940 he charged the President with sacrificing the friendship of other nations. Today he charges the President with too much friendship with other nations. Today he denounces the President for too little internationalism. In Illinois yesterday he was exciting the adoring approval of Colonel McCormick's isolationist Senator BROOKS for his isolationism.

A plane carrier, the Navy men tell us, has to be quick on the turn, the reverse, the sideslip in order to dodge the bombs of the enemy. From what we now see of Governor Dewey and his flea-like course on foreign policy, he would make an excellent captain of a carrier. But as captain of the great American Ship of State, a vessel whose course today must have some reference to its course yesterday and tomorrow, that is terribly different. A nation made seasick by Governor Dewey's strange dippings and tossings cannot but be apprehensive as it tries to keep track of his curves.

Peace and the Free Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Sunday Globe of July 30, 1944:

PEACE AND THE FREE PRESS

When Adolf Hitler was shaping his conspiracy against the peace of the world during the middle thirties, he and his Italian understudy, Benito Mussolini, launched a highly significant campaign. Playing upon the all-too-evident disrelish of their neighbors for war, the two dictators proposed, boldly and openly, to France, Britain and the United States, that the first step toward preservation of the peace was to destroy the freedom of the press everywhere, in conformity with the practice already established in Germany and Italy.

These proposals were received with laughter in London, Washington, and Paris. The suggestion that governments move openly to convert the press into an agency devoted to concealing the truth from the public, into an instrument exclusively dedicated to the uses of official propaganda, and thus to furtherance of the self-interest of those who happened to be in control of the machinery of rule at the moment, flew in the face of traditions among the three great nations which Hitler and his stooge addressed.

Tight censorship in wartimes was already familiar to them all, especially in view of the experience of World War No. 1. Ever since the Government of Imperial Japan inaugurated, during the Russo-Japanese War, the policy of shutting off all news of military and naval operations, wartime censorship had been accepted as a necessity.

But total censorship in peace, like governmental interference with political news in wartime, has long been recognized among peoples cherishing the ideals of human freedom as constituting a mortal danger to their liberties. Such proposals clash with the fundamental thesis of democratic government. They assail the principle of popular sovereignty at its foundations. For they deny to those who view government as the agent and servant of the people access to the facts and information without which exercise of popular sovereignty becomes utterly impossible.

The motive behind the demand of the dictators at the time had little to do with fears entertained by either of them about the strength of his domestic position. In Italy and in the Third Reich the press was already prostrate. It had been converted into a propaganda instrument for fascism. What irked the boss of Berchtesgaden and the inflated egoist at Rome was the continuing, steady flow of dispatches from all parts of Europe and the world to the American, British, and French press—dispatches written by capable, resourceful, and experienced foreign correspondents who cared more for reporting the facts as they found them than for shaping their stories to suit the official views of governments and special interests operating with and behind governments.

It would be incorrect to pretend that such official influences were entirely absent from the fields in which foreign correspondents from the western democracies were accustomed to labor. Pressure from official scurces, especially under the Chamberlain regime in Britain, was often exerted to interfere with free flow of the news. A notorious example was the discharge of Mr. G. F. R. Gedye, one of the greatest of English correspondents, by his publisher, after he had spelled out in a devastating volume the story of the betrayal of Czechoslovakia and underlined its inevitable consequences of major war. British appeasers at the time disliked such bold and inconvenient confrontations with facts.

There also has been present in the field of foreign news collecting and distribution especially since the close of World War No. 1, a strong trend toward monopoly controls in the field of foreign news, supported by official influences. Mr. Kent Cooper, the capable and sober-minded director of the Associated Press, has been at pains to analyze these dangers and lift his voice vigorously against them. His account, published last year in an extremely readable volume needs to be kept in mind as evidence accumulates that this issue of freedom of reporting foreign news and freedom from official or monopolistic interference with its dissemination, arises once more.

One of the major tasks before the public in all Allied countries, once the military operations come to an end, will be to retrieve the liberties of the press from the clutch of necessary wartime governmental controls and censorships. Let no one imagine that this will be easy or that the struggle will be won without the exertion of the utmost pressure from the public and the press as well.

The collapse of the Germans and the formal ending of the war in Europe will remove automatically most of the justification for press control and censorship there on military grounds. Political, social, and economic developments will then assume primary importance among all governments. It is inevitable that efforts will be made to spread, into the realm of political reporting especially, a large portion of the censorship stripped of its warrant by the war's end.

The positions of the great allies, their wide interests, the fog which covers most of the peace problems thus far, the eagerness with which special interests will swarm toward the vacuum created in Europe by the debacle of the Germans—these and a dozen other evident probabilities make it imperative that an early start be made to insure complete liberation of the Allied press from official and unofficial censorship with the close of the fighting. Unless that point is pressed strongly, the ability of the people who have made the sacrifices in this war to understand what is being done with their victory will suffer.

It is good news accordingly, to find that Mr. Ralph McGill, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, John S. Knight, president of the Knight newspapers, and Mr. Kent Cooper, in his role as executive director of the Associated Press, have prevailed upon the Democratic Party to place in its platform a clear, strong demand looking toward the reestablishment of the basic principle of freedom of the press, both domestic and international.

"We believe in the world right of all men to write, send and publish news at uniform communication rates and without interference by governmental or private monopoly, and that right should be protected by treaty." Thus the platform plank.

It will be no easy task to translate this wise and sound proposal for freedom in the international flow of news into a treaty as part of the eventual diplomatic liquidation of the war. In large areas of the world, including some controlled by both our major Allies, the effort to achieve a treaty guaranteed foundation for foreign correspondence free of official interference, will not be welcome. Indeed, even in the full tide of war, few Governments permit to the press the elbow room accorded by our own in the field of political reporting and analysis.

The issue, nevertheless, transcends most of the great questions already emerging in relation to any coming peace. It touches the lives of hundreds of millions of people the world over. It affects the question of their future actions, and the materials upon which those actions and the judgments inspiring them shall be formulated. It is second only in importance to the physical freedom of the people.

"They who tamper with veracity," wrote John Morley in his magnificent Essay on Compromise, "from whatever motive, are tampering with the vital force of human progress." They who obstruct or tamper with the flow of truth to society conspire against its liberties and undermine their own.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Fort Wayne Plan for Soldier Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I enclose the following editorial from the Fort Wayne News-Sentinel:

Unique in the United States to date is the Fort Wayne plan for soldier service, programmed by the Veterans' Aid Commission, recently established pursuant to ordinance by Mayor Harry W. Baals, as city civilian defense director.

This plan is admirably based upon the integration of the seasoned experience and specialized training received by the model Fort Wayne civilian defense organization's thousands of wardens in all the city's blocks, zones, sections, and districts, together with the 12 soldier-service counselors.

The local program for dealing with every sort of problem confronting servicemen and their families is extraordinarily meritorious; not only in that it is built "from the bottom up," rather than made responsive to "directives" from the top down; but also in that it organizes all the numerous skills acquired by the highly efficient local civilian defense personnel in months and months of preparatory training, dating from the days of blackouts and other such protective-service drills.

As the Veterans' Aid Commission has pointed out, "the flow of returning veterans is only a small trickle now; but it is certainly not too early to start planning for the time when it becomes a large stream."

For, it has been calculated that by the middle of 1945—at the earliest—some 6,000 Fort Wayne soldiers and sailors will have been demobilized. And their needs and problems are certain to be numerous and varied. It is to deal with these needs and problems, that the Fort Wayne plan for soldier service has been initiated and is being daily advanced.

Mayor Baals, in his entirely nonpartisan capacity as Fort Wayne's civilian defense director, has correctly stated: "The case of each soldier, whether aid is needed or not, must be carefully reviewed, so that there will be no failure of full community gratitude and appreciation."

He has explained further, that just as our soldiers were called to the colors, so he now is calling upon the local civilian defense organization to implement the program of the Veterans' Aid Commission.

Considering the readily apparent merit of the program, and in the light of the faithful, efficient, and exemplarily self-sacrificing services already rendered by thousands of civilian defense workers in months past, we feel sure that it may be taken for granted that there will be an enthusiastic and sustained response to the mayor's appeal.

Some days ago, the veterans' aid commission issued a statement in which appropriate emphasis was laid upon the fact of jobs in any comprehensive, practical, effective program of soldier service.

Said the commission: "There must be more than a 'touch and go' attitude. There must be no oversimplification, taking the form of 'Here are some jobs—come and get them as best you can.' The same kind of careful planning that converted civilian consumer-goods industries into war-production plants—and which converted nearly 12,000,000 American wage earners into soldiers—will be necessary to reconvert both the plant and the former wage earner back to pre-war tasks."

And if this particular "reconversion" job is to be done right, then it will have to be taken up, in each community, as the particular community's particular responsibility. If there were local draft boards to assume responsibility for taking men out of "civvies" and putting them into uniform or into war plant jobs, then there ought to be the same kind of local assumption of responsibility for reversing the process.

The commission has suitably underscored the point that "Men, unlike plants, were conscripted. Practically every available potential soldier was scrupulously assayed and examined and moved to his military service or war production groove. That was an outstanding achievement. But nothing less should be done on 'the road back'—the road back to post-war adjustment."

It is also highly gratifying to note the Commission's common-sense insistence that "Jobs are the only really sensible soldier monuments, symbolizing as they do in every family that America is actually the 'land of opportunity.'"

Expressions of tribute to our fighting men must not be confined to rosy rhetoric or shiny medals. Nor must our "memorials" be limited to lifeless stone, or parks, or field houses, or stadiums, or libraries, or art galleries.

Any hungry man will gladly trade a medal for a meal, a bronze cross for a cup of coffee.

Any man facing the danger of eviction from his home will gladly swap a ribbon for a rent receipt.

There cannot be the faintest doubt that when our men come home they will be more interested in steaks than in stadiums.

Which of them, torn by the pangs of economic worry, would not eagerly forego a field house for an offer of friendly assurance of freedom from financial fear for his family?

Mindful of these practicalities and following the good old rule of "first things first," the Commission reminds us that right here in our own community we have the primary responsibility for making sane and sensible decisions as to the right thing to do for our returning heroes and for determining to do the right thing at the right time.

The time to begin thinking about all that is right now.

And this is the right time to take out insurance against having local preferences engulfed in a usurping sea of absentee-bureaucratic decisions and directives.

Before God, therefore, let us resolve that our Fort Wayne boys in the armed services shall come back here to something far more locally friendly and genuinely neighborly than another W. P. A.—which, administered, as it was, according to arbitrary "blanket" formulas, lacked that spirit of thoughtfulness and understanding which it could have possessed, had its functions been performed by a local organization of more fortunate neighbors of the less fortunate.

Such a resolution can find its best expression and fulfillment in the energetic and sustained support—by every home in every block of every neighborhood in Fort Wayne—of the self-evidently well-considered program now being so intelligently advanced under the Fort Wayne plan for soldier service.

Face It—They Do

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, for several reasons a recent visit to the hospital gave me some of the most pleasurable and instructive days of my life. An inconsequential reason is that, the surgeon having cut a hole in me and taken out some of what is sometimes impolitely described by a four-letter word, it will hereafter be my privilege, when old friends begin to talk about their operations, to break in and insist upon talking about my own.

But, seriously, it was my good fortune, just when the Communists were getting me apprehensive, to reach the hospital as 129 casualties from Normandy came in and, while being wheeled into the operating room, to find next to me one of those wounded but courageous young Americans, who, in 5 minutes, will convince the most cynical of us that many of our fears for the future of the Republic are just an old man's nightmare.

Later, this young man—18—brought his buddy, 19, and a WAVE the two of them had met, to my bedside, where we visited for a half hour or more. They afterward came back for more than an hour's additional visit. The first-hand information which these boys gave me—and they were no more than children in years, although men in experience, suffering and worldly wisdom—was intensely interesting and informative.

D-day was not a picnic excursion. It was not at all times an uninterrupted American advance. On the front where they were, many a ship carrying men and motorized equipment was blown out of existence, either by mine or shellfire, before it ever touched the beach and, on more than one, when the landing gates were lowered, well-directed German fire cut down boys like yours and mine as falls the grain before the reaper. It was only after our spotters had located the German artillery and the Navy had blasted some of the heaviest emplacements, as a child would sweep aside a pile of blocks, that our forces were successful in their landing.

Then back came the wounded. The dead remained where they were. And those boys who visited with me—and in all there were a dozen or more—were just back from facing a savage, relentless foe on what may well be described as the doorstep of Hell itself, and never in anything they did or said did they give the slightest indication of any lack of courage, determination, or faith in the permanence of our Republic. When the activities of some of those who are attempting, at the moment by subterfuge, to do away with the Constitution were called to their attention, they just laughed and said, in substance, "We will take care of those birds when we come home."

They were just back from facing Hitler's veterans. They had met and licked his best, and, without exception, those who had a prospect of being restored to health and strength expressed the desire for a speedy recovery in order that they might rejoin their comrades. One, incapacitated for active service, is now on duty at the hospital. He was one of those whose privilege it was to aid in alleviating the sufferings of his wounded comrades and his request to me, with which I am trying to comply, was to get him transferred back to his ship. He said he was lonesome for his buddies.

These young Americans—and none I met had reached voting age—have very definite opinions about our allies; about their mode of life and their general viewpoint of relationship between the races and the sexes. If my understanding of what they had to say is correct and if they represent the average American soldier, when they return, they will eradicate any foreign isms which, during their absence, may have been grafted upon our way of doing things—our way of living.

These boys are firmly determined that, if, when they return, they find the America they left here at home has been destroyed, they will restore it. If I got them right, they expect us to defeat those who, here at home, are enemies of the Republic, as they over there are defeating the armed enemy. If we fail here, they, to our shame, will complete our job when they return. When those boys come back—and above all things, they want to come back—they want to find an opportunity to work, to marry, to have a home, raise a family; to give their children an education; and to see that other folks from other lands do not remake America.

It was my good fortune to be at the hospital when these boys—and some were young enough to be my grandchildren—came in; to have the honor and the privilege of listening to their frank expressions of opinion. They recreated in me—grown somewhat bitter, somewhat discouraged, somewhat cynical—a new and abiding faith that they, who are sacrificing so much, will show the wasters and the spenders, those who would destroy our Government, either by force or by subterfuge, that we can safely rely upon them to, with God's help, keep here the Nation which you and I believe was born for the preservation of human liberty and opportunity.

While they are facing and winning the battle there, let us here at home meet and defeat all those who, by one scheme or another, would undermine constitutional government.

Philippine Independence and the Filipino Rehabilitation Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. JASPER BELL

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks regarding matters of importance to the future mutual well-being of the Philippines and the United States, I wish to insert at this point a statement made by Hon. Sergio Osmeña, President of the Commonwealth of the Philippines, immediately after President Roosevelt had signed Senate Joint Resolutions 93 and 94, on June 29.

At the time Present Roosevelt signed these resolutions, Mr. Osmeña was Vice President of the Philippines but has since been sworn in as President of the Commonwealth of the Philippines to succeed President Manuel Quezon, who passed away August 1.

It is because I feel the Members of the House of Representatives should know of President Osmeña's feelings regarding these resolutions that I am extending into the RECORD at this point his statement, released on June 30, 1944, which is as follows:

The enactment of Senate Joint Resolutions 93 and 94 is a long step toward the real freedom and independence of the Philippines and its survival as a free and Christian nation. This legislation authorizes the advancement of the recognition of Philippine independence from the date already fixed by law, July 4, 1946; provides for naval and air bases to be maintained not for American purposes alone but for the mutual protection of the United States and of the Philippines; and creates an effective instrumentality for the speedy consideration by the two Governments of matters affecting post-war economy, trade, finance, economic stability, and rehabilitation of the Philippines, including damages to public and private property and to persons occasioned by enemy attack and occupation.

Early in December 1941 when Japan attacked the Philippines, the President of the United States made a solemn pledge that the freedom of the Philippines will be redeemed and its independence established and protected. Thereafter this pledge was reiterated. For this the Filipino people are profoundly thankful. Now, on this matter of fundamental public policy, the Congress, the policy-making body under the Constitution, has taken action embodied in a formal enactment permanently placed in the statute books of the United States.

Under these congressional enactments, the sufferings and sacrifices brought by this war on our people will be ameliorated as much as possible, the ravages and destruction fully repaired and the economic structure of the country rebuilt and strengthened. While the liberating forces landing on Philippine soil will carry with them tanks, guns, and other weapons of war, the representatives of the Commonwealth Government will bring to our starving people food, medical supplies, clothing, school books, plows, and other farm implements. With the destruction of the power of the enemy, individual rights and political and religious freedom will be restored in the Philippines. And following the orderly processes prescribed by the independence law and the constitution of the Philippines, the independent Philippine Republic, supported by this great and friendly Nation, will emerge safe and secure against external aggression.

When I appeared before the House Committee on Insular Affairs to urge the approval of Senate Joint Resolutions 93 and 94, I said that I considered the passage of these two resolutions of vital importance to the welfare of our two peoples. I repeat this statement now with the addition that the news of this action of Congress will bring new hopes to the Filipino people, now enslaved by the enemy, and will instill in them renewed courage and united determination to effectively assist the liberating forces when our D-day comes.

I believe I express the sentiment of the Filipino people when I say that we are deeply grateful to the President and the Congress of the United States for the approval of this legislation.

Labor and Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I wish to have inserted in the RECORD a very open-minded discussion and article entitled "Labor and Politics." It appeared in the August issue of the Journeymen Plumbers and Steamfitters Journal and was written by the president of their united association, Mr. Martin P. Durkin, American Federation of Labor.

LABOR AND POLITICS

Within several weeks the attention of the Nation will, momentarily be drawn away from the world-wide battle fronts and focused on the problem of electing a national Government. Campaign oratory will be at its peak. Promises will be scattered around with utter abandon. Political party leaders will hurl charges and counter-charges against each other. The emotions of the voters will be stirred and general confusion will prevail. Barely more than a majority of citizens will exercise their right to vote—though the mere threat to deprive them of the right to vote will provoke a war. All facts considered, however, the campaign will follow a pattern which will be no better or no worse as campaigns go.

In the midst of the campaign confusion stands the organized workingman and workingwoman. Professional politicians will look at the organized workers and see the possibility of snaring a solid bloc of votes. If the campaign gives any indication of being close, the importance of the workers' votes will grow in the estimation of professional politicians. In political parlance, the "balance of power" may lie with the organized workers of the Nation. As a consequence, some consideration of the relation between politics and organized labor is pertinent at this time.

THREE CHANNELS

The political activities of organized workers in America might be channeled in three directions:

I. A labor party could be formed.

II. Support could be pledged to a dominant political party.

III. Political independence could be maintained.

I. A LABOR PARTY

The organized workers of America have never developed a significant political party, despite the fact that the idea has existed almost as long as there has been a political movement in the Nation. The existence of an organized group of people held together by common economic interests has set men dreaming of what could be accomplished politically if these people would vote as a solid group. Indeed, some labor leaders have been attracted by the possibilities of improving the conditions of workers by political power. Likewise there have been equally important members of organized labor who have consistently fought against the creation of a labor party. At the head of this latter group was that grand old man of American labor Sam Gompers. His thoughts and his leadership have become the guideposts of political thinking in the American Federation of Labor. The following excerpt is taken from an address he delivered on the possibility of having a labor party:

"The fact is that an independent labor party becomes either radical, so-called, or else reactionary, but it is primarily devoted to one thing and that is vote getting. Every sail is trimmed to the getting of votes. The question of the condition of labor, the question of the standards of labor, the question of the struggles and sacrifices of labor to bring light into the lives and work of the toilers—all of that is subordinated to the one consideration of votes for the party.

"Which movement, economic or political, in any country on the globe has brought more hope and encouragement, more real advantages, to the working people than the trade-union movement of America has brought to the wage-earning masses of our country?

"The organization of a political labor party would simply mean the dividing of the activities and allegiance of the men and women of labor between two bodies which would be in conflict."

The views of Gompers indicates at least one reason why there has not come into being a dominant labor party on the political scene. His position had been accepted by most of the international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Today there is little or no indication that there will be an effective labor party. Since there is no labor party on the national scene in this election, the channel for the labor vote in this Presidential campaign must be in some other direction.

II. PLEDGING SUPPORT

The second channel through which the votes of workingmen and women could flow into the election of a national government would be to pledge support to one of the existing dominant political parties. Already some C. I. O. unions have indicated that they will pledge the vote of their members in the forthcoming election. This action by the affiliates of the Congress of Industrial Organizations merits close attention.

SOME ELEMENTARY FACTS

Before discussing the advantages or disadvantages of this kind of political action, however, it is worth while to keep clearly in mind some elementary facts which must exist before a worth while pledge can be made. First of all, a promise to deliver the votes of workers to a particular party assumes that, because men are of one mind about trade unionism, they are in agreement over political issues. Nothing can be further from the truth. Every practical politician knows that there are many reasons why voters cast their ballots as they do. Some of these reasons far outweigh the influence exerted upon them by their belief in unionism. Political environment, political patronage, current economic conditions, the personality of the candidates, and many other factors may account for the decision of a particular voter. As a consequence, pledging the allegiance of labor-union members, and actually getting it, are not necessarily the same.

Another elementary fact, which must be recognized when a particular party is promised the votes of labor, is the danger of wrecking the union to win a political victory. It is not impossible that the cost of electing a political candidate may be so high in terms of membership that trade unionism may disappear and only the political party remain alive. A politically minded labor leader may go to such extremes to deliver the vote, that many union members will find themselves unpopular with their fellow members because they refuse to follow the leader politically. In a particularly close campaign, feelings within a local union may run so high that the wounds caused by the political campaign may either never be healed or lead to a sizable decline in union membership. The trade-union movement cannot afford political victories, no matter how important they may seem to politicians, if the price is suicide.

A final fact is that no union leader can guarantee his political chieftains that the vote of labor will be delivered. Political obedience of this kind would indicate an absence of freedom of thought within the union. Actually, if union men and women were so docile, they would not be in labor unions. They would be more than willing to be "yes men" to their employers on matters of wages, hours, and working conditions. Regimented union membership is not a healthy condition within the labor movement. Labor unions exist only in democracies; they must preserve democracy within their ranks.

DANGERS OF PLEDGING VOTES

But even if there were a labor vote which was solidly behind one political party, there would be real dangers surrounding a formal pledging of such support in the name of the union.

The history of the labor movement in America shows that there are certain pitfalls which cannot be avoided when labor unions tie their existence to the kite of a political party. Every time organized labor has been the tail to the kite of a particular labor party union officials have become political officials first and union officials secondarily. As a consequence, the very leadership which could have made the economic program of labor possible has its energies sapped in political maneuvering. In the division of loyalties the tendency is for union men to be drawn more and more toward political success rather than to the success of the labor union.

Another danger arising from being the kite tail is that of contributing funds to the political party. If a union is so thoroughly convinced that its success is tied up with a particular political party, then it must stand ready to contribute funds. The sinews of politics—no less than those of war—are made of money. Success in politics means willingness to play with the blue chips. Blue chips cost real money. The treasury of the union is too available to politicians when only a little more money is needed desperately. When the treasury of a union is depleted, the union is in a bad way whether the political campaign is won or lost.

If the political campaign is lost, the union may be so weak financially that it cannot protect itself economically from the retaliation which it may incur from the winning party. At the very time when the union will be forced to rely entirely upon its economic strength it finds that its funds have been dissipated. If the political campaign is won, the union is not always strong enough to protect itself from the treatment accorded to it by successful politicians who are safely established in office. The record of political promises which have been kept is not so overwhelmingly clear that unions can rely upon politicians rather than upon their own cash reserves to improve the conditions of the workers. A union without a strong treasury is weak no matter who wins the political campaign.

Still another commonplace fact of politics is that politicians are never overeager to please the voters whose votes are a "sure-thing." When a politician knows that the votes of a labor union are tucked away in his hip pocket, he has nothing to fear. As a result, the benefits which labor can expect to obtain diminish proportionately. Once powerful unions will find themselves reduced to the positions of "hangers-on" and they receive the kind of treatment reserved for such political wheel-horses. Just enough crumbs will be dropped to keep the union in line.

The old adage that "the squeaking wheel gets the grease" applies in politics with especial force. Only a strong, independent labor union can make its squeaks loud enough to be heard by politicians.

POLITICAL INDEPENDENCE

The nonexistence of a Labor Party and the dangers arising from pledging the votes of labor to a dominant political party indicate the desirability of considering the third channel through which the political force of organized labor might flow. As long as the labor movement in America desires to respect the rights of its members and to preserve itself as the protector of the workers, then it must maintain its political independence.

The idea of political independence is known to every trade unionist just as the name of Sam Gompers is known to every union man who is acquainted with even the recent history of the labor movement. It was Sam Gompers who brought before the union men and women of this nation the principle of political independence. He wrote in an editorial published in the American Federationist in August 1908 the following statement:

"We now call upon the workers of our common country to stand faithfully by our friends, oppose and defeat our enemies, whether they be candidates for President, for Congress, or other offices, whether executive, legislative, or judicial."

This principle of electing your friends and defeating your enemies is still worth while today. The ways of politicians have not changed since the days of Sam Gompers. Nor has the need to preserve political independence diminished in the slightest. Rather, there is solid ground for believing that a condition of mutual respect by government and by labor is most necessary in times like these. Labor does not seek to dominate the government and does not expect government to dominate labor.

Political independence does not mean that workers will refuse to exercise their right to vote. On the contrary, this principle accentuates the duty of every worker to vote—but to vote as he sees fit, without regard to party labels and party propaganda. The political ideals of Sam Gompers mean simply that every worker is asked to examine the voting records of the political candidates—not in terms of party name labels—but on the basis of their recorded votes on issues which are important to the labor movement. This kind of participation in the political life of the Nation is far more exacting than simply being the wearer of a political party's collar.

The channel of political independence, therefore, is the proper direction in which the votes of organized labor in America should flow. In this manner the freedom of every member of organized labor to vote as he sees fit will be preserved. The strength of the labor movement will not be dissipated. Domination by politicians will be avoided. Reliance can be placed upon the economic strength of unionism rather than upon the weak promises of politicians to protect the welfare of the Nation's workers. Americans will enjoy the full benefits of a free labor movement. By voting for the individual but not for a political party, organized labor will continue to receive all the benefits derived from the wise counsel of Sam Gompers. Elect your friends and defeat your enemies!

The Jackson Hole Monument

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK A. BARRETT

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of a letter from Hon. Charles E. Winter to the editor of the Boston Globe, under date of August 14, 1944.

Judge Winter represented Wyoming in this body for several terms and was a distinguished Member of the House.

Judge Winter has made a lifetime study of the public land question and is the author of a book on the problem. On August 10 last, the majority leader extended his remarks and included therein the editorial of the Boston Globe of August 7 on my bill to abolish the Jackson Hole National Monument. The editor lives a long way from Jackson Hole, and he is just as far off in the facts of the case. He states that Mr. Rockefeller purchased 35,000,000 acres, whereas in fact he purchased 32,000 acres.

In my opinion, Judge Winter has very effectively answered the Boston editor in the following letter:

CASPER, WYO., August 14, 1944.

Boston Globe Editorial Department,
Boston, Mass.

GENTLEMEN: I note the insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 10, 1944, of your editorial against the bill in the House to abolish the Jackson Hole Monument.

You decry the suit of the State of Wyoming against the Government as an attempt "to deny to the public the newest of these national monuments." Under the Antiquities Act the only possible authority, if there be nothing of historic or scientific interest in the area, then the proclamation of the President was null and void.

We assert that there is nothing of a historical or scientific nature within the boundaries of the proclamation except as the terms would apply to millions of acres in various sections of the country; and not as much as would apply to the whole of New England. We challenge proof to show any feature bringing the area within the act.

You say "it is a historic spot," but give no fact to support the statement. You say it "is established to protect for all Americans for all time a site of scenic grandeur where the Grand Tetons raise their gothic spires above a plain that reveals one of the most spectacular records of glacial action on this continent." The Ice Age extended as far south as Ohio and Illinois and the whole north half of the United States could be said to show spectacular records of glacial action. On that ground the entire northern part of the 11 Western States should be set aside as a monument.

The entire Teton Range, which we admire as much as, possibly more than, the writer of the editorial, did not and does not need and is not affected in the least by the creation of a monument of the plain. When you say "plain," you describe the character of the land, though it happens to be a floor of a valley rather than strictly a plain. But the characteristics of a plain are there—sand, gravel, sage brush. As you say, "it retains the sage-brush flavor," which is hardly "spectacular" or of "historical or scientific interest."

The scenery, the magnificent Teton Range, 13,700 feet altitude, at the Grand Teton, has been and is protected by the creation of the Teton National Park, authorized properly by Congress, is not revealed only by and from the valley floor, the plain; the Tetons are revealed anywhere from west of the top of the Wind River Range, 50 miles to the east. Therefore this enormous area, perhaps a million acres, should be declared a monument. Reductio ad absurdum.

I, as a Member of Congress from Wyoming, helped to settle the matter of the protection of the Tetons by creation of the Teton National Park, encompassing their peaks, their eastern walls, their foothills, and a sufficient area of the valley level for administration purposes and for the public to enjoy them. Moreover it was done in conference and agreement with the National Park Service as a proper and a final solution of the matter.

You call attention to the fact that it, the plain, is the wintering ground of the largest Elk herd surviving in the United States. What has that to do with the matter? As the Representative of the people of Wyoming in Congress I introduced bills and aided in the enlargement of the area which had been and is a Game (elk) Refuge, where the elk do not feed but are fed. That Refuge existed and will exist, without the surrounding country "plain" being "monumented."

You declare that "the recreational importance of the spectacular valley at the headwaters of the Snake (River) is evidenced by the number of tourists who visit it annually and who constitute a principal commercial asset of the region." The recreational importance is not only admitted but asserted by us. We are proud of it and boast of it. All that, and the annual visits of thousands of tourists existed under the conditions before the creation of the monument, and will continue without the monument.

The people of Jackson Hole had before the monument, the "commercial assets of the region" and will have the same and more without the monument. As to the recreation by the people it will be restricted instead of increased. There is more recreation and less restriction in our Forest Reserves than in parks and monuments. For that very reason our forest reserves are visited by vastly more people than the parks and monuments.

You state and seem to attempt some point of the fact that "there are only 241 residents who graze about 6,300 head of cattle. No matter what their number they are American citizens who own their properties and have the same rights of citizenship, local government, and of property, the same as one or 1,000,000 other citizens.

You add: "Their rights of grazing, cultivation and residence are wholly protected. * * * These have been specifically guaranteed them and their heirs and assigns." They are protected and guaranteed only by the promise of certain persons now in office, but who will go out of office. They do not even bind themselves by their promises, as they may change their minds, as they have done on numerous matters. Much less can they or do they bind their successors in office. Their only real protection is the law. Massachusetts helped to make a government of laws and not of men. Personal government is un-American. There is no such protection or guarantee in the Antiquities Act.

When the Secretary of the Interior says, and he has said, that the "'rights' of grazing permits and leases will be continued in the lessees and permittees and to their heirs as long as they live," he, a devotee of personal government, has not shown and cannot show any such provision in the Grazing Act. There is no such right in perpetuity to be found in the act. You say these things are not "rights" but only "privileges," and "special considerations." How can these be granted and continued and guaranteed to the permittees, lessees, their heirs, and assigns as long as they live? Obviously it is impossible.

You submit that "it is late in the day to suggest that the Government is not the appropriate sponsor and preserver of those parts of the public domain which Congress designates as desirable to reserve and protect for the enjoyment of the public." No one has so contended. But we say that the Government is not the President or the Secretary of the Interior. Government is the people as represented and voiced by Congress. Congress did not designate the area in question as so desirable. On the contrary Congress failed and refused for many years every effort to have it pass a bill making said area an enlarging part of the Teton National Park. That is why the monument method to accomplish the desired purpose was resorted to, suddenly surreptitiously, with no warning, consideration, or consultation with the people of the area, their county, the State, or the Governor of Wyoming.

You speak of "exploitation" and say that these western people have a "hangover" of the idea that "the public interest is anybody's to exploit; that what the public owns anyone can take," that "this idea has lingered overlong in the West." You leave yourself and the East wide open for a return attack. We forbear and stick to the point of the present case. To ring in this old hoary tradition and holier-than-thou attitude of the East is unworthy and derogatory to that degree of intelligence and even semifairness that is supposed to belong to an editorial writer in the Hub of Culture. You approved the "commercial asset" idea in suggesting that the people of Teton County should support the establishment of the monument. They reject it. They do not so "exploit" the area. They refuse what you say will be to their advantage commercially. Is this "exploitation?"

You further state that "unless the public's rights in its own domain are protected now, the American tomorrow will have no public lands to enjoy, no monuments to its great continental heritage to preserve."

The complete and overwhelming answer to that statement is that the Federal Government now owns and controls 455,000,000 acres, in continental United States, 24 percent of our continental area, 88 percent of which is in the 11 Western States, 50 to 90 years after these States were admitted into the Union. Of that total, 250,000,000 are now in reservations. Of this, 22,000,000 acres are in parks and monuments; 140,000,000 acres are in grazing districts for which the livestock raisers have to pay annual fees. Do you want still more taken away from the people of these States? All held free of taxation by these States. The fact is the Government is exploiting the western people and their States. It has violated and is violating a sacred trust—the trust of the lands held, instead of being disposed of to the people. The Government has abandoned the basic principle set forth in the Constitution, to dispose of the public domain. The lands are to be disposed of to the people or to the States for the people of these States; to build free, independent States "on equal footing with the original States." The Government is, instead, charging tribute, royalties, rents, fees, making our citizens renters and sharecroppers instead of owners. This is a denial of the trust and a violation, a reversal of the American land principles. The original States, including Massachusetts, retained the public lands within their borders.

Ten years ago, with less than 30 percent combined State and private ownership, the Federal Government repealed the homestead and purchase laws whereby the people could acquire the land and the States complete their sovereignty. That private ownership and State sovereignty was and must again be the American principle and policy. I lay down to you the proposition that every State in the Union should have been ceded, and thus come into complete sovereignty over every acre within their borders, when they became States. Passing that as now academic, we now hold that the policy of disposition of the lands to the people must be restored, either directly to the people by homestead or sale, or indirectly to and through cession to the States where the land lies. This applies particularly to the 140,000,000 acres in grazing districts, and the 25,000,000 acres withdrawn for survey and classification. All the rest of the 455,000,000 acres is reserved for one purpose or another for the public. Every reservation and park and monument now created is taken from the residue which must be made available to the people for private ownership.

I have an idea that our returning soldiers will demand and command a return, and an immediate return, to the true policy of opportunity for them to acquire the lands.

Are you aware that Federal agencies, in addition to holding the enormous areas of their present lands, plan to secure additional areas of 125,000,000 acres now in private ownership? Are you in favor of land nationalism, the groundwork of fascism or socialism?

If you are in favor of the Government withdrawing still more areas from possibility of ownership by the people, at least let it be done honestly and lawfully. We have gone beyond every reasonable limit of parks and monuments, but if even this must be exceeded, then let it be done only by Congress, the representatives of the people; not by the dash of a pen by one person or executive official, by personal power under guise of an act never intended by Congress to give such authority. Congress should pass the bill abolishing the Jackson Hole Monument, as an act of usurpation of authority, the area not coming within the true purview of the Antiquities act. If by wildly stretching and straining it can be said to be within its purview, still it should be abolished and the act amended so that such an exercise of pretended authority will never again be possible.

Ship Construction Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include therein a letter from Admiral Vickery of the Maritime Commission showing tonnage output under the Maritime Commission's program through July 31, 1944:

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., August 5, 1944.

The Honorable S. O. BLAND,
Chairman, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives.

DEAR JUDGE BLAND: Believing it will be of interest to you, I am enclosing a tabulation of tonnage output under the Maritime Commission's program through July 31, 1944.

During July American merchant shipyards delivered 126 vessels aggregating 1,274,453 tons dead weight. Deliveries to date since the beginning of the year now total 990 ships, of 9,901,984 tons, and since December 7, 1941, 3,641 ships of 37,322,537 tons. The last figure corresponds to more than half of the estimated tonnage of the entire world's merchant fleets at the outbreak of the European war in 1939.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

H. L. VICKERY,
Commissioner.

Reclamation on the Missouri River

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK A. BARRETT
OF WYOMING
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert an editorial headed "Reclamation Supported on Missouri" from the Western Construction News, published in San Francisco, Calif. This editorial supports the plan of the Bureau of Reclamation for the development and use of the waters of the Missouri River in the interest of the consumptive beneficial purpose which is irrigation. The editorial pays a justified tribute to the work of the Corps of Engineers, but observes that—

> The feeling does exist that some Army engineers are not as keenly aware of the need for careful husbanding of every available drop of water in the arid or semiarid States of the West as they should be.

The Bureau of Reclamation, under the Department of the Interior, is charged with the responsibility for the conservation of every available drop of water west of the ninety-seventh meridian for irrigation and domestic purposes. As the editorial observes:

> The proposals of the Bureau of Reclamation should be adopted and placed under construction, and that a permanent policy recognizing agricultural and domestic uses of water as its highest purpose in the West be pursued.

The proposal of the Bureau of Reclamation is to conserve the waters of the Missouri River for the irrigation of 4,760,000 acres of land and supplemental water supplies for another 538,000 acres now irrigated but having an inadequate water supply. It offers an opportunity for the country to open a new empire in which returning servicemen from the battlefields of the South Pacific and Europe can settle and contribute to the permanent development of the country.

The recent action of the Governors of the Missouri Basin States in recognizing the superior claims of irrigation on the waters of the Missouri River reflects the results of clear thinking on the part of the executives of our States which are closest to the problem.

In Chicago on September 7 and 8, a conference of representatives of some 29 States will be called to consider amendments or modifications of the amendment to the rivers and harbors and flood-control bills now pending in the Senate proposed by the Senators from Western States. I understand that probably 100 representatives will be in attendance from these States, which include some in the New England and Atlantic seaboard and Gulf areas, as well as the Missouri Basin and Far West. It is my hope that out of this conference will come united support for a constructive program that will meet the situation and present a solution of the problem which is necessary to assure the use of the waters of the Missouri River and other western streams for the highest beneficial consumptive purpose.

Now available are printed copies of Senate Document No. 191, which is the Bureau of Reclamation's report on the conservation, control, and use of water resources of the Missouri River Basin in Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, and Missouri. Every Member of the House should read this report, and I am sure in so doing will be impressed with the necessity for assuring adequate water supplies for the development of the projects in this basin.

The editorial from the Western Construction News of July 1944 is as follows:

RECLAMATION SUPPORTED ON MISSOURI

Some attempt is made in the pages of this magazine to examine the differing programs proposed by the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation for development and use of the waters of the Missouri River.

Surely no one will say that the planning or engineering which has been performed has in the case of either agency been inept or incapable. The differences in the two plans arise from the objectives sought to be achieved. The Army engineers regard flood control and navigation as paramount, while the Bureau seeks use of the major portion of the water for irrigation and power. In the end the conflict is between navigation and irrigation, since flood control and power generation will eventuate to a considerable degree from the adoption of either plan.

It is the studied opinion of this magazine, devoted as it is to a nonpolitical and unbiased program of development of all the West, that the proposals of the Bureau of Reclamation should be adopted and placed under construction, and that a permanent policy recognizing agricultural and domestic uses of water as its highest purpose in the West be pursued.

In making this declaration there is no insinuation that the proposals of the Pick report issued by the Corps of Engineers is technically unsound or that Colonel Pick or any of his staff had any base motives in planning it. The feeling does exist that some Army engineers are not as keenly aware of the need for careful husbanding of every available drop of water in the arid or semiarid States of the West as they should be.

It is the traditional role of the Army engineers to protect and expand the inland waterways of the Nation, and as a corollary, in recent years, to attend to flood-control works as a protection to the navigable streams. In these fields, they have done splendid work, as exemplified on the Mississippi River, the Los Angeles, Calif., coastal basin, the Willamette Valley in Oregon, and in many other places.

While river traffic has been of tremendous importance on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, it has been much smaller in volume on the Missouri. To be sure, it has existed, but due to sparser population and lesser industry, has never achieved the volume or the value of that on the other streams. Its loss, therefore, assuming that it would be lost, would not be a major calamity; in fact, there is some doubt whether it would be entirely eliminated under the reclamation program. At any rate, steadily lowering truck and rail tariffs are removing the single factor which made water transportation desirable, namely, lower cost.

The opportunity for expansion of vigorously productive farm lands, however, is of great and constantly growing importance. Over 4,760,000 acres of land which has never before produced anything could be added to the farm resources of the Nation, and another 538,000 acres now restricted in their yield because of inadequate water supply could be made completely productive. This magazine feels that an opportunity to add such quantities of food to a supply which never in our history has been completely adequate, even without considering the demands of impoverished foreign nations, must not be overlooked or lightly discarded.

Congratulations, Jones & Laughlin Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, Port Vue, Pa., a thriving little borough, adjoining McKeesport, became famous because of the former McKeesport Tin Plate Co. and its energetic president, the late E. R. Crawford. Purchased by the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, a great task confronted this company in converting the plant facilities to war production. Nothing was left undone in the purchase of new machinery and equipment in reconverting this plant to the production of howitzer shells and other types of steel shell and bomb cases that are now great factors in the destruction of the German and Jap super war machines. In the brief period since reconversion, the McKeesport plant (Port Vue) of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation has manufactured 4,000,000 shells and bombs. This has only been possible through the magnificent cooperation of the plant workers—both men and hundreds of women—many of whom have several sons in the armed services of our country. W. B. Minch, genial and able plant manager of the company, is representative of the greatest industrial district in America—yes, the hub of the arsenal of democracy. I congratulate both the workers and management on this splendid record. It is this kind of teamwork that will soon spell doom for the ruthless Axis horde. I am happy to include in my remarks the following page article that appeared in the McKeesport Daily News, August 18, 1944:

CONGRATULATIONS TO OUR M'KEESPORT PLANT WORKERS FOR PRODUCING 4,000,000 SHELLS AND BOMBS

The three-millionth United States Army howitzer shell is due to roll down the production line at the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation's McKeesport works during the next 48 hours—making a total of more than 4,000,000 steel shells and bomb cases of various sizes that have been produced in this plant for the Ordnance Department of the Army and sent to arsenals to be loaded with explosives and then go on to the firing lines of our many invasion fronts.

Representatives of the United States Army Ordnance, McKeesport, Port Vue, and Liberty Borough officials, and J. & L. officials will visit the plant next Monday, August 21, to commend the shell-line workers for a job well done.

Congratulations to the patriotic men and women workers who are making these 3,000,000 shells and all the other shells and bombs in production at the plant, and the millions that will follow, until the Germans and Japs are defeated.

Shells and bombs from the J. & L. McKeesport works will get to the front faster and do more good if we have more helpers. The work is safe—no explosives, as shells are loaded elsewhere. It is light, clean work—especially attractive to young women. Come in and talk it over at the employment office, Port Vue, if you want to help.

JONES & LAUGHLIN STEEL CORPORATION.

Democratic Platform Stands on Record of Wage Freezing—Binding Men to Jobs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW C. SCHIFFLER

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 18, 1944

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the United Mine Workers Journal of August 1, 1944:

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM STANDS ON RECORD OF WAGE FREEZING—BINDING MEN TO JOBS

The theme song of the Democratic platform, as regards labor, is to stand pat. Even on the matter of racial relations and minority rights, the platform stands pat inasmuch as it merely repeats the 1940 platform.

Comparing the things that the Republican Party promised to do with the Democratic platform fails even to mention, as involves labor—here are the most important:

1. Unfreeze wages—Republicans "Yes," Democrats "No."

2. Unshackle labor from being frozen to the job—Republicans "Yes," Democrats "No."

3. Restore the Department of Labor to union labor—Republicans "Yes," Democrats "No."

4. Reorganize, consolidate, and simplify Government Boards and Bureaus handling labor relations and administer the laws on a basis of equality—Republicans "Yes," Democrats "No."

Such is the comparable score labor won at the Republican convention and lost at the Democratic convention.

The Democratic Party is running on its record—and, consequently, could not do anything other than indorse the wage-freezing Little Steel formula and all other legislative devices and mechanicisms designed to freeze the American workingman as a political servant of the New Deal Party.

This being true, it is only a fair conclusion that, if the Roosevelt administration is given a fourth term, it will carry out its oft-stated intentions in the third term to enact a Manpower Draft Act, such as the Austin-Wadsworth bill, which allegedly was prepared by Roosevelt's Wall Street lawyer friend, Granville Clark.

It will maintain the Smith-Connally-Harness antistrike slavery bill. It will keep labor frozen to its job under McNutt's War Manpower Commission. It will keep wages down under W. L. B.'s Little Steel formula, and it will keep profits high until the war ends.

Although the shooting may be over, it will take its own time about proclaiming the war's end, thus holding effective the temporary war powers given the administration as long as possible.

Most of the Democratic platform is devoted to boasting about the past 12 years. The rescue of the bankers in 1933 is played up, and really the bankers ought to be grateful. There is no reason for a banker to vote against Roosevelt.

The platform says that the New Deal provided employment, being careful not to mention the 10,000,000 who had no jobs when the war broke out in 1939, when "war prosperity" began. Nothing is said about those $55-per-month pick-and-shovel jobs under Harry Hopkins' W. P. A.

The Democratic platform says of all that: "We pledge the continuance and improvement of these programs"—so you know what to expect when the war jobs are through.

The platform doesn't exactly claim that the war is the private property of the Democratic Party, but the platform does claim that the Roosevelt administration saw the war coming and got ready for it. Naturally enough, the sinking of eight battleships at Pearl Harbor by the Japs in a surprise attack, and the destruction of most of our oil tankers on the Atlantic Ocean, are not included in the platform boast of foreseeing the war. Somehow, the administration was modest about those things which the censors have never yet allowed all to be told—and the Pearl Harbor disaster has never been cleared up by a courtmartial of the responsible generals and admirals who may or may not have had the wrong orders from Washington.

Farmers are promised everything they asked, and little-business men—of whom a million have been forced to close their doors in the past 2 years—are also given a nice line of chin music.

As regards post-war programs, we find the usual run of political promises of nearly everything to everybody. Even the bituminous coal industry is remembered with a general promise of possible reenactment of a bituminous coal act on a maybe basis. This promise was not included in the original draft of the platform. The Democratic politicians took the advice of coal operators favoring the passage of a new bituminous coal-control law, who gave assurance that such inclusion would give the Democratic Party a top talking point for votes in coal regions where miners are changing their affiliation from the Democratic to the Republican Party.

Since even the Democrats recognize the stacked-deck deal given the coal miners in the 1943 coal wage controversy, they agreed that something would have to be done; hence the inclusion.

An analysis of the status of bituminous coal legislation will satisfy the most exacting that this gesture was designed for votes and not performance. A bill for reenactment of a bituminous-coal control law has been pending in the United States House of Representatives since January 6, 1943. This bill provides for a commission to administer the Bituminous Coal Act. It was introduced by Republican Congressman JENKINS from Ohio. The Democratic administration objected to this bill because it would reestablish bituminous-coal control under a commission form of administration and thereby lift it from the status of New Deal "burrocratic" domination.

Another bill, H. R. 4576, was introduced by Congressman FLANNAGAN and others on April 14, 1944. This bill was agreed to by representatives of the U. M. W. A. and 70 percent of the bituminous-coal operators. It also provides for a commission form of administration. The administration is against this bill because it shelves New Deal "burrocratic" administration.

The U. M. W. A. and the coal operators are anxious for the passage of this measure. Hearings have been held. Every effort has been exerted to have the measure favorably reported out of the committee. The House Ways and Means Committee is composed of 15 Democrats and 10 Republicans. At least 6 Republicans are favorable to the passage of the measure providing for a commission administration. Yet, this committee, controlled by the Democratic Party, is holding up the proposed legislation which the indefinite promise of a political platform, designed to secure votes, mentions as a possible cause for legislative attention.

It would be unnecessary for the coal industry to exert the time and incur the expense necessary to reenact a bituminous coal act, fundamentally essential for the prevention of cut-throat competition, had President Roosevelt refrained from abolishing the commission form of administration simply to provide "burrocratic" domination, thus making the act subject to New Deal political manipulation.

Acting under his reorganizational powers, and without notice to the officials of the U. M. W. A., President Roosevelt issued an Executive order, effective July 1, 1939, by which the commission form of administration, of which Percy Tetlow of the U. M. W. A. was chairman, was abolished, and the whole authority transferred as a bureau under Secretary Ickes' Department of the Interior.

The indifference of the appointees administering the act became so great, and "burrocratic" domination so far-reaching, that the U. M. W. A. convention, in 1942, specifically instructed the officials to seek legislation restoring the commission form of administration.

So, if the Democrats are ready and willing to repent their original mistake of abolishing the commission form of administration, the bituminous coal industry will be happy to accept speedy enactment of the act as agreed upon.

As evidence of good faith, since the hearings have already been held on the measure and its enactment would not constitute a new form of legislation, and since its practicality has been demonstrated and the necessity for the law recognized by consumers, producers, and mine workers, the logic of the situation would dictate that the Democratically controlled Ways and Means Committee report the bill out now and enact it before election.

But we are told that regardless of any and all platform promises, President Roosevelt will be called upon by the "burrocrats" to veto the bill if the industry insists upon a free and independent form of commission administration.

Chaos in the Production of Meat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress, if you find your beefsteak tough you can blame it on to the several agencies who have discouraged the fattening of cattle.

The Washington press release of August 16 indicates that there is 41 percent less cattle on feed in the Corn Belt States this year as compared to a year ago. Illinois has 34 percent less, Wisconsin 20 percent, Minnesota 60 percent, Iowa 35 percent, Missouri 45 percent, South Dakota 50 percent, Nebraska 46 percent, and Kansas 43 percent. This means about 700,000 fewer head of cattle being fed.

The cause of this reduction can be laid directly at the door of the several governmental agencies who have placed ceilings on cattle and issued other confusing directives, including the changing of the rules in the middle of the feed lot. Part of it has been due to a shortage of grain and unsatisfactory prices, particularly for the higher grade of finished beef.

This has meant that the so-called utility beef will be available for the public. This comes about because there will be a large run of low-grade cattle on the market. Utility beef is the lowest grade of beef that moves through the retail shops. In ordinary times this beef goes into sausage or other mixed-food products. Most of the butcher shops and eating establishments do not care to handle this type of beef. It is a kind of meat that comes from steers that should be in the feed lot.

I believe that in the long run this will not be good for the beef industry. When the housewife gets a roast or beefsteak of the so-called utility beef she will find her family disappointed. The next time instead of buying beef she may buy a chicken.

Under the rules adopted by the War Food Administration and the Office of Price Administration the packer gets a certain subsidy if he buys cattle within the price range suggested by the Government agencies. The price paid now at the packers and the sale rings for finished corn-fed beef is over the ceiling. This makes it necessary to buy the other grades of beef well below the established price in order to even up the price paid, otherwise the packer would lose the subsidy offered by the Government. This good finished beef either finds its way into the black market or goes to the better restaurants and hotels. Under these rules it will be impossible for the small packer or the individual with unfinished beef to realize the proper profit upon his animals.

It is very evident from the examination of the sale of finished beef that it is now going through the black market. This trend will continue as long as we have the present meddling by inexperienced bureaucrats with the production of meat.

This week meetings are being held with the cattlemen in an effort to stimulate more feeding. The Government agencies are becoming panicky now because they realize with nearly 50 percent less cattle on feed that there will be a shortage of meat on the market.

These Government agencies are entirely at fault for the condition which now exists because they issue so many confusing orders. This has caused much discouragement to the cattle feeder. He has not been able to feed his animals at a profit. He has not been able to plan ahead as to his feeding operations. The Government agencies have discouraged the feeding of livestock. They now belatedly recognize their mistakes. The same thing occurred with the hog industry. At one time we had too many hogs, now there may be a shortage.

We have prospects for a good corn crop. It is high time that the Government agencies quit bungling the production of meat. If they do not there may well be a shortage of good beef, not only of our armed forces and our allies, but the citizens of this country. If they will quit changing the rules in the middle of the feed lot and leave the cattle producers alone, America can, within the next 6 months, again enjoy prime corn-fed beef. These agencies should realize that the steer which is now being sold underweight with a little grain can carry three or four hundred extra pounds of good meat. It would be the good meat and not the low-grade utility type now being forced upon the civilian population all because of the short-sighted, ridiculous policies which have been adopted by the several agencies dealing with the production of meat.

Must History Repeat Itself?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following very interesting article which appeared in the Chelsea Record, Chelsea, Mass., Saturday evening, August 19, 1944:

MUST HISTORY REPEAT ITSELF?

Chelsea, today enjoying its most prosperous economic period in a decade and a half, faces what may be the most serious dislocations in its history unless definite and decisive steps are taken soon to soften the impact which the war's end will inevitably cause in the community and to forestall at least some of the ill effects which will result.

Today, unemployment is practically nonexistent in the area and relief is confined almost entirely to those persons physically incapable of earning a living. Business, despite many problems created by wartime shortages of merchandise and manpower, is at a highly satisfactory level. This is in distinct contrast with the situation that existed only a few years ago.

Chelseans need not have long memories to recall the days of mass unemployment, or drastically shortened workweeks. Throughout the thirties, hundreds of residents of the area were either totally unemployed, or worked but a day or two a week. Many others were employed on relief projects to a limited extent, at wage rates which gave only a bare subsistence. Business reflected the general condition and many stores were forced to close, while others were barely able to keep their doors open.

Whether this condition returns again is in the hands of the people of this city. They cannot control the world-wide conditions that will follow the cessation of hostilities, but they can do much to alleviate the dislocations as they affect this area. The first step in any post-war program for the city is a realization of what is in prospect.

First, a decrease in the number of jobs available is a certainty. Some individual industries may be able to maintain their present standards of employment, but it will be impossible for all to do so. Others may regain their present employment levels after a period of reconversion, but there will be unemployment from these industries during the period of change.

Some of the older men and some women now employed will drop from the labor market with the close of the war, but it is highly unlikely that the number thus withdrawing from the labor market will offset the decrease in jobs. There will also be some absorption of laid-off workers by retail and service establishments that are now undermanned, a temporary boom in this type of business may shoot their employment level above the normal for a time.

The great problem will be the return to civilian work of several thousand men now in the armed services. Many of these, of course, will return to jobs they held before the war, in some cases replacing men or women hired "for the duration" only. Others will find that their prewar jobs are now nonexistent, and some will not desire their old jobs back. But there will be a huge increment to the potential labor force from the younger men who were not in the labor pool before their induction into the armed service, but who will immediately be seeking work after their discharge. These men must find jobs on their return home if the community is to give them their bare dues, and this in the face of a potential shortage of jobs in the area.

The net result of the foreseeable post-war job conditions will be an increased labor supply and a decreased demand for labor. This, if allowed to stand, would inevitably mean depressed conditions, unemployment, lowered wage standards, a breakdown in business.

This is Chelsea's prospect for the future, unless the community is far-sighted enough to take action now to remedy matters.

Our Last Chance in China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, recently there have been a good many articles, editorials, and broadcasts in this country about the so-called crisis in China. Whether realized by their authors or not, they are contributing to a systematic, organized, Nation-wide propaganda campaign to discredit the central government of China and its leaders, especially Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, the Soong family, and those western-educated Chinese who for several decades have influenced China profoundly in our direction.

Some of these attacks have been thoroughly scurrilous, others merely a collection of vicious rumors and cheap gossip. In the most widely circulated column I counted 14 statements that I personally know to be utterly false.

No one denies there is a crisis in China, although it is not much more serious now than it has been for many months, and in some respects is less acute. Many persons familiar with Asia have been warning on every possible occasion since 1937, and especially since Pearl Harbor, that increased internal difficulties were inevitable in China unless we changed some of our apparent policies toward Asia. More than 18 months ago before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and here on the floor, I tried to describe the urgency of the situation in such words as—

China is in a most critical position—more so than America begins to realize. * * * We have got to make our purposes clear and put them in unmistakable terms or else we shall lose China. * * * No longer is it a question, if it ever was, of whether or not we, out of magnanimity and generosity, are going to help the Chinese. The burning question, from the standpoint of America's own security, is whether the Chinese are going to keep on helping us.

The most important thing for us to realize about the present crisis in China is that it is largely made in America. Chiang Kai-shek is in trouble because he gambled his own destiny and that of his nation on his faith in the western democracies and their promises. There is dissatisfaction with him in some circles in China because the democracies have not yet made good, which properly casts doubt on the wisdom of his decisions. There is one way and only one way to resolve the crisis and restore unity. That is for us to vindicate Chiang's judgment and prove by our performance that he was right in placing his faith in the western democracies instead of, first, going in with Japan and the other colored peoples to make this a race war, or second, going in with the Communists to make it a class war.

Let us think for a moment of the enormous extra cost to America in lives and money if China becomes further divided and weakened, and we have to defeat Japan without her full and most effective cooperation. Does it make sense for us to be joining in a concerted attempt to discredit the one man who more than all others combined has kept China on her feet and in the ring on the same side we are on? Surely this is the time to understand and sympathize with him in his troubles and exert ourselves to the utmost to hold up his hands, not kick him. What has happened to our sense of proportion? We should be profoundly grateful for the remarkable degree of stability and progress China has demonstrated through 7 long years of gruelling torture, rather than complain too bitterly about the admitted imperfections and the long way she still has to go.

A frank and challenging statement by Pearl S. Buck of some of the deeper issues involved appeared in the August issue of Common Sense. I am including it and wish it could be circulated and read as widely as the many untrue stories and misleading reports have been. Her analysis of the situation within China is, I think, thoroughly accurate:

OUR LAST CHANCE IN CHINA

(By Pearl S. Buck)

We have now solidly laid the foundations for future wars in Asia. We have laid them in the two most important countries, China and India; but we have not wholly neglected Russia. Should Russia be dissatisfied with us in the future, a thing always possible, she will find two potential allies, numbering between them most of the world's population. It may be, if industrialization is rapid enough, that Russian leadership will not even be necessary.

For we have laid the foundations of future wars with masterful thoroughness. We have neglected no insults; we have been ruthless in our denials. Under able English direction we have completely scorned India; first, by our silence during the Cripps mission and by our acquiescence in the suppression of human rights to a degree which has not been matched, in its ruthlessness, outside of Fascist-owned Europe; second, by careful and total ignorance about her famine, again under direction, and third, by our recent refusal at Bretton Woods to agree that India has the right to spend her own money as she likes. Scrupulously careful always, we have chimed in and agreed with England that the unfreezing of Indian credits in London can be no part of any international agreement.

This disposes pretty thoroughly of India. For a long time to come she will not believe in us. Our fine ideas and sentiments now ring completely hollow to her. She believed in them before this war. Now she knows better. Like the Atlantic Charter, they do not apply to her.

The foundations have not been so easy to lay in China because that country is not quite in the position of India. But in spite of all difficulty we are succeeding there too in alienating the people and in building up dismay and distrust, ready for the next war. As Walter Lippmann has said, it is now very necessary for us to keep close to Britain. We have followed British policy so faithfully that we have lost our own opportunity in this generation for taking a leading part in the affairs of Asia, perhaps of the world. Britain and Russia will tie for the place of highest power in the peace. In any event, we will come in third.

This has been the result of our own ignorance not only of Asia and the world, but our ignorance of ourselves, our own strength, and the strategic place in which this war put us in the world. With the greatest industrial machine in the world, the greatest army and navy and air force, our diplomacy, always subject to Britain, has now put us into third-rate position among the powers. One feared it with the loss of India as an ally, for no one can call a people as sullen as half-starved slaves an ally; one fears it still more in the deep and increasing anger now rising against us in China. Only fools or the most ignorant of people, God keep us from being either, could ignore this anger. It is easy to speak and feel in arrogant terms in Asia while our troops are successfully invading Europe. But it is folly and ignorance all the same.

We have followed the traditional youthful American pattern in regard to China. First we rushed to idolize and to idealize. Those of us who knew China shuddered and trembled. China deserves honor and respect and our friendship above that of all others, for her people are like ours in their belief in independence and democracy. But no country any more than any individual can stand sentimental idolatry and idealization. Revulsion is sure to come. Those of us who knew China's great qualities as well as her faults tried, for the sake of America, to present a balanced and truthful picture, the picture of a great country, caught unprepared for war but fighting bravely against an invader.

It was impossible to get this picture to the American people quickly enough. The controlled radio networks would not have it. The popular press, newspapers included, with only one or two exceptions, were not interested. The pendulum went on swinging. Young journalists, inexperienced and without historical perspectives, judged a country thousands of years old by young American standards. China began to be condemned. Then condemnation could not proceed swiftly enough. Indeed, it was to the interest of those who were guiding our American foreign policies to encourage this condemnation. It provided reasons for not giving China swifter aid, the reasons, too, for not diverting anything from Europe to Asia. By a series of the same masterly strokes that made it clear to us that the real war was in Europe, not Asia, it has now been made clear, or very nearly clear, to the American people that China does not deserve aid from us because of her internal divisions and corruption. China, like India, must first unify herself, "clean her own house," the ancient phrase has it, before she deserves, etc. The conclusion has a curiously familiar ring about it. It is, in fact, an echo of Britain's policy in India, the policy which has succeeded in planting a new hatred of the entire white race in millions of hearts.

Were the foundations for future wars quite so completely laid in China as in India, one would not take time and energy now to perform so futile a task as to try to destroy them. But it is not too late in China. Thousands of Americans, accustomed to liking and even to trusting the Chinese, are not quite ready to dislike and distrust them. They have accepted England's verdict on India—they ask no questions there. But they are still asking questions about China. While they ask there is hope.

What are these questions?

Is China going Fascist? No, there has never been any real danger of China's going Fascist and there is none now. It is true that China was caught by this war while she was in a transition period between the old empire form of government and a modern democratic form, which would enable her to elect her own government. There is no way by which Chinese can elect a president, for example, therefore it is true that Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek is the nonelected head of the Chinese Nation. He has risen as any such leader arises where there is no political machinery for election, by his own ability and by common assent. It still remains true that, whatever his faults, he has been the only man who could have led China during this war, in exactly the same sense that Stalin has been the man of the hour for Russia and Churchill the man of the hour for England, if not for India.

But Chiang Kai-shek is not a Fascist. He is first of all a Chinese, and second of all a soldier. As a Chinese there is something contradictory in this, for the Chinese people have never given their highest honors to soldiers. We of the West have glorified the militarist, but China has not. Chiang Kai-shek knows his own people, and since he has the hope of becoming permanent in Chinese history, it is thoroughly Chinese for him now to wish to be something more than a soldier. His trend today is not toward fascism or even militarism, but toward philosophy and scholarship.

This man has his very real faults, as have all our leaders in this war. He is not a world mind, any more than the others are. He is as passionately Chinese as Churchill is English, and has had the same tendency, only in lesser degree, to arrogance and having his own way. He is, however, a man of the lower middle classes, and not an aristocrat, and he has no feeling of superior class. In this he is more comparable to Stalin than to Churchill. Roosevelt and Churchill are alike, and Stalin and Chiang Kai-shek. Some day an interesting study could be made of the curious similarities between these four men who today rule the world. For in spite of the present fashion in America to sneer at Chiang Kai-shek and to speak of his decreasing influence, let us not be so foolish as to think that his power in China is really decreasing because of what some young American commentators are saying and writing. In the hearts of the Chinese, Chiang Kai-shek remains what he has always been since he assumed leadership, and the contempt with which he has been treated in Washington throughout this war does not weaken his position in China—rather it strengthens it. Many Chinese who might themselves criticize him more severely are rallying to him because he symbolizes China and when he is insulted China is insulted. This attitude is easy to understand. So would we behave if Roosevelt as President of the United States were belittled abroad.

Can the men around Chiang Kai-shek drive him to fascism? No; for they are not strong enough and the forces of democracy in the Chinese people are too strong. The much-talked-about Tai Li, with his secret service and the undoubted crimes that they have committed in some instances, is no new figure. He has been operating for many years. So have the famous Chen brothers. This is not to minimize these men, but it is to say that they are no new phenomena of the war. Nor are they more dangerous to democracy than some Americans could be in our own country. Such men exist in every nation. They are as heartily hated by many in China as they are here and as ardently supported by those few who share their prejudices.

In short, China is going through the same struggle that we are. She knows it. I have heard intelligent Chinese wonder at us for getting so stirred up over their internal condition when in their eyes our own is far more serious. They have no problem of race discrimination, no such division as there is between the South and the North in the United States.

Can China achieve democracy under Chiang Kai-shek? Yes; for Chiang will not be a decisive force in himself. He is a man of temper and some arrogance and he likes his own way as well as the others of the Big Four do, but he is preeminently a leader of men, not a dictator. He will lead the people to democracy if democracy is what they insist upon, for he will lead them, at all costs. In this he is more like Roosevelt than Stalin.

Will China go Communist? Not if the Chinese people can help it, and they can. Non-Communist Chinese today, those who are liberal as well as those less liberal, are determined that their country shall not be split, especially when one of the parts would owe its allegiance to Russia rather than to China. It is not a question with most Chinese as to whether the Communists are right or wrong or whether Chiang Kai-shek is right or wrong; it is that they will not tolerate two armies, two separate governments, two states; and between the Communist state and the Nationalist state, they feel that at least the Nationalist is Chinese and not linked with a foreign power. They feel that there is some hope of correcting the faults of the Government that is their own and none whatever of correcting the faults of one that is not Chinese.

It should be easy for most Americans to understand the common attitude of the Chinese against communism; it is exactly the same as our own. But the Chinese Communist Party has this advantage: it came into being at a time when China was in the midst of the transition from one form of government to another, and it was able to gather an army and get arms, at first from Russia. Our Communist Party might have done such a thing in our Civil War, had it come into being then.

In short, nothing about China can be understood without understanding the point in history at which China was when the war broke. She needed peace desperately for another decade in order to solidify her people's government. When we consider how dictatorial the powers become in any government during war the wonder is not that the Chinese Government is so dictatorial, but that it is not more so. Certainly Chiang Kai-shek is less dictatorial, generally speaking, in his powers than Roosevelt, Churchill, or Stalin. The Chineses people have not had the time to frame modern democratic laws for their own protection. Yet the Chinese people have exercised and do exercise an enormous mass power. Individuals suffer tyrannies, but the people have always risen against tyrants.

China suffers of course from her inability to propagandize herself. She has not the tradition of propaganda. The Chinese are ashamed to boast and sell themselves. They have always felt that what they did ought to speak for itself. Nor have they the financial resources of England, so that they can pour millions into America for the purposes of propaganda. China cannot buy our brains, or shape our ideas as she likes. She is therefore quite helpless in the face of competition.

This very helplessness and the sense of indignation which accompanies it, indignation at injustice and falsity, is today alienating Chinese whom we ought not to alienate. They are fully aware of much hardship endured at our hands which they have not, out of courtesy, wanted to mention. This courtesy is traditional and they cannot bring themselves to break it down, in spite of their own desperate need. But I might list here, for our information, certain things which no Chineses is able to forget, especially now when it has become fashionable to find fault with China.

Long before the loss of the Philippines, the East Indies, Malaya, and Burma, Chinese foresaw exactly what might happen and did happen and they offered to send aid especially to the Indies and later to Burma. The first offer was declined the second neglected until too late.

The Burma Road, China's own road built at heart-break cost in Chinese lives and a pace which western engineers said was impossible, was lost. A blockade so severe that few Americans even yet have any conception of what it has meant to China was the result. Chinese know that there was much corruption connected with the Burma Road traffic. They would have been glad to eliminate it but they were fighting a war. With the corruption now going on in great cartels in the West even among our own people the less said about the corruption on the Burma Road among truck drivers and local officials the better perhaps. At least the principles of incorruptibility should be applied everywhere alike.

The blockade of China meant first a terrible inflation; second, no more war materials. President Roosevelt's sad jocularity only shocked the Chinese people when he said that more was being flown over the Himalayas than had ever gone over the Burma Road. We had never sent very much over the Burma Road.

The attitude of our American military men in China, with a few noble exceptions, has been insulting and arrogant toward the Chinese, or so the Chinese have felt. It may be only a difference in habits of courtesy but the Chinese have felt, almost without exception, that the Americans have come over as foreigners, have tended to discount everything that the Chinese have done, have overlooked the facts of Chinese inflation and blockade, circumstances for which the Chinese do not feel themselves responsible, have not considered that Chinese armies have fought without the heavy weapons and the modern equipment for which they hoped. The Americans, the Chinese say, tend to want to shove them aside and do everything in their own way, ignoring the experience China has gained in holding the Japanese for 7 years.

China has benefited little from lend-lease because of the blockade. The two Liberty ships given her have been almost useless. But China has had to feed an increasing number of American soldiers on her soil in payment for lend-lease. Aside from such payment, the very providing of the food has been a heavy burden. An egg in China today costs $3. Yet they reckon that every American man must be allowed six eggs a day, including those in the desserts which he demands. The Chinese have never been a heavy beef-eating people but our men must have an average of a pound and a half of beef alone every day. There are no beef cattle in China as such. The result is that cattle used for farm labor have had to be requisitioned to the final dismay of the people. The governors of provinces where American men are stationed have sent in protests to Chungking, asking how the land is to be plowed. But Chungking is trying to carry on.

The Chinese were given to understand by Washington they thought direct from President Roosevelt that the vast and extensive airfields in inner China which they have prepared for the use of our Air Force would be paid for. Millions of laborers have had to be paid and fed somehow. To date no money has come from America for this.

The Chinese were not prepared for the youthful irrepressibility of American young men nor were they prepared for their tendencies to get drunk often and thoroughly nor for their general behavior toward women. "We did not know how young you were" has been their polite Chinese way of expressing it publicly.

But why continue the list? It is a long one and something can be said on the other side as the Chinese are quick to see for themselves. "We know we have no electric shadows (movies) no jumping-places (dance halls) not soft ice-cream parlors (soda fountains) and so we are very dull for your soldiers to our many sorrows" one Chinese put it to me nicely not long ago.

Added to all else now is the heap of rash criticism which magazines and newspaper writers are hastening to put out as the latest thing on China. Where is our much-vaunted friendship for China that we accept this sort of thing so easily with so little search for the truth? Most of all where is our practical common sense that we do not see the danger to ourselves of alienating China from us as we fall into the well-oiled traps of propaganda for continuing the white mans' rule in Asia?

The great division between England and ourselves in Asia is that we have until now wanted a strong China and a weak Japan whereas England wants a weak China and inevitably a strong Japan.

But why not be American?

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Dayton Daily News:

ANCIENT TECHNIQUE

As a prosecutor of criminals Governor Dewey is familiar, of course, with the ancient technique of the hard-pressed thief. To divert attention from himself he dashes after some innocent man crying to the crowd, "stop, thief."

President Roosevelt and Cordell Hull were begging for international cooperation, open to all nations of good will, far back in the days when Thomas Dewey was saying, as he said in a speech in Milwaukee, center of isolationism, in 1940:

"We know we cannot possibly remain strong and free unless we reject every entanglement in the affairs of Europe."

That old isolationism is embarrassing in these days when the dullest mind can perceive that it was such isolationism which, first, brought on the present war and, second, opposed and delayed the efforts to be ready for the war when it came. The politician caught in such a fix has but one recourse, to attack someone else for his own offense, hoping in the ensuing confusion to make his own escape. The trick works if the people are sufficiently gullible.

In this case the trick is so obvious as to be comical. It still looks as if the coming political campaign would be comic opera, not tragedy, as the prophets have feared it might be.

Votes by Hon. Elmer Thomas, of Oklahoma, on Major Bills and Other Measures Relating to Agriculture, Labor, and National Defense, and on Vetoed Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a tabulation of votes cast by me on major bills, resolutions, and amendments with respect to agriculture, labor, and national defense, and on vetoed bills.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AGRICULTURE—H. R. 3835—FARM RELIEF BILL TO INCREASE AGRICULTURAL PURCHASING POWER

Provided for direct agricultural relief by authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to force increased farm prices either through allocating production or through leasing of land for the purpose of withdrawing it from production.

Arranged for farm-mortgage relief by granting authorization for the refinancing of farm mortgages at 4½ percent interest through the issuance of not more than $2,000,000,000 in Government bonds, the interest of which—but not the principal—would be guaranteed by the Government.

Authorized the President (in the so-called Thomas amendment) to devalue the gold content of the dollar as much as 50 percent and, for 6 months from the passage of the act, to accept up to $200,000,000 of silver at a price not exceeding 50 cents an ounce in payment for war debts due from any foreign government to the United States.

[NOTE.—When this act was approved most farm prices were the lowest on record. Under the act the gold dollar was revalued. Silver certificates were expanded and additional money was placed in circulation. The effects of this act were twofold: First, a general rise in farm prices, increasing agricultural income by billions of dollars; and, second, through the devaluation of the gold dollar a profit was made for the Treasury of over $2,800,000,000.)

On passage of bill Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (April 28, 1933, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2562).

SOIL CONSERVATION AND PARITY PROGRAM—H. R. 8505

Vote on the conference report on H. R. 8505, to provide for the conservation of natural soil resources and to provide an adequate and balanced flow of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (February 14, 1938, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1881).

SOIL CONSERVATION

Vote on the passage of the bill to make further provision for the conservation and proper utilization of the soil resources of the Nation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (February 15, 1936, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2165).

AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES—S. 2255

Vote on the passage of the bill to establish a policy with respect to the disposition of agricultural commodities acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (February 25, 1942, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1624).

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL—H. R. 2481

Vote on the committee amendment proposing to authorize the expenditure of $400,000,000 instead of $300,000,000, as proposed by the House, for Soil Conservation and the Domestic Allotment Act. (The so-called benefits payment under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.)

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (June 8, 1943, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 5474).

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL—H. R. 2481

Vote on the committee amendment to the agricultural appropriations bill making appropriations for loans, grants, and rural rehabilitation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (June 10, 1943, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 5641).

CONTINUANCE OF COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION—H. R. 3477

Vote on the passage of the bill to continue the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the United States, to revise the basis of annual appraisal of its assets, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (February 11, 1944, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1624).

FARM LABOR—HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 96

Vote on the conference report making an appropriation to assist in providing a supply and distribution of farm labor for the calendar year 1943.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (April 16, 1943, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 3467).

PRICE CONTROL—H. R. 5990

Vote on the amendment of Senator O'MAHONEY as modified, to the committee amendment, providing for a parity price on agricultural commodities.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (January 10, 1942, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 230).

PRICE CONTROL—H. R. 5990

Vote on the amendment of Senator BANKHEAD to the committee amendment, providing that no action shall be taken under this act by the Administrator with respect to any agricultural commodity without the prior approval of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (January 9, 1942, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 189).

EXTENSION OF EMERGENCY PRICE CONTROL ACT OF 1942—SUBSIDIES—S. 1764

Vote on the committee amendment providing that after June 30, 1945, neither the Price Administrator nor the Reconstruction Finance Corporation nor any other Government corporation shall make subsidy payments unless the money required for such subsidy has been appropriated by Congress.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (June 5, 1944, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 5300).

SUPPLEMENTAL PRICE CONTROL—SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 161

Vote on the amendment of Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma proposing that parity prices and comparable prices for any agricultural commodity shall be determined as authorized by existing law but shall also include all farm labor.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma voted "aye" (September 29, 1942, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7594).

NEUTRALITY ACT OF 1939—HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 306

Vote on the passage of the joint resolution to preserve the neutrality and the peace of the United States and to secure the safety of its citizens and their interests.

Full Employment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. W. LEE O'DANIEL

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD chapter XI, entitled "Full Employment," from the book Challenge to Freedom, written by Henry M. Wriston.

I have obtained an estimate from the Public Printer, who advises that the cost of publishing this article will be $124.80, which slightly exceeds the amount under the rule of the Joint Committee on Printing, but, regardless of this fact, I ask unanimous consent that this article may be published notwithstanding the rule.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAPTER XI. FULL EMPLOYMENT

No post-war objective is mentioned more frequently than full employment. Every official statement on the subject seems to regard it as an absolute essential. For example, the President said on January 7, 1943: "The people at home and the people at the front—men and women—are wondering about the third freedom—freedom from want. To them it means that when they are mustered out, when war production is converted to the economy of peace, they will have the right to expect full employment—for themselves and for all able-bodied men and women in America who want to work."

This concept deserves far more analysis, as a primary objective, than it has yet had. The London Economist has pointed up the issue very sharply: "For if one thing has been made abundantly clear, it is that the mass of people in every country rate full employment, and the individual security it brings, higher than almost any political object. If liberal democracy is not compatible with full employment then it is liberal democracy that will go."

Within the scope of the alternative mentioned, no statement could be more lucid; the choice is defined with a blunt candor that leaves nothing to be desired. There is, however, a second alternative that is implied, but slurred over, if not concealed. If liberal democracy should go, what would take its place? Politics abhors a vacuum, so some other system of government would replace democracy. The real alternative, therefore, in this deceptively clear analysis, is between democracy and free enterprise on the one hand and totalitarianism and a managed economy on the other.

That is an issue which had best be faced. Yet it is seldom drawn into the clear light of day. In over-high-lighting economic security, political consequences are cast into a deep shadow, and virtually hidden. Even in high quarters freedom from want is stressed with no parallel emphasis upon the political freedoms to which the Bill of Rights gave such clear priority. Perhaps that is why it is currently suggested that Bill-of-Rights democracy has been "overemphasized." Language has been used which seemed to interpret freedom merely as more nourishment, better clothing and housing for the "underprivileged third," with very little accent upon the intangibles. Indeed, it has been boldly said by Vice President WALLACE that freedom could have no meaning to a hungry man: "Men and women cannot be really free until they have plenty to eat."

If a balanced diet is the indispensable preamble to liberty, the Pilgrims must have been wrong after all, for they fled from plenty to scarcity in order to secure freedom. Sentimental materialism makes mockery of all the heroes whose lives have shown the falsity of its assumption. It neglects utterly the contemporary heroism of the Chinese, who would rather abandon home and trek to western China, enduring terrible hardships, than be fed and submissive in Japan's shoddy "co-prosperity sphere."

Freedom from want is a good thing under certain circumstances—to wit, if it is earned, if it does not lead to stagnancy, if it does not deliver man into bondage. Those "ifs" are important; they are not mere rhetoric. Because of their vital importance, no great civilization ever did or ever can make full employment its predominant objective. To do so is to put the accent on material goods rather than virtue. If we encourage men to desire things before all else, they will soon discover that things do not bring the good life. No authentic prophet ever made so crass a preachment. If it is accepted now as a war aim, all hope of peace should be abandoned.

Mass unemployment constitutes an economic and social problem of great importance. It must, and can, be met. By developing mobility of skills to match technological change, by insurance payments during the change-over, by many other means the harsh impact of technological progress and cyclical sags can be cushioned. Those adjustments can and must be made. But to lurch to the utter extreme of "full employment" is not to make a realistic attack upon a serious issue; it misstates the problem in such terms that it becomes insoluble without destroying both free enterprise and democracy. We can make progress toward better situations only by more careful definitions of critical issues, not by escapist slogans that are certain to destroy the very institutions we profess to defend.

It is clear that full employment can be achieved—at a price. Mussolini proved it. Men were added to the Government pay roll as bureaucrats, fighters, munitions workers, land reclaimers—and the list may be extended indefinitely. It produced an unbalanced budget; the deficits would gratify the most ardent advocate of deficit spending. The monetary system became distorted and artificial. The "rotting carcass" of liberty was trodden underfoot; there was no overemphasis upon any bill of rights. The individual was swallowed up into the state. And the standard of living fell.

Hitler achieved full employment. In doing so he marched his nation down the same broad road. The Army and Navy grew; all the forms of industrialism which their needs stimulated were made to boom. Work camps were established under the guise of training. Thousands went to prisons—to security, since there one is assured of housing, clothing, food, and leisure. Other thousands went to concentration camps—or the security of the grave. Rugged individualism was no longer an evil; all individualism was submerged in statism. Neither labor nor learning knew freedom; the church was enchained. German money became one of the wonders of the world, a miracle in levitation. Under full employment guns were put before butter—the standard of living fell.

As for America, John Maynard Keynes, the chief exponent of political manipulation of the economy to produce full employment, insisted that deficit spending failed to produce the desired result because the spending was upon too niggardly a scale. Less than 6 months before Pearl Harbor he said, "It is, it seems, politically impossible for a capitalistic democracy to organize expenditure on the scale necessary to make the grand experiment which would prove my case—except in war conditions." War came and the "grand experiment" had its demonstration, proving what was known all along, namely that full employment is possible, at a price. But the price is the restriction of liberty and a lower standard of living. We accept those consequences in order to win the war. Do we want them permanently?

Before we accept full employment as the panacea for the ills of our economic and social order, there are questions which must be answered satisfactorily. One must ask, Full employment for what? There was full employment when the pyramids were built under the lash of the Pharaohs, but piling stone on stone for a nonproductive memorial meant no rise in the standard of living; such a result would be a contradiction in terms. Even full employment in the construction of a modern industrial city may bring a lowered standard of living. It is quite possible that under conditions of full employment nearly as many people lost their lives as a consequence of over investment and under consumption during the reconstruction of Stalingrad as a modern industrial city as lost their lives in the battles which reduced it to a heap of rubble. The builders worked in the belief that they were starving to greatness. But when the industrial plant had been completed the standard of living of many of the Russian common people had deteriorated even in comparison with the unsatisfactory economic life under the czars.

One must ask, full employment by whom? All the prescriptions for full employment ultimately end in public ownership. Indeed that is the upshot of the grand experiment, though its exponents shrink from making the point clear. If men work only for the state, liberty is gone, because the right to strike is destroyed, the right to change employers is lost, the right of initiative is impaired, and the fruitful consequences of one's labor do not return many fold. The W. P. A. workers were sternly reminded by the President that they could not strike against the Government. The employees of the city-acquired subways in New York discovered that the loss of the right to strike was part of the price of public ownership. The more public ownership expands, the more restricted the rights of labor become; if full employment is the duty of the state, the rights of labor are doomed.

Full employment by the intervention of political power is based upon defeatist assumptions about our economy. So the state must subsidize consumption, a long road indeed, and one which even bold social engineers hesitate to follow. As an alternative the state must invest in less and less productive enterprises. The political consequences are as disastrous as the economic. The Economist admits the dangers, which have already been exemplified in many nations: "Large-scale state financing of investment involves the stability of the monetary system; and a gradual spreading of state control, by way of capital investment, into every corner of the economic system puts the whole community at the mercy of any political adventurer who can capture the political machine." That means dictatorship. The descent to hell still appears to be easy.

In the third place, one must ask, full employment at what cost? It cannot be at the cost of keeping obsolete businesses or obsolete occupations or obsolete communities alive. No economy can support those burdens, and political magic is potent only for a brief period. Yet that was exactly the philosophy of full employment expressed by a resolution of a labor group in Oregon, which asserted it did not "believe in closing factories simply because they cannot be operated at lucrative profits."

Depressions weed out the weak, the inefficient, the submarginal producer. Sometimes the weeding seems cruel and haphazard, but weeding there must be; so far no gentle method of condemning obsolescent industry to death has been found. Competition is the best method yet discovered; it is at once the greatest stimulus to efficiency and the most effective eliminator of the unfit. It is the best road to lower costs and more goods for consumption. Public ownership is the poorest instrument for weeding out obsolete plants, industries, and skills, for political pressure resists economic law. That is why without competition we shall have, as one of the most persuasive exponents of managed economy has admitted, "full employment at the cost of progress, full employment at the present unsatisfactory standard of living, full employment at the expense of welfare." These questions regarding the real meaning of full employment reveal very clearly that we are being offered a false goal. Full employment is a glittering phrase; indeed it glitters so brightly that its precise outline is difficult to define. Only under conditions of war does it actually mean what the words imply; then and then only do we try to employ youth and even children, as the Government is now urging the schools to send their children into the fields. Under war conditions alone do we seek to induce women to leave the home for the factory. Only under such tremendous stress do we call back those who have retired and urge them again to pick up the load. All these facts indicate that full employment is a political slogan rather than an economic or social program, unless we want war as our normal mode of life.

We have complete evidence that the phrase is a misnomer in the fact that its strongest advocates argue vigorously for unemployment insurance. Such forms of insurance are essential, but assuredly they would be needless if political methods could really achieve full employment. The validity of the plea for insurance lies precisely in the fact that some unemployment is unavoidable. The object of insurance is to hedge that risk. If political methods could abolish the risk, there would be no need for the hedge.

When we come to examine full employment carefully, we observe that there are people whom, on grounds of humanity, we do not wish to employ. There are the very young and the very old; how young is a matter of judgment and degree, and how old is in like manner a matter of judgment and degree. Opinion has varied greatly on these points in the past and will continue to vary in the future. Those people we do not want to employ, partly for humanitarian reasons, but also—and this must not be overlooked—for reasons of efficiency.

There are other groups whom, on grounds of efficiency alone, we do not wish to employ; the insane, the morons, the hopelessly inefficient. These we do not bar from employment for humane reasons; they must be supplied with occupations in any event as a means of therapy or just to pass the time. They are barred from employment upon the sound ground that they do not produce enough to pay the cost.

If one is thinking of producing wealth for public use, if he is looking to the welfare of society, he must consider capacity and aptitude, skill and training, industry and character, disposition and temperament, since all those qualities markedly affect the costs of production. But once that is admitted, the whole foundation for so-called full employment is gone, because it shows that the objective is production, the creation of wealth. Once it is conceded that the cost of the labor relative to its product must be brought into the picture, a different criterion has been established.

If the costs of government in the social-service state are to be borne, if the common man is to have larger wealth in usable goods, production must gain in efficiency. There is no other source of either the necessary taxes or the necessary goods. The world is familiar with more efficient tools—with the technological changes which permit an increase in product relative to investment. Equally important is more efficient work, an increase in product relative to labor; if it were not so, there could never be great advances in wages, hours could never be shortened without depriving the mass of mankind not only of comforts and conveniences but also of necessities.

In a world where too many lack necessities, and where the use of comforts and conveniences is indefinitely expansible, any effort, on behalf of "full employment," to reverse this progress toward efficiency in the use both of machines and of labor is hostile to the welfare of society. Technological change produces its own problems—especially the problem of retraining workers drawn from obsolete jobs, insuring their subsistence in the interim, and relocating them. But there is no solution in human affairs that offers escape from every problem. The impoverishment of all by blocking efficiency in the interest of stagnant stability would be a false security indeed. It would create many additional problems, and puzzles far more difficult of solution.

From still another point of view, full employment is a political fantasy rather than an economic or social goal. It assumes or requires impossible conditions. To achieve full employment it would be necessary to have demand for an industry and within an industry distributed in the precise pattern of the labor available for that industry. For example, there would have to be exactly the right amount of demand for machine tools to occupy all the machinists. That has never happened. In a world as complex as ours, it never could happen except as a momentary accident; certainly it could not be "planned that way." There is an alternative possibility, also incredible, that the skills of each individual worker would be so various that he could fit immediately into any one of a number of trades, occupations, or jobs. Because both alternatives are impossible we have simultaneous surpluses and shortages of labor. They exist right now, even with the exigent demands of war.

Geographically the pattern necessary for full employment is yet more complicated. Demand must be regionally distributed in the same pattern as the workers; again, that has never happened except by accident. The only alternative involves grave hardship, which full employment is supposed to banish: the skilled worker must become a perpetual migrant and create the kind of housing problem that now bedevils some war-production centers. The failure to achieve these incredibles is a further explanation of the fact that even today, in the midst of great demand, there is unemployment side by side with labor scarcity. The latest report of the Social Security Board reveals that 3,000,000 men and women drew some unemployment benefits, and in even this year of mounting industrial activity nearly 32,000,000 weeks of unemployment were compensated.

No peace economy could hope to fulfill all the requirements of so unreal a political slogan as full employment. To promise what cannot be performed is to invite discontent and pyramid troubles upon tomorrow. Having suffered the profound disillusionment of grandiose hopes for a new world after the last war, the Nation was plunged into cynicism and escapism. We should have learned from that bitter experience to promise attainable goals. The promise of more assures harsh reaction.

It becomes clear, therefore, that full employment is not the answer to the world's problem. Even when approximated, it brings other troubles in its train. Under present conditions there is a tremendous outcry against absenteeism, which is thought to be a new development. It is, however, an inherent characteristic of full employment. There are many people whose desires for relaxation and change are of a character that unfits them for immediate effort thereafter. Under conditions of full employment they naturally gratify those desires and absenteeism is the consequence.

When the pressure of employment is so great that it is necessary to take those low in the scale of capacity, aptitude, ambition, and energy, there is bound to be an increase in absenteeism. Others, who in periods of slack employment hesitate to take a day off when they do not feel well, are free to take better care of themselves; even if their ills are imaginary, they cause absenteeism nonetheless. We should strive toward high employment. That still leaves a stimulus to effort. But to guarantee full employment is to encourage irresponsibility; it removes any incentive to effort by transferring responsibility from the individual to the state.

Labor turn-over is a second characteristic of full employment which reduces efficiency. Like absenteeism, it is not essentially a war-time development but merely a normal concomitant of full employment. When every man is guaranteed a job, he can leave his task for any trivial reason because another is assured—perhaps a better one. The incentive to stay on the job is removed. Back in the boom days this same tendency to very heavy turn-over was manifested. Indeed the figures are astonishing.

Moreover, if we insist upon full employment even though economically costly and if, on the same humanitarian basis, we seek to provide for every contingency of every citizen—"assurance that will extend from the cradle to the grave," we may be certain that collateral troubles like absenteeism and turnover will be progressively heightened. Without hazards, there is no encouragement to caution or industry or thrift.

As we pile up burdens for industry to carry, it may be that the effort to employ everybody will increase the costs of production so greatly as to make the economy of the Nation less viable in the world market. That would mean a return to isolationism, to another sacrifice of international cooperation for a "sound internal economic system." It would mean that we had learned nothing whatever from two world wars in one generation. That would make full employment still more burdensome domestically, and result in a lowered standard of living rather than in the promised economic security. Then political security would be a farce. The program would be merely a prelude to a Third World War.

Full employment, like everything else which belongs in a secondary position, misleads us if we put it in the first place. As one of the British labor leaders, Herbert Morrison, has expressed it: "We cannot rouse ourselves and others to the heights of achievement with the slogan of minimum subsistence for all. We have got to provide it, but not regard it as an end in itself. If we make it our ideal and let it hypnotize us, not only shall we relapse into fatty degeneration of the spirit but we shall find that, by one means or another, we have lost even the security at which we aimed so exclusively." Full employment as a goal, therefore, is illusory. It lures people into the grip of the state, and they lose more than they gain; flypaper is honey sweet but it is deadly.

Full employment contains an essential incoherence which cannot be corrected. The right to a job is an individual right; it cannot be otherwise, for the job is assigned to a man, not to society. But the obligation to supply that job, under the presuppositions of this modern slogan, is a responsibility of society. Rights and duties belong together; if they are separated, chaos ensues. If responsibilities are assigned to society, then the rights of individuals inevitably wither away. That is why, when the emphasis takes this current twist, the Bill of Rights seems to have been overemphasized along with political democracy.

As a primary goal full employment is self-defeating. It starts as a manifestation of sentimental humanitarianism. In seeking to escape the realities of the world, it sacrifices human liberty for a false promise of material benefits. No country has ever achieved it by political intervention without going totalitarian and becoming warlike. Even then its success is transitory. The longest periods of relatively full employment in any nation have been under an expanding free economy. As a byproduct of ingenuity, skill, industry, thrift, courage, and faith, it becomes a rich dividend. When it is undertaken as a political program, it brings with it evils which, when experienced, are seen to be even worse than recurring periods of partial employment. It is likely, on the material side, to lower the standard of living, and on the spiritual side to destroy initiative and impair the spirit of freedom.

As full employment is a false goal economically, so also it is deficient from a psychological point of view. The men in the armed forces want something more than a job when they return to civilian life. President Roosevelt touched the point in one short sentence in his message of January 7, 1943: "They are eager to face the risks inherent in our system of free enterprise." The men want opportunity. They do not want, all of them, to be employees. They want to set up their own businesses; they want the adventure of creating something new, distinctively their own. Jobs and job security will not satisfy them, nor should they be content with such limited aims.

If they save our liberties by hazarding life they have a right to expect Government to restore the conditions of free enterprise. They have a right to tax laws that are not punitive in temper; they have a right to see bureaucratic red tape reduced, questionnaires restricted, regulations simplified. All the nagging, petty, and wearisome manifestations of the itch to meddle in legitimate business need to be curbed. Government must lay aside the fallacy of the "mature economy"; it must recover faith in the infinite potentialities of invention, development, and progress. Then its function again will be "not to interfere but to assist in the development of industry."

This idea was well expressed in the final report of T. N. E. C.: "The objective of Government should be to foster and stimulate free enterprise rather than to supersede it. In other words, democracy's task is to take those precautions which will keep both business and Government democratic. On the broad scale, therefore, this committee recommends the maintenance of free, competitive enterprise by the effective suppression of the restrictive practices which have always been recognized as evil. * * * If the opportunity for the employment of idle men and idle money is to be found in a free, private enterprise system then, obviously, we must find the way to stimulate that enterprise by encouraging the investment of private savings in new private enterprise."

Appraisement of the Chicago Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Appraisement of the Chicago Convention," delivered by the Honorable Josephus Daniels, of Raleigh, N. C., to the Kiwanis Club of Raleigh, on August 18, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Enough time has elapsed since the Chicago convention to permit a just appraisement. As the delegates gathered the barometer registered "hot and warmer" and the weather clerk asked what was in store answered: "Look out for squalls." There were evidences of Texas "northerns," tropical storms from the Gulf via Louisiana and Mississippi—portents of rough political weather. At Charleston Harbor storm signals were displayed. There were dark clouds from Harlem, cold breezes from northern big cities, blasts from farm belts due to remembrance of low prices, bugs and worms, political, that destroyed prosperity prior to 1933, pelting rain from C. I. O. politicians, typhoons from reactionaries, and like downpours from other sources, not to speak of the cyclonic hailstones from the Chicago isolationist press. A fog was reported off the New England coast from Buzzards Bay to Campobello. Delegates were told to look out for "bolts from the blue" as dissatisfied Democrats were preparing to march over to the Republican tent.

Such were the forecasts in the days before the notable deliverances by Governor Kerr and Senator JACKSON called the Democrats back to first principles, the platform with the spirit of Jefferson and Wilson lifted Democrats to the heights, the great message of President Roosevelt summoned the Democratic Party to the tragic unfinished task of organizing a warless world after winning the war, and the nomination of a true liberal for Vice President. The wind storms cleared the atmosphere. Unity and determination not to lose the war or jeopardize the peace marked the end of a convention animated by the old-time Democratic devotion to the four freedoms and a determination to save the Republic from another Harding-Coolidge-Hoover collapse. There were no minority reports, no bolting, no division, no defeatism. The Cassandras were routed. The predicted cloud storms lifted and the sun of promise shone as the cooling breezes from Lake Michigan drove away the dire prediction of squalls that had appeared on the horizon. The militant Democracy, in heart to heart exchanges, found their differences were very small and their agreements so great that with a world on fire they heeded the command: "Close ranks and attack the foe."

The outstanding lesson taught at the Chicago convention was that the national Democracy cannot be bludgeoned by threats from any quarter. By its every action it refused to let any group issue orders, write its platform, or name its candidates. That stand in Chicago and for all time is notice to one and all that the National Democratic Party cannot be driven in any direction by any special classes. By its acts it proclaimed that today, as in its past and for the future, Democracy stands free and is true to its mission to do equal and exact justice to all Americans. Some—a minority—in the deep South rendered a disservice to the South, when they gave notice of a bolt unless all their demands were granted; some Negroes from the North, who had quit the Republican Party because it had fed them nothing but sweet wind for 50 years, threatened a return to the husks they had fed upon in the Republican Party if all the planks they presented were not incorporated in the platform; some women conditioned their support upon acceptance of particular planks they presented; some reactionaries suggested going over to the Republican Party if the Democratic Party remained militantly liberal; some bosses of great cities declared they could not pile up a great majority if their advice went unheeded. These and others thought to stampede the convention to their particular pattern.

The constitutional right of petition was guaranteed to any and all who wished to be heard. It was the best evidence of democracy at work seen in our Republic. All were heard and their views received consideration. However, no section, no class, no race, no faction, dictated the platform or the candidates. Those who came, threatening to bolt or to sabotage the ticket unless their peculiar views were accepted, thought better of it and remained to accept the arbitrament of brothers of a common faith.

Some of the violent, impotent threats irritated, as for example, the declaration printed in all the papers that an ultimatum had gone out from one or more organized bodies, but not truly representative of their membership, that no southern man should be nominated for Vice President. What was the answer of the convention to that blatant declaration? The convention gave the nomination of Vice President to a southern Senator whose father was a Confederate soldier.

The impression has gone abroad that the South was discriminated against in the home of its fathers. If no southerner living east of the Mississippi had a chance of nomination for Vice President, it should be remembered that these States had so many candidates that none received more than a handful of votes. Our own North Carolina candidate lost nothing by the silly ukase that the convention ought not to nominate a southerner. There was no objection to Broughton on any ground and his record as Governor and eloquent defender of the faith made him an ideal candidate. However, he got no vote other than from his own State, except part of South Carolina on one ballot. That was not due to hostility to a southern candidate, seeing the son of a Confederate soldier was made the nominee. The same division in the South gave even a smaller vote to most of the numerous candidates from the South. And why? It was not because the convention as a whole had any sectional bias. It was entirely due to the fact that there was only one contest in the convention—and that was over the Vice Presidency, and it has no sectional appeal.

It would not have been a Democratic convention if there had not been at least one real scrap. Republicans take orders from bosses in a smoke-filled room. Not so Democrats. If, as sometimes happens, bosses seek to dictate a nomination they find that if they win at all they know they have been in a fight, and if victory come their way the minority is bloody but unbowed.

Before the convention was called to order it became apparent that a battle royal was preparing and that the only contest would be between those who paraded with banners, shouting, "We want Wallace," and those who, for one reason or another, didn't want Wallace. That opposition had several angles, none sectional. Some leaders said Wallace would weaken the ticket, some Southerners thought he was too friendly to labor and to the Negro, some city people thought he was an agrarian and a radical, and some just wanted a new name on the ticket. A plurality, as shown on the first ballot, favored Wallace because of his forthright, downright devotion to those New Deal policies which lifted the country out of the bog, and because they felt his devotion to liberal policies deserved approval. In the final result, TRUMAN owed his nomination to the vote of delegates from most Southern States, which added to his own strong support, gave him a majority. Neither TRUMAN nor any other man could have won who had not sincerely and consistently supported the forward-looking measures of the Roosevelt administration.

No tepid conservative, no timid or rash reactionary, no opponent of militant liberalism could have made first base in the race.

The convention was of one mind when it came to nominating Franklin Roosevelt as its candidate for President. His record as Chief Executive in peace and as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in war has caused him to be recognized as the foremost leader in a world of great men. The people at home—from Portland, Maine, to Portland, Oreg., and from Tallahassee to Tacoma—had drafted Mr. Roosevelt to stay on the job until both peace and war have been won and undergirded. The enthusiasm which greeted his nomination and the sincere applause given his radio speech of acceptance demonstrated the hold he has upon the confidence and affection of the people of America.

The platform is the chart of the voyage. It is crystal clear for navigating the country and the world into a safe harbor. It is the shortest in political history and covered every hope and aspiration of people with a forward look. Its appeal is to all who wish a country in which every man has an equal chance and all peoples enjoy the "four freedoms." It makes its appeal to all citizens who believe in the philosophy of the founder of the party, "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." It is no covert for the timid, the selfish, the profiteers, the isolationists.

The Electoral College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix to the RECORD an able article by Justice Homer Hoch of the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas. The article is entitled "Electing a President of the United States."

Justice Hoch is well qualified to discuss this important subject. He represented the Fourth Congressional District of Kansas in the House of Representatives for 12 years, and was a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Since then he has served as chairman of the State Corporation Commission of Kansas, and is regarded as a strong member of the State Supreme Court.

In this article Justice Hoch points out the defects of the present system of electing President and Vice President by the electoral college, particularly the requirement that all the electoral votes of each State shall be cast for the candidates receiving the highest vote in that State, so the minority vote cast in each State is not represented at all in the electoral college.

His remedy is not to go to the length of electing the President and Vice President by popular vote. But he would require that the electors from each State cast the votes of that State in proportion to the votes received by the respective candidates, but on a fractional rather than a strictly percentage basis. I recommend the article to the Senate for consideration.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELECTING A PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

(By Justice Homer Hoch)

Few people, apparently, regard the method provided by the Constitution for electing a President as a matter of much importance. Comment on the subject consists largely of facetious reference, every 4 years, to the electoral college. And yet, in the opinion of most students of government, this part of our constitutional machinery is not only undemocratic but has very serious defects fraught with real public dangers. To these defects and potential dangers we give little or no concern, our Presidential elections having ridden along, in the main, on fairly even keel. Until some emergency arises in a time of tense public feeling which may precipitate a political crisis we just can't be bothered. It is quite like the traditional Irishman's leaky roof, which didn't need fixing while the weather was fair and couldn't be fixed when it was raining.

Briefly stated, the serious defects of the present system are: First, a President may be elected—and has been—not only without having received the most popular votes but without having received as many electoral votes as his principal opponent; second, the votes of the minority in each State are not only uncounted for the candidate for whom they are cast, but in effect are actually counted for the opposing candidate; third, the provisions for electing a President in case no candidate receives a majority of the electoral votes are so defective that an impasse might easily occur, with no means provided in the Constitution for securing a President.

Debates in the Constitutional Convention related almost as much to the methods of selecting personnel as they did to the principles upon which the new Federal Government was to be established. And wisely so. Whatever the form of government, it must be administered by men, and while a government bad in substance cannot be sanctified by administration a government good in principle may be perverted into tyranny by the men who run it. It was only natural, therefore, that having drawn the outlines of a central government of limited, delegated powers, with separate and coordinate branches for lawmaking, law interpreting, and law enforcing, the Constitutional Convention should debate at great length the methods of selecting those who were to exercise the various Federal powers.

It is, of course, out of the question to attempt here a review of those debates. The principal decisions which were reached as to the legislative and judicial branches are familiar to nearly all. The National Legislature was to be bicameral—with one Chamber directly representing the people and the other representing the sovereign States. Without this major compromise between the large and small States, which gave representation in the House on the basis of population and gave each State the same representation in the Senate, the Constitution probably would not have been ratified. The principle of this compromise was carried over into the election of a President by giving to each State one electoral vote for each of its Representatives and its two Senators. Two important changes have been made as to election of Representatives and Senators. The Constitution originally provided, in effect, that in the apportionment of Representatives among the States a slave should be counted as three-fifths of a person. With the abolition of slavery this strange political and mathematical provision was formally eliminated by the fourteenth amendment. Senators were elected by the State legislatures until 1913, when the seventeenth amendment, providing for their election by popular vote, was adopted. As to the judiciary, one of the principal decisions of the framers of the Constitution was to fortify independence of judicial action by a life tenure for Federal judges. Whether this provision is a wise one has long been a question for debate. These and other interesting questions have more or less pertinent relation to our immediate subject, but permissible length of this paper prevents their discussion here.

We come to the subject of this paper—the method provided for electing the executive head of the Federal Government. Few subjects before the convention aroused such extended and acrimonious debate. At least four or five proposals were seriously considered. The so-called Virginia plan, the Pinckney plan, and the New Jersey plan all proposed that the President be elected by Congress. George Mason, of Virginia, one of the most active members of the convention, and a man with a distinguished record as a patriot and statesman, said that it was "as unnatural to refer the proper character for Chief Magistrate to the people as it would be to refer a trial of colors to a blind man." And because of his dissatisfaction with the Constitution as adopted, he became one of three framers who refused to sign it, and together with Patrick Henry led the fight against its ratification by Virginia.

The Convention first adopted a resolution providing that Congress should name electors who in turn should select a President. Two days later the Convention reversed its action and provided for election of the electors by the State legislatures. A week later it again reversed itself and passed a resolution providing for election of the President directly by Congress, with a 7-year term. Finally the electoral-college system was adopted as we now have it, except for one important change, to be presently noted, which was made by the twelfth amendment in 1804. The plan was taken from a similar provision in the Constitution of Maryland. It was designed largely for a nonpartisan government—political parties not then having fully developed. Apparently the primary principle which the framers thought they were adopting was the selection of a President by a group of men especially fitted for the task. These electors were to select a President much as a board of directors selects a manager for a corporation. Alexander Hamilton wrote in the Federalist: "It is equally desirable that the immediate election should be made by men most capable of analyzing the qualities adapted to the station and acting under circumstances favorable to deliberation, and to a judicious combination of all the reasons and inducements that were proper to govern their choice. A small number of persons, selected by their fellow citizens from the general mass, will be most likely to possess the information and discernment requisite to so complicated an investigation."

It is one of the interesting developments of our constitutional history that without any change in the law this fundamental principle soon ceased to operate. The electors became mere instruments for registering the popular vote of the States. Nevertheless the Hamilton theory was the one upon which the electoral system was based. After Washington's two terms, when Jefferson and Adams were the leading contenders, three electors who were members of the Jefferson Party voted for Adams and yet their act aroused no public resentment. But the bitter controversies and personal animosities engendered in the 4 years of John Adams' term—largely by his temper and ineptitude in dealing with those around him—brought a radical change in sentiment concerning the election of a President.

This turmoil terminated in the bitter Jefferson and Burr controversy in Congress. The Constitution provided that the electors should meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons. No separate vote for President and Vice President was cast. These ballots were to be sealed and transmitted to the President of the Senate and by him opened and counted in the presence of the Senate and the House. The person receiving the highest vote was to be President and the next highest to be Vice President. At the first election Washington received 69 votes and John Adams 34, the latter thus becoming Vice President. In the election of 1796 Adams became President on a margin of only three votes over Jefferson, who became Vice President. The election of 1800 was an intense one with Adams and Pinckney on one ticket and Jefferson and Burr on another. Jefferson and Burr each had 73 electoral votes and Adams and Pinckney 65.

The Constitution provided, as heretofore noted, that each elector should vote for two persons, and it further provided that if there should be a tie vote the election should be made by the House of Representatives from among those whose votes were tied. Jefferson and Burr were tied. While there probably was not a single elector who voted for Burr with the intention that he should be President—the understanding being that he was to be Vice President if Jefferson were elected President—the constitutional provision as it then existed made it possible for the House to select either Jefferson or Burr. The feeling against Jefferson was intense among most of the Federalists, who were in full control of the House. And so a movement sprang up to name Burr instead of Jefferson. Not that the Federalists hated Burr less but that they hated Jefferson more. It was an unconscionable proposal—to which the brilliant but unprincipled Burr gave covert consent—but it would have prevailed had it not been for the opposition of a few Federalists, the most aggressive and influential one being Jefferson's arch political enemy, Alexander Hamilton. Had it not been for Hamilton, Burr probably would have been president instead of Jefferson. Hamilton wrote to Gouverneur Morris, "I trust the Federalists will not finally be so mad as to vote for Burr. I speak with intimate and accurate knowledge of character. His elevation can only promote the purposes of the desperate and the profligate. If there be a man in the world I ought to hate it is Jefferson. With Burr I have always been personally well, but the public good must be paramount to every private consideration." This service of Hamilton became an enduring monument to his high-mindedness.

As a result of this Jefferson-Burr incident the twelfth amendment was submitted and ratified in 1804. The electors now vote separately for President and Vice President, and in case there is a tie vote for President, selection is made by the House from the three highest. In case there is a tie vote for Vice President, selection must be made by the Senate from the two highest on the list.

Both under the original Constitution and under the twelfth amendment the State legislatures have power to determine the method of naming electors. Originally electors were selected by the legislatures and as late as 1824 there were still six States that so selected them. South Carolina did not provide for election of the electors by the people until after the Civil War.

In 1824, at the close of the Monroe administration, there again occurred a bitter contest in the House of Representatives over the election of a President, accompanied by personal charges and public scandal. That contest, which resulted from the unfortunate provisions of the Constitution, fomented strife and ill-will which endured for many years. Out of a total popular vote of less than 400,000 Andrew Jackson had a majority of about 50,000 over John Quincy Adams, and had 99 electoral votes as against 84 for Adams. But Henry Clay and Crawford of Georgia, who were also candidates, together had 87 electoral votes, which was sufficient to prevent Jackson having a majority of the total number. This threw the election into the House of Representatives, where Adams was elected by the vote of 13 States as against 7 for Jackson. Thus it came about that Jackson, with substantially more popular votes and with 15 more electoral votes than Adams, lost the Presidency and Adams won it. Had the times been just ripe for it such a result might well have caused serious public uprising.

It would transgress the limits of this paper to narrate at length the circumstances and political upheaval incident to the Hayes-Tilden contest in 1876. The close of the election left the result in doubt. In four States contests took place with both sides claiming the electoral vote of the State. It is generally conceded that Tilden had a popular majority of approximately a quarter of a million. The 22 electoral votes in dispute were sufficient to turn the election either way. Public feeling ran high. Finally Congress—with doubtful constitutional warrant—created a commission to decide the contests from the disputed States. The commission, consisting of 5 Members from the House, 5 Members from the Senate, and 5 Members of the Supreme Court, decided the various contests amidst the most intense excitement and bitterness, giving the election to Hayes by 1 electoral vote—185 to 184. Only wise counsel, to which Tilden patriotically contributed by his course of moderation, prevented uprising and possibly civil war. All this would have been prevented by some simple changes in the constitutional provisions for election of a president.

I have not yet spoken of the most illogical and indefensible part of the present system. I refer to its disfranchisement, in every State, of the minority voters. A plurality of 1,000, of 100, even of 1 vote in a vote of 5,000,000 in New York State swings that State's 47 electoral votes. Thus as many as 2,500,000 voters in that State may not only be denied representation in the electoral vote, but actually have their votes counted for the candidate they oppose! A like result does happen to all minority votes in every State every time we elect a president. I know of nothing in our constitutional system more illogical or undemocratic.

Not only is this disfranchisement of the minority voters in every State indefensible, in my opinion, but the provision for election by the House of Representatives in case of a tie is both illogical and inadequate for meeting contingencies. Although the apportionment of electoral votes among the States is based largely on population, the population factor is entirely disregarded when the election is thrown into the House. In that event each State has 1 vote. Nevada, with 1 Member and with 3 electoral votes, has the same 1 vote in a House election of a President as New York, with 45 Members and 47 electoral votes. And if a State delegation in Congress happens to be tied, the State loses its vote entirely. Furthermore, the Constitution requires a "majority of all the States" to elect. It is surprising that a situation has not already arisen where no candidate could get a majority of the States. With three or more parties represented in the House, it could easily happen that no eligible candidate could get a majority of all the States. It is true that if the House fails to elect a President, the Vice President is to act as President, but a like provision obtains for election of a Vice President by the Senate, and the Senate might easily be unable to elect a Vice President. If such a situation should arise, the Constitution has no answer to it. Nor is there any provision for another election. What is the answer?

In itself the answer is not difficult. But unfortunately, the obstacle of democratic inertia, of commanding the attention and convincing the understanding of the electorate to a point of action is very great. At various times in our history public-spirited men have sought to arouse public interest in the matter and to secure submission of a constitutional amendment, but to no avail. Senator Benton, of Missouri, agitated the subject in the 1820's and 1830's, and in the seventies Senator Morton of Indiana made it his legislative hobby and submitted a very able and convincing committee report and recommendation. In the nineties DeArmond, of Missouri, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, submitted another and similar report. In recent years, Congressman LEA, of California, able and public-spirited, has followed in their footsteps and has several times secured a favorable committee report. But always the deeply needed change gets lost in the maze of matters which carry a more immediate and material appeal to Members and to constituencies. We are waiting for the big rain before fixing the roof.

Space will not permit discussion of various proposals that have been made. I will therefore only briefly state the plan which seems to me to be the simplest, the fairest, and the most likely to be ratified if submitted as a constitutional amendment. The heart of the plan, which has been called the proportional plan, is to divide the electoral vote of each State in the same proportion as the popular vote of that State. For instance, if two-thirds of the Kansas voters vote for the Republican candidate and one-third for the Democratic candidate, the former would get two-thirds of our electoral votes and the latter would get one-third. Thus every voter, whether in the majority or in the minority, would have his vote registered and represented in the election of a President. No voter would be disfranchised, as millions of them virtually are now in every Presidential election. There are two reasons which appeal to me for favoring the submission of such an amendment rather than one which disregards the States entirely and determines the result on the popular vote of the country as a whole. The first reason is that it would preserve the principle of the compromise—to which reference has been made—between the large and small States in the creation of Congress—House Members according to the State population but equal representation in the Senate. This compromise tends to lessen somewhat the comparative influence of the large and rich State—a consideration which I believe has been proved fair and wholesome from the standpoint of national unity. To make the point plainer, the plan would not disturb the electoral apportionment which gives Kansas, and every other State, one elector for each Senator as well as one for each Member of the House. Election by the whole popular vote of the Nation, computed as a unit, would disregard the historic compromise between large and small States and give undue influence to the heavy population of certain States. The second reason is that there would be little hope of securing the adoption of an amendment which discarded the present allocation of electoral votes among the States and provided for election by the popular vote of the Nation as a whole.

In dividing the electoral vote of a State under the proportional plan small fractional numbers would be disregarded unless necessary to determine the result. The technical features are simple enough, not difficult of operation, but need not here be discussed in detail. The plan would remove uncertainty, render the election of a President by the House of Representatives—with its potentialities of scandal and bitterness already demonstrated historically—forever unnecessary, and take away the serious possibility that someday we may find ourselves without a President and with no constitutional way to get one. It would wipe out the present disfranchisement of minority voters in the several States and prevent any candidate with less electoral votes than his opponent from becoming President.

An Analysis of the 1944 Republican Platform by John B. Elliott

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERIDAN DOWNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by John B. Elliott, of Los Angeles, Calif., a prominent business and political leader, containing his analysis of the 1944 Republican platform, which I consider entirely worthy of wide consideration by our people.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR CALLS FOR CANDOR—REPUBLICAN PLATFORM FAILS

(By John B. Elliott, California Democratic leader)

The present most tragic times in our history allow no place for the excesses of American political partisanship.

When American boys are giving their lives daily in nearly every part of the world for the unselfish welfare of our country, how can any of us, safe here at home, have any thought for the shallowness and hypocrisy of partisan intrigue and scheming?

With more than 5,000,000 American young men and women overseas and under arms, braving daily death and mutilation, and an equal number under the discipline of armed camps in training in this country, how can we here be so heedless and thoughtless as to countenance any of the petty and unworthy things of ordinary politics? Shame and disgrace upon us if we do.

TWO PARTIES ESSENTIAL

Under our existing form of government, it is important and most desirable that we preserve at least two political parties as a check upon unrestrained majorities. And it is also important and desirable that both parties be patriotic, honest and straightforward, unselfish in their dealings with the American people.

It is not only imperative that this be so in these hours of desperate conflict, but it is most necessary also in the days ahead when we shall have to project and reconstruct America and deal with the great problems created by war and the millions of our people affected.

It fills me with regret to have to say that I believe one cannot read the very lengthy so-called platform of principles recently adopted by the Republican party at Chicago without a sinking feeling that our people have not been anything like fairly dealt with by one of our major political parties.

FEARLESSNESS NEEDED

Yet the disastrous and historical times in which we are living call for nothing less than complete honesty and candor.

Many of the ablest and best known writers and commentators of the country have described this platform in unfavorable and deprecatory language. Many have condemned it in the strongest terms.

It is frequently, and one might also say generally, described as a new low of 40 years in political platform hypocrisy; as an effort to mislead and deceive the people into crediting its expressions and the candidates who stand upon it as being worthy of belief and support.

I hope all Americans will read it and study it. But it is too lengthy to expect more than a few to do that.

It is plainly contradictory in many parts. Ingeniously put together, it is unfair in many respects, and in places so insidiously contrived that the real meaning is hidden or omitted altogether. It has a double meaning and is capable of double interpretation in many particulars.

IT IS NOT FAIR

It is not fair. It is not clear. It, obviously, is not completely honest. It covers a long range of subjects, some large and some relatively very small, in what amounts to a plain attempt to corral the votes of Americans who may be beguiled into thinking it is being offered in their special interest and welfare.

It is often platitudinous in its declarations. Time and again it speaks resoundingly of most commonly accepted truisms. In reading it, one is brought almost to speculation why its framers did not include a studied defense and recommendation of the Ten Commandments, in their elaborate effort to enumerate everything that might help.

Political parties and candidates are supposed to stand on political platforms. Well, perhaps someone may, with great dexterity, stand temporarily on this platform of the Republican Party. But if any action is undertaken—if anyone attempts to move on it—the vibration will cause it to collapse and fall into pieces.

It is impossible to analyze this national Republican platform in this article, but one can point out at least a few of what are to me some of its many brazen faults.

OLD LINE REPUBLICANISM

This platform endorses a protective tariff that will be high enough; and yet it favors the removal of barriers to foreign trade.

It salutes the American farmers for "their magnificent job of war-time production," and in the very next paragraph says that the farmers must be free of the controls and directives under which this "magnificent job of war-time production" has been accomplished.

The platform sanctimoniously says that "international peace and security" do not depend upon the sanction of force alone, but "should prevail by virtue of reciprocal interest and spiritual values recognized (among sovereign nations) in these security agreements."

Yes, of course, they should prevail, as stated in the platform, but what if they don't prevail?

Then what? This platform is as silent as an Egyptian tomb about that.

The platform pledges "prosecution of the war to total victory." It could not pledge anything less than that.

It also promises "at the earliest possible time, after the cessation of hostilities, we will bring home all members of our armed forces who do not have unexpired enlistments and who do not volunteer for further overseas duty."

Well, rather. The platform wouldn't dare say anything different from that.

The platform strongly upholds States' rights and in another paragraph promises certain specific legislation which would positively encroach on States rights. It proposes both to reduce the public debt and reduce taxes. Meaning, of course, to collect less and pay out more, and at the same time, apparently, would do away with Federal deficit financing. Legerdemain. Prestidigitation. Get your money down; which shell hides the little pea?

Further, this remarkable document condemns the freezing of wage rates and indirectly suggests that the control of the price of farm products, and consequent control of the cost of living, should terminate. Inevitable result, inflation. But what of that; it is only another promise anyway, isn't it?

HEROIC GESTURES

It goes on further, in mock heroics, to say that the Republicans will "make and keep Axis Powers impotent to renew tyranny and attack."

And then this extraordinarily voluminous document proceeds to omit completely just how they would go about filling that rather large order, in case some serious trouble in that connection actually broke out. Sidestepping.

The platform promises to "promote world-wide economic stability" but leaves the trifling details of how to accomplish that fair-sized task to the imagination—or hoped-for lack of that quality—on the part of the reader.

The platform says, under the present administration, "American economic life is being destroyed," but a few paragraphs further on, so that the public will not readily connect the two declarations, proceeds to say nothing less than the following:

"The Republican Party accepts the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act, the Wages and Hours Act, and all other Federal statutes designed to promote and protect the welfare of American working men and women, and we promise a fair and just administration of these laws."

The platform is for "vigorous development of foreign markets," and again pledges "leadership in every cooperative effort to remove unnecessary and destructive barriers to international trade," and then halfway between these two pronouncements it volubly proclaims that it will "maintain a fair protective tariff so that the standards of living of our people should not be impaired through the importation of commodities produced abroad."

ONE EASY LESSON

The job of riding various horses going in opposite directions at the same time is thus fully taught in one simple lesson for the benefit of the easygoing voter.

The platform takes a bold stand on many small or sectional issues, as when it declares rather hotly in favor of a constitutional amendment for the abolition of the poll tax, well knowing that this same course has always been open to them, and anyway it would certainly take years and probably be impossible to accomplish.

The foregoing are but a few of the loopholes, booby traps, inconsistences, contradictions, and derelictions of this Republican platform. It is all very regrettable and a sad story for today.

One Hundred and Fifty Cases of World War No. 2 Cardiovascular Disease Analyzed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, an interesting study has just been completed by Dr. A. H. Traum and Blanche B. Wilcox, Ph. D., of the Cardiovascular Research Unit of the Veterans' Administration which will no doubt prove of value in the future for both military authorities and the Veterans' Administration.

The study was based on the case folders of 150 ex-servicemen who were inducted into and discharged from the Army since the enactment of the selective-service law of 1940. The cases were unselected, being drawn at random from the files of veterans discharged because of cardiovascular disease.

The analysis of these cases as made by Dr. Traum and Mrs. Wilcox appeared in the July 1944 issue of the Military Surgeon, and was published with the permission of the Medical Director of the Veterans' Administration, who, of course, under Government regulations in such matters, assumed no responsibility for the opinions expressed or the conclusions drawn by the authors.

This study, together with many other additional facts which are obtainable, causes one to raise the question, Would it not be sound Government policy to require an annual or semiannual health audit on the part of all citizens between the ages of 14 and 20 years, to the end that those responsible for the conduct of the defense program shall be far better informed on the physical condition of both male and female population than they were at the time the present defense program was placed in operation?

The article follows:

AN ANALYSIS OF 150 CASES OF CARDIOVASCULAR DISEASE IN WORLD WAR NO. 2 VETERANS

(By A. H. Traum, M. D., and Blanche B. Wilcox, Ph. D., Cardiovascular Research Unit, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.)

Every individual discharged from the armed forces and applying for compensation through the Veterans Administration becomes a potential beneficiary of the Government and a careful appraisal of all the factors concerned in the discharge are important. Material for this report was obtained from the Veterans Administration claims folders of 150 veterans who were inducted into the Army since the enactment of the Selective Service Act of 1940 and discharged from the armed forces because of some cardiovascular disease. The cases were unselected and studied in the order of arrival of the folders at the reasearch unit. In each case most of the following Selective Service and Army forms were available for review. Selective Service questionnaire, Selective Service local board examination, Army induction examination, Army hospitalization records, certificate of disability for discharge.

General considerations: The 150 cases were classified into the following etiological groups as designated by the diagnosis listed on the certificate of disability for discharge:

Rheumatic heart disease	69
Hypertension	22
Varicose veins	14
Other vascular conditions	18
Functional heart disease	6
Congenital heart disease	5
Coronary artery heart disease	3
Heart disease, other causes	13

The group consisted of 133 white and 17 colored males. All were privates with the exception of two white males who were corporals. The age range was between 18 and 37 years. Two white men were under 20 years old; 105 white and 16 colored males were listed between 20 and 29 years; and 26 white males and one colored male were 30 years or older, the oldest being 37 years. There were 104 men from urban and 46 men from rural sections of the country.

Selective Service and Army induction examinations: Army hospital records and certificate of disability for discharge: The Army induction examinations of the entire group and 128 selective service local board examinations and questionnaires were available. In most instances the records were adequate with the exception of one striking discrepancy, and that was a failure in many cases to record blood pressures. One other noteworthy observation in many of the examinations was the failure to elicit cardiac murmurs when the selectee stated that he had previous knowledge of heart trouble and in whom shortly afterward characteristic cardiac murmurs were found during periods of hospitalization. On 128 selective-service examinations in answer to the question, "Do you consider that you are now sound and well," 83 selectees gave an affirmative answer. Forty-five men stated that they were not well and added their reasons; in 36 cases the statements (which included symptoms, or references to parts of the body, or diagnoses) were remarks that could be interpreted as being definitely related to the medical condition designated in the final Army diagnosis. For instance, 8 men complained of high blood pressure and were later discharged from the Army because of arterial hypertension. Similarly, three other men stated that they had heart trouble and were later discharged because of congenital heart disease.

Complete records of Army hospitalization were available for review in all but 5 of the cases of this series. In general, the clinical examinations, laboratory studies, and treatment at the Army hospitals were well done. Unquestionably, these records will be of great value in any future study of the cases. There was a definite tendency to "read too much" into the electrocardiograms but in no case did this tendency actually affect the diagnosis. Interestingly, 25 cases of cardiovascular disease in this series were picked up by the Army examiners while the soldier was being treated for another condition.

A certificate of disability for discharge was available in each case reviewed, and the final diagnosis listed on this certificate formed the basis for all classifications noted in this report. Each record included the opinion of a medical board, composed of three medical officers, relative to the final diagnosis, blamability of the induction medical officer, and the origin of the main disability; that is, whether the disability existed prior to enlistment or was incurred in line of duty.

Rheumatic heart disease: 69 men were discharged because of the residuals of rheumatic infection, especially rheumatic valvular heart disease. Seventeen veterans admitted knowledge of heart trouble on the selective service questionnaires, or at the time of the local board physical examination before induction into the Army. (Eight selective service records were not available in the rheumatic heart disease group.) Thirty-eight, or 54 percent of this group admitted a definite knowledge of previous rheumatic infection or rheumatic valvular heart disease, at the time of Army hospitalization. The physical examinations of the selective-service boards revealed three cases with diastolic or presystolic murmurs at the mitral area which were not found by the Army induction examiners. In two other cases a systolic murmur was elicited at the mitral area but was considered by the medical examiners to be functional in type.

The Army discharge boards held the inducting medical officer blamable in 5 cases. The boards determined that 43 cases in this group existed prior to enlistment and 21 cases were the direct result of line of duty.

The diagnostic nomenclature found in this entire group was quite satisfactory and in only a few cases were there any noteworthy deviations from the diagnostic standards set up by the American Heart Association. In 10 cases with valvular heart disease, namely, mitral stenosis, the etiology was considered as unknown for the valvular lesion described; even though there was a definite history of a previous rheumatic fever or chorea. In one case a general anatomical term, endocarditis, was used instead of the name of the specific valve involved; and in the other case a general term, myocardosis, was incorrectly used.

Most of the diagnoses in the entire group were established on sound clinical evidence and will undoubtedly be substantiated in future examinations. Three diagnoses in this group could be challenged. The findings in the first case were suggestive of a neurocirculatory asthenia, rather than a valvular heart disease, and the clinical evidence in each of the other two cases suggested the possibility of a congenital rather than a rheumatic valvular lesion. Adequate reasons were given to lend support to the diagnoses made, and the nature of the lesions present probably will be determined with finality only after future examinations.

Several of the cases reviewed presented facts worthy of mention at this time. Two men were discharged from the Army because of rheumatic valvular heart disease, and judging from the correspondence in the Veterans' Administration claims folders these veterans presumably have reentered active Army service. There were no records available relative to the veterans' possible reenlistment after discharge. One man was rejected by the United States Civil Service Commission in 1939 because of heart trouble. Another man was rejected from Civilian Conservation Corps in 1936 because of heart trouble; and still another man had been drawing a pension for valvular heart disease, mitral stenosis, since his discharge from the Navy in 1937.

Arterial hypertension: Twenty-two men were discharged because of arterial hypertension. Four men gave a previous history of this disease on selective-service questionnaires, and 10 men, or 45 percent of this hypertensive group, admitted a knowledge of a previously existing hypertension when their histories were taken at the time of Army hospitalization. The Army discharge boards held the induction medical officer blamable in 2 cases and concluded that 21 cases existed prior to enlistment and 1 occurred in line of duty.

The diagnoses in all the cases agreed with the American Heart Association criteria and were established on adequate clinical evidence. In two cases, although definite elevations of blood pressure existed and justified the diagnoses made, one could suspect upon reviewing the clinical data, the possibility of other etiological factors. One case had some clinical features of a neurocirculatory asthenia and another suggested to this reviewer the possibility of a valvular lesion.

Four cases of this group merit individual comment. The first was discharged from the Civilian Conservation Corps in 1939 because of arterial hypertension. The second case was that of a veteran classified by the inducting officer as not qualified for full military duty because of an arterial hypertension picked up at time of induction examinations, and with a history of high blood pressure; this man was hospitalized 24 days after entering the Army. The third case revealed a marked elevation of systolic and diastolic blood pressures at the time of Selective Service Local Board examination, and 2 days later, at time of Army induction examination, revealed a blood pressure within normal limits. The fourth case had a moderate elevation of blood pressure at time of the local board examination but was apparently not checked at the Army induction examination and subsequently this man was discharged from the Army because of arterial hypertension after 77 days of military service including 44 days of hospitalization.

The Selective Service and Army induction examinations revealed interesting and instructive findings relative to blood pressure readings. Thirty-eight of the 128 available local board examinations did not record blood pressure readings and of this group 5 men were later discharged because of arterial hypertension. Only 17 of the 38 cases just mentioned had their blood pressures noted on the Army induction examinations; therefore, 21 inductees of this entire series actually entered the Army without this record. Two of this group were discharged from the Army with hypertension as one of the final diagnoses.

In 23 cases where no local board examinations were available in the veterans' claims folders, only 10 had blood pressures recorded at the time of induction. Seven of these 23 cases were discharged from the Army because of arterial hypertension.

In 15 cases an elevation of either systolic or diastolic blood pressure was noted on the Selective Service Local Board physical examinations, and in 11 cases an elevated blood pressure was found to exist later during Army hospitalization; and was a definite part of the clinical picture of the condition responsible for the soldiers' discharge from the Army. It must be admitted that in most cases the initial blood pressures referred to were on border-line levels, but should have been sufficient to direct further attention to the possibility of existing abnormalities. (The American Heart Association criteria for diagnosis considers that hypertension is present when a systolic blood pressure is persistently above 140 mm. Hg. or the diastolic above 90 mm. Hg.) Nine men in whom blood pressures showed a slight elevation, above borderline levels, at time of Army induction examinations, were later discharged from the Army because of arterial hypertension.

Varicose veins: This classification included 14 cases, 11 of which were actually discharged because of varicose veins. All but one of the 11 cases were considered to have had the condition prior to induction. In 4 cases the discharge board held the inducting examiners blamable.

The group of 14 cases included 3 cases where the discharge was a transfer to the enlisted reserve group because of the then existing age limit of 28. Varicose veins were listed as one of the physical findings on the discharge certificate. Two of the three men were recalled to active duty and are again in service. The other case was also recalled to active duty but was disqualified because of an acute urethritis.

The selective service or Army induction examinations noted varicose veins in 8 of the 14 cases and considered the condition to be nondisabling at that time. One other case revealed at the time of hospitalization that he had varicose veins which had been treated by the injection method 1 year prior to his induction into active Army service.

Other vascular conditions: Eighteen soldiers were discharged because of various types of vascular conditions other than varicose veins. These could be classified as 10 cases of thrombophlebitis, 2 cases of thrombocytopenic purpura, 2 cases of thromboangiitis obliterans, and 1 each of trophedema, generalized arteriosclerosis, traumatic venous aneurysm, and hypotension possibly caused by hypoadrenalism. All of these diagnoses were established on acceptable clinical evidence. Six cases of this group were considered by the Army discharge board to have occurred in line of duty and the inducting medical officer was held blamable in one case. There were 4 instances where the men admitted knowledge of their disability on the selective-service questionnaires, and 6 additional cases at the time of Army hospitalization gave a definite history of their disability existing prior to induction. The 10 cases of thrombophlebitis all presented a definite etiological factor, 6 cases resulted as a complication of operative procedures, 2 from pneumonic processes, 2 from other infections, and 1 from an injury. Five of these cases occurred in line of duty and a similar number had their onset before military service.

Functional heart disease: Six cases were discharged from the Army with a main diagnosis of neurocirculatory asthenia. Three of these men gave a suggestive history of heart disease on the selective-service questionnaire. All were considered to have existed prior to enlistment by the Army discharge boards. The inducting medical officer was not held blamable in any of these cases.

This group was one in which most of the diagnoses could be questioned and the only group where the medical work-up during the period of Army hospitalization could be considered inadequate. In four of the cases there were no electrocardiograms, in three cases no basal metabolism tests were recorded; and in one case there were neither electrocardiograms, X-rays of the chest, nor basal metabolism tests. Since a diagnosis of neurocirculatory asthenia is made not only upon clinical symptoms but also by the method of elimination, diagnoses made without sufficient clinical data are questioned.

Congenital heart disease: Five men were discharged because of congenital heart disease. All cases were considered by the Army discharge board as existing prior to enlistment, and in none of these cases was the inducting officer held blamable. Three cases admitted knowledge of heart disease on the selective service questionnaires. Selective service examiners elicited a systolic murmur over the apex in one case, marked cardiac enlargement and an apical systolic murmur in another case; and an Army reception center medical examiner picked up a significant systolic murmur over the apex of still another case.

Coronary artery heart disease: Three soldiers were discharged from the Army with a diagnosis of coronary artery disease. In one case the discharge board decided the condition had occurred in line of duty, and in the other two instances to have existed prior to induction. The induction officers were not held blamable in any case.

The correctness of the final diagnoses was questioned by this reviewer in all cases. In one case the history, physical and laboratory findings were more suggestive of an acute rheumatic infection than a coronary thrombosis. The diagnoses given in the other two cases were considered not justifiable because of the lack of characteristic electrocardiographic findings; in addition, both cases presented a rather atypical history.

Heart disease—Other causes: 13 cases were discharged from the Army because of various types of heart disease not already discussed. The Army discharge boards concluded that 8 cases existed prior to induction and that the other 5 cases occurred in line of duty. The inducting medical officer was held blamable in 1 case. Selective service records were available for 10 men in this group; only 1 man admitted knowledge of any important illnesses before service.

Four cases of this group developed signs and symptoms of heart disease following various types of infectious processes, namely, the four cases followed pneumonia, one was complicated by an attack of measles; and six cases had cardiac arhythmias, four were due to paroxysmal auricular tachycardia, and one each of paroxysmal auricular fibrillation and partial heart block. One other case was diagnosed as myocardial insufficiency secondary to a sickle cell anemia, another case revealed an unexplained cardiac hypertrophy picked up during a physical examination of a soldier hospitalized for German measles. The last case of this group was diagnosed as valvular heart disease, pulmonic insufficiency, cause undetermined.

The diagnoses for the entire group, with the exception of one case, were established on sound clinical evidence. In the one case the data available in the Army hospital records did not support the diagnosis established. The diagnosis made was valvular heart disease, pulmonic insufficiency, cause undetermined, based only on the ausculatory findings which were described as a persistent systolic murmur over the second right interspace.

Discussion: A review of 150 cases of veterans inducted into the Army since the Selective Service Act of 1940 and discharged with a cardiovascular disease, revealed that errors may have been made in selecting some of these men for the Army. Twenty-four percent of the entire group admitted knowledge of the disability on the selective service questionnaire or at the local board examination, and 56 percent of all the cases admitted a past history of their particular disability during Army hospitalization. The Army discharge boards decided that 112, or 75 percent, of the cases existed prior to enlistment. There were 13 instances where the inducting medical officer was held blamable by the Army discharge board.

Many abnormal physical findings could be easily overlooked or misinterpreted during mass examinations such as given at large Army induction stations. An effort to secure additional medical information for the examining officers at the time of induction may result in a better evaluation of existing physical disabilities. The fact is also appreciated that perhaps thousands of inductees with physical findings similar to some of those revealed in this study, are probably taking an active and effective part in the war effort as members of the armed forces.

The necessity for recording blood pressures is emphasized in the facts revealed in 21 cases where there was no evidence whatsoever that blood-pressure readings were ever taken, and 11 other cases where the Selective Service examinations were not available, and the blood pressures were not recorded by the Army induction examiners. Some of these cases were later discharged from the Army for arterial hypertension, neurocirculatory asthenia, or valvular lesions in which abnormal blood pressure readings are an important clinical feature. Another striking finding in this review was the number of cases, where a slightly elevated blood-pressure reading was noted at local board or Army induction examinations, that were discharged with a disability in which an elevated blood pressure was a clinical feature. In this small series of cases, there were more abnormalities noted on local board examinations than by the Army induction examiners, where the findings had a definite relation to the cause for discharge.

A definite trend of disease entities in this small series of cases becomes apparent. As would be expected, the greater number of cases fall into the rheumatic group. A high proportion of the cases were classified in the arterial hypertensive and various peripheral vascular diseases groups. There was a low percentage of neurocirculatory asthenia cases; this group will probably show an increase in future veterans who have experienced actual combat.

Most of the cases studied were very accurately diagnosed. The Army examinations and conclusions could be questioned in only two disease groups of this series, namely, the functional heart disease and coronary artery disease groups. In some of the former cases, the medical work-ups appeared inadequate and in the coronary artery group the evaluation of the historical and clinical findings could be questioned.

Conclusions: 150 of cardiovascular disease among veterans of World War No. 2 have been reviewed. The Army hospital records, together with Selective Service and Army induction examinations were in almost all instances very complete and accurate, and will make an important and satisfactory starting point for any future studies of these cases.

A large number of the cases admitted knowledge of their disability having existed before induction into the Army, at the time of Army hospitalization. Some of the cases might possibly have been picked up during the Army induction examination if the existence of their disabilities had been called to the attention of the medical examiners. This information may be made available to the inducting medical officers and Selective Service examiners if several additional specific questions are added to those already on the Selective Service physical examination forms. These questions could inquire directly into the past history of heart disease, rheumatism and high blood pressure and would seem justified because of the large numbers of potential cardiovascular cases that will constantly be encountered during Army induction work and belong to the rheumatic heart disease or arterial hypertension group.

The blood pressures must be recorded on the Selective Service or induction examinations for obvious reasons. A striking finding was the number of reports reviewed without this record and the apparent importance of slightly elevated blood pressures in relation to the final clinical conditions resulting in the soldier's discharge from the Army.

The Atlantic Charter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, again humanity throughout the world has accepted in good faith the standards of civilization announced by the leaders of the world's two greatest nations, the United States and Great Britain, when these leaders announced the principles embodied in their Atlantic Charter, as follows:

ATLANTIC CHARTER

First, their countries seek no aggrandizements, territorial or other:

Second, they desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned;

Third, they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forceably deprived of them;

Fourth, they will endeavor, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all States, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and other raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity;

Fifth, they desire to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing, for all, improved labor standards, economic adjustment and social security;

Sixth, after the final destruction of the Nazi tyranny, they hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries, and which will afford assurance that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want;

Seventh, such a peace should enable all men to traverse the high seas and oceans without hindrance;

Eighth, they believe that all of the Nations of the world, for realistic as well as spiritual reasons, must come to the abandonment of the use of force. Since no future peace can be maintained if land, sea and air armaments continue to be employed by nations which threaten, or may threaten, aggression outside of their frontiers, they believe, pending the establishment of a wide and permanent system of security, that the disarmament of such nations is essential. They will likewise add and encourage all other practicable measures which will lighten for peace-loving peoples the crushing burden of armaments.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.
WINSTON S. CHURCHILL.

CAN WE AND THEY KEEP FAITH, OR MUST HUMANITY FAIL IN LATVIA'S HOUR OF SUPREME TRIAL

Mr. Speaker, no other country in history has been in such a precarious situation as that of the three small states on the northeastern shores of the Baltic Sea—Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania. All their well-being depends upon peace, freedom of trade and of the seas, and respect for treaties and international law. They are not military powers, but they are working parts of world progress and civilization. In their land they created their own Garden of Eden, which during the past years has been trampled under by the relentless and merciless tread of war. For these three countries the question is to be or not to be. They rest all their hopes on the Atlantic Charter and firmly believe that the democratic world will not fail them.

Latvia, like Estonia and Lithuania, during this war became an object of Bolshevik invasion in 1940 and a battlefield between Germany and Soviet Russia in 1941. In prosecuting the war with Germany, Soviet Russia's Red Army in July 1944 for the second time crossed the Latvian border, and Latvia again became a battlefield. More destruction, more sufferings, more people killed. News arriving from neutral Sweden describes renewed persecutions by the Bolsheviks in occupied Lithuania. Similar persecutions are evidently taking place in the Latvian territory occupied by the Bolsheviks, who entered Latvia without a preliminary declaration that Soviet Russia would respect Latvia's sovereignty and international laws of warfare. To the contrary, in its communiqués abroad Soviet Russia, violating international law, describes Latvia as "Soviet territory to be liberated" from Germany or simply as "Soviet Latvia." By what rights? No such rights exist.

In 1920 Soviet Russia voluntarily recognized the independence, self-subsistence, and sovereignty of Latvia and for eternity renounced all sovereign rights over the Latvian people and territory, basing its action on the principle of self-determination of nations. By the same treaty it was stipulated that the frontier between the two states should run on a line separating ethnographic majorities of both peoples. There were no border questions between Latvia and Soviet Russia. Subsequently relations were established between the two neighboring states based on noninterference and a good-neighbor policy. Other treaties were signed—sanitary, railway, commerce, and so forth. Latvia granted Soviet Russia free transit over its rail and water ways and ports, and even lowered its railway tariffs from 10 percent to 70 percent for Soviet goods. However, Soviet Russia did not make much use of these facilities. Relations, nonetheless, continued to be good and more treaties were signed—a nonaggression treaty in 1932, which was extended until 1945; a treaty of conciliation in 1933; and in the same year the convention defining aggression and the aggressor was signed. Nothing seemed to trouble the good relations between Latvia and Soviet Russia.

This went on until 1939, when war broke out between Germany on one side and Poland, England, and France on the other. Latvia declared its neutrality, having on June 7, 1939, signed a nonaggression treaty also with Germany and being a member of the League of Nations. Regardless of that, Latvia, in October 1939, had to sign a mutual-assistance treaty with Soviet Russia—after Estonia, the ally of Latvia, had already signed—under which Latvia leased for 10 years to Soviet Russia several military and naval bases on its Baltic shore in Kurzeme, at Liepaja and Ventspils, and permitted Soviet Russia for the duration of war to maintain in these bases a garrison of 30,000.

Solemn declarations were made by Soviet Russia that she had no intentions whatsoever against Latvia's sovereignty and independence. These declarations were repeated as late as March 29, 1940, by Foreign Commissar Molotov. However, on June 16, 1940, Latvia received an ultimatum to grant free passage to Soviet Russian troops in unlimited numbers and to form a pro-Soviet Government. Some absolutely unfounded accusations were made against Latvia to camouflage this demand.

Latvia being completely isolated—Lithuania already on June 14–15 had been completely occupied by the Red Army—it had to accept the ultimatum, hoping against hope that at least in this way it would preserve its existence. Estonia did the same. It must be stated that, contrary to Bolshevik expectations, no uprisings took place, and no Soviets were proclaimed; the Latvians, except a relatively few alien fellow travelers and also a few Communists, were grim and taciturn. The pro-Soviet Government formed by a Moscow emissary, A. Vishinsky, was used as a tool for Latvia's sovietization by engineered so-called elections—only one, procommunistic ticket was permitted to run—of a stooge parliament, which decided by open vote in breach of Latvia's Constitution to beg the U. S. S. R. for admittance into the Soviet Union. During the elections Latvia was under the complete domination of the Red Army. Latvia's President, Dr. K. Ulmanis, who was compelled to yield, was already in July, before the annexation of Latvia, deported to the U. S. S. R. Also the Vice President, Gen. J. Balodis, and many other leading political persons met the same fate.

One should bear in mind that the Latvians are a nation of farmers, and that they have no aristocracy. All their intellectuals and middle class, including scientists, writers, artists, painters, financists, tradesmen, seamen, engineers, and so forth, are descendants of farmers or tenants, their farms not exceeding 132 acres. The Latvians formed a working democracy and based their economic life on cooperative associations, private property, subject to restriction by social laws, free contracts, free inheritance, and their social-political life on self-government, strong family ties, religious ethics, and equality before law and of opportunity based on the merit system. Racial minorities enjoyed cultural autonomy and all rights. Social justice reigned. Religion was free.

Already in 1920 Latvia had partitioned estates larger than 100 hectares. It had a highly developed agricultural system and local industry, shipping, and trade. It was prosperous and had no unemployment nor deficits in its budget; a favorable balance of trade and payments enhanced the welfare of the country.

Latvians were satisfied with their mode of life, based on ideals of western occidental culture, to which they always belonged. They did not live in villages like the Russians, they did not know the "mir" or collective property of land as the Russian peasants.

In the process of national awakening, creating an intellectual and middle class, the Latvians by the end of the nineteenth century became conscious of their nationhood, and a vigorous political movement culminated in the revolution of 1904–5, which was bloodily suppressed regardless of the moderate demands for self-government and social reforms.

Eventually the Latvian Provisional National Council was recognized by Great Britain as Latvia's temporary Government. On November 18, 1918, in Riga, liberated from the Germans, the Latvian State Council was organized, and the first Latvian Government under Dr. K. Ulmanis—a graduate of Nebraska Lincoln University—was elected. The primary task of the state council and of the Government was to organize Latvia's administration and national defense and to elect a Latvian constituent assembly. All these aims were attained, and Latvia became a republic with a democratic form of government. Simultaneously, it became a member of the League of Nations. Incidentally, Latvia belonged to the European family of nations since 1207, when it was accepted as a principality into the Holy Roman Empire. Latvians are neither Slavs nor Teutons, their religion is Protestant and Roman Catholic. They have inhabited their territory since the Bronze Age, and they have their own ancient civilization and culture. This nation of free farmers is basically opposed to socialism and bolshevism—as are all similar farming nations of northern, central, and southeastern Europe. The Bolshevik rulers of Latvia, which was annexed to Soviet Russia by devious processes, therefore applied to Latvians—and also to Estonians and Lithuanians—the most terroristic persecutions; thousands were killed, and scores of thousands were deported to Siberian and central Asiatic forced labor camps, mines, and so forth. Every Latvian patriot, member of the militia, and so forth, was considered anti-Soviet. Many of the persecuted were simple workmen but patriotic.

According to article 4, the "capitalistic economic system of Latvia is abolished." Private ownership, according to article 6, is annulled in Latvia on "land, its riches, waters, forests, large industrial works and factories, mines, sources of ore, means of communication, large agricultural enterprises (How large?), also communal enterprises, large buildings in cities and industrial centers, and so forth." Also the property of the cooperatives by article 7 is proclaimed to be "public socialistic property." What is left over, according to article 10, may belong to citizens: Income from their labor, the abode in which they dwell, a small piece of kitchen-garden land, farming inventory, household objects, and objects of personal use.

Article 8 permits individual private husbandries of peasants, artisans, and manual producers, but "within the limits defined by law." What limits? According to article 10, the purpose of the state plan is to increase public, not personal wealth. Article 17 provides that all laws of the U. S. S. R. are mandatory in Latvia, and everything must be determined in accordance with the laws of the U. S. S. R.

The most important economic branches, according to article 48, such as the food industry, meat and dairy industry, light industry, forest industry, agriculture, finance, and commerce are subject to the federal commissariats of the U. S. S. R.

It is a historical fact that the Latvian people and also the other progressive Baltic nations of a high material and intellectual culture had never voluntarily accepted the enslavement provided by this so-called constitution, and will never accept it. The Latvian people also never accepted the Nazi "new order," and they hate both bolshevism and nazi-ism.

The Latvians, who possess their own language, territory, and unified government, and are economically self-supporting, firmly believe that the Atlantic Charter, to which also the U. S. S. R. has subscribed several times, will be eventually respected also by the U. S. S. R.

The Latvian people, however, are willing to reestablish good neighborly relations with the U. S. S. R., but only on the basis of the treaty of 1920, provided that all deportees and arrested Latvian citizens be at once released, and reparations made for damages done, according to international law, and that the Bolshevik agents who committed atrocities in Latvia during the Bolshevik occupation be punished in the same way as the Nazi war criminals.

The Latvian people expect that after finishing military operations on Latvian soil, the Red Army will immediately leave Latvia, and that the Latvian people will regain its sovereignty and self-government.

Is Sidney Hillman to Choose Our President?—Purpose of a Fourth Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the campaign for a fourth term is a culmination of the drive to destroy our constitutional form of government; to take from the people their liberties, from coming generations the opportunity to be prosperous and happy.

Nothing is to be gained by concealment of the facts, by an evasion of the issue or the refusal to drag it out into the open, face it squarely and defeat completely those who would destroy the Republic and in its place set up a government not by law but by men.

The President is using the war and the absence of our men on foreign soil as an excuse and an oportunity to establish himself as a dictator. Now, it matters not at all whether Mr. Roosevelt is using the Communists and Sidney Hillman, ambitious labor politicians and racketeers, or whether they are using him for the accomplishment of this purpose. It is not the men nor the methods which are being used which is of first importance. The thing that matters is the result that will be brought about by what is being done.

However, some idea of what is being attempted can be gleaned from the record of the men who are active in the fourth term drive and the methods which they use. Naturally, they protest their sincerity of purpose; loudly assert that their first objective is the winning of the war and then proclaim that all who oppose their activities lack patriotism and love of country and have no interest in the welfare of the worker, or, for that matter, in what happens to anyone other than themselves.

Those now engaged in the campaign for a fourth term have over the months and the years attempted to discredit the Congress as a whole and individual Representatives elected time and again by the people who know them best.

One method which they have used to attempt to destroy the people's faith in the legislative branch of the Government is to associate the names of individual Members of Congress with the names of individuals who have been either convicted of crime or, by New Deal administrators, charged with criminal offenses.

Not a few of those who have been engaged in this campaign of vilification, active in making false charges of a lack of patriotism, have themselves court records which show that heretofore they have had no regard for the law and have attempted by force and violence to overthrow our Government.

I do not believe in this method of condemning one individual simply because he knows, has been seen with, another individual. Because someone convicted of crime has quoted what another person said is no proof that the person quoted holds all of the same views as does the one using the quotation.

However, where you find a group using similar mehods and, after knowledge of each other's previous records, working together toward a common purpose, it is not illogical to infer that the natural result of their actions is something for which all are equally responsible.

It is a familiar principle of law, and it is no more than common sense, that where a group does work together, with full knowledge of what each has done, is doing, each is responsible for the acts of the other while engaged in the common enterprise.

The calling of names and the stating of conclusions never give the foundation for the settlement of an issue. Only by a recognition of the facts as they exist and by a realization of the logical results which flow from those facts can the real issue be made clear, the battle won.

The President, the New Dealers, and the Communists attempt to deceive the people by leading them to believe that, because by virtue of being President he is legally the Commander in Chief of the armed forces, he, as a matter of fact, determines the strategy which shall be followed, the time and the place and the manner in which the battles shall be fought. The President tries to make us think that the success or the failure of the war depends upon his good judgment, whereas, in truth and in fact, the Chiefs of Staff determine our battle policy.

The disgrace of Pearl Harbor has been thrown by the President upon Kimmel and Short. But only yesterday Kimmel denied the truth of the conclusions drawn by a Member of the other body from the Roberts report, which was supposed to give the American people the truth about the disaster at Pearl Harbor.

Up to the present time, both of those men have been charged, in the public mind at least, with being derelict in their duty; with being responsible for the loss of many of our men, many of our ships. But, contrary to the American custom and belief, neither has ever been given his day in court; neither has ever been permitted to say a word in his own defense.

Now, if the President was, as he claims, determining our foreign policy at and prior to December 7, 1941, these two men were under his orders, and if they acted under orders from him as Commander in Chief, then he—not they—is responsible for this disaster.

Mr. Roosevelt as Commander in Chief cannot dodge responsibility for the disaster at Pearl Harbor and at the same time ask the American people to reelect him because he is Commander in Chief and, as such, his judgment infallible and indispensable.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT NOT INDISPENSABLE

Long ago the President told the Congress to keep out of the Nation's foreign policy; that he had information and means of information which were unavailable to the people's Representatives and that he was best qualified to, and would, keep us out of war; that our armies would never be required to fight on foreign soil.

It is now evident that, to put it charitably, he either was ignorant of or misjudged the facts. Yet he strives to create the impression, as do his New Deal stooges and his communistic allies, that, whether the war be won or lost, the coming peace be permanent or transitory, rests in his hands.

The dumbest of us now know that we will win this war; that the terms of the peace and its probable duration will be determined by Stalin, who rightly thinks first of his own country, communistic Russia, and her interests; and Churchill, who has frankly and boldly announced that imperialistic Great Britain shall at least continue to be co-mistress of the seas and of subservient millions.

CANDIDATE ROOSEVELT PROMISES EVERYTHING

Other lures held out to what Mr. Roosevelt hopes will again be a gullible public are his promises to grant special privileges to pressure groups controlling votes.

If there is anything that Franklin Delano Roosevelt has not promised, at the expense of the hard-working American taxpayer, to give to some group, people, or nation, let someone name it. And always—yes, always—without a single exception, the cost of his giving has been, and in the future will be, paid by Americans.

He and his supporters have frightened, and they continue to attempt to frighten, the people by referring to the depression, which was brought on during Herbert Hoover's administration by the last war, and the destructiveness which comes with every war.

But the public debt and the deficits of that depression period, which the President pretended to fear, were but drops in the bucket when compared to the deluge of public indebtedness which now, and hereafter, threatens to overwhelm us.

Nor can the President, the New Dealers and his communistic allies excuse themselves by saying that the debt is the result of the war. Long before the war appeared on the horizon, the waste, the extravagance, the downright misapplication of public funds by the administration and the New Dealers were adding billions to the public debt, and that at a rate of increase more rapid than ever before.

The President promised economy. He gave us extravagance. He promised a lessening of Government agencies, bureaus, and employees, and he more than doubled their number. And this before the war. He said he would drive the money changers from the temple. He brought in a horde of profiteers and racketeers, who are still with us in ever-increasing numbers.

He told us the rights of the citizens would be respected, but through a system of orders, rules, and directives the citizen can no longer obtain equal justice under law and must bow to the will of an administrative dictator. Under the plea that added power was necessary to successfully prosecute the war, the President and his supporters have made it impossible for the average citizen to carry on his business, either of farming, manufacturing, transportation, or merchandising in accordance with the laws of supply and demand, or with common sense and good judgment. Recourse to the courts and to justice is denied them.

ROOSEVELT'S RECORD

Mr. Roosevelt, the New Dealers, and his communistic allies insist that he is the indispensable man, the only man who can save our people from chaos and destruction. They base their claim upon his record.

That record is one of broken promises, misstatements of a utopia which the President promised but knew could not be established, the creation of a mirage which gave the vision of a land of plenty and of happiness without work or effort.

It is a record which discloses a loss of liberty to the average citizen; a creation of opportunity for graft and racketeering for the unprincipled; the enslavement of the average citizen, including the industrial worker, who has been misled by the granting of temporary special privileges.

THE ADMINISTRATION DEFIES THE EXISTENCE OF ECONOMIC LAWS

The President and his advisers know, for the history of the world teaches the lesson in no unmistakable terms, that as long as human nature remains as it is, the law of supply and demand will operate; that some people will be rich, some poor, and some exist in an economic status in between.

Rationing is necessary when, and only when, there is a shortage of the necessities of life, either of food, clothing, fuel, or shelter. The purpose of rationing is to prevent those who have money from buying and hoarding, keeping from those whose existence depends upon their possession, the necessities of life. Under no other theory can it be justified as applied to a free people.

When the exigencies of war made it apparent that, to feed and to arm the rest of the world, our people must produce more and perhaps do with less, the administration, ever ambitious for power, instead of adopting an over-all policy of limiting the percentage of increase paid or charged for both services and commodities, attempted to establish universal rationing; attempted to fix the sales price of millions of items.

The task was beyond human accomplishment and now, from yesterday's paper, we learn that, while the quantity of the necessities of life which might be purchased has been limited, while attempts have been made to fix prices, instead of there being a scarcity of food, of those things necessary to carry on the war, there is a surplus.

Yesterday's press told us that an abandoned limestone mine in Kansas is to be turned into the world's largest storage plant, to receive eggs, lard, and other food products, by September 1; that the Army and the Navy are considering the use of caves and abandoned mines to hold their food supplies; that the War Food Administration is selling between eight and ten million dollars worth of food each month, but that, in spite of such sales, its reserve is now growing; that it is now holding 2,000,000 tons of food in this country and has some sort of a claim on perhaps three times that much stock-piled abroad, and that this is in addition to what the Army and the Navy are holding and to the harvest of this year.

We all know from recent press dispatches of millions of dozens of eggs which the Government has found it impossible to use or to sell, except for fertilizer purposes.

Nevertheless, the bureaucrats continue to grasp for power and insist upon being given the opportunity to control the production and the disposal of the necessities of life.

WHY CHANGE OUR FORM OF GOVERNMENT?

Intelligent individuals concede that private American business enterprise has shown itself to be the most fruitful method of production known to mankind.

Today, after more than 160 years of existence under the Constitution—so often ridiculed and slightingly referred to by the New Dealers and the Communists, except when they come in conflict with the law and ask for its protection—our Republic has grown to manhood and our armed forces are those most feared by the Japanese and the Germans.

To us every nation involved in this war against the Axis Powers has looked, and still looks, for food and clothing; for tanks, trucks, guns, ammunition, planes, and ships to carry on and to win the war, and they all look to us for funds to rebuild, rehabilitate their destroyed cities and industries. They expect us to aid in feeding and clothing them after the battle is over—yes, to reestablish them in business after the war is over, in competition with our own industrialists, our own American working men and women.

Yet, Mr. Roosevelt has the effrontery to slightingly refer to and to ridicule as the "horse-and-buggy days" those days during which our ancestors built, upon the foundation laid by the forefathers, our present might and power.

The President had the conceit to unjustly criticize the Supreme Court, which for more than 160 years had stood guard over the rights of the humblest citizen, and to attempt, without regard to legal provisions, to pack that Court and make it subservient to his will.

Neither the President, the New Dealers, nor the Communists can truthfully deny that we are the most powerful, the most resourceful, the most charitable, the most unselfish Nation in all the world; that we have shown, down through our existence, that we are more willing to extend aid to the unfortunate than any other people. Yet, notwithstanding the facts shown by the record, they insist that the Constitution is outmoded, has outlived its usefulness; that our way of government, of living together, and of creating opportunities for happiness and prosperity, should be changed.

THE COMMUNIST PARTY

Mr. Roosevelt's Attorney General, Mr. Biddle, has officially characterized the Communist Party as dedicated to the overthrow of our Government by force. Mr. Roosevelt himself is familiar with the history of the Communist Party. He knows what it is. He is aware of its objectives and, in a speech at Syracuse in September 1936, he said:

> I have not sought, I do not seek, I repudiate the support of any advocate of communism. * * * That is my position. It always has been my position. It always will be my position.

But that statement was made before the malignant, consuming cancer of ambition attacked him, became his master. Today, although the Communist Party, its methods, and its objectives remain the same as they were in 1936, Mr. Roosevelt, seeking a fourth term, does not repudiate its support.

The head of the Communist Party, Earl Browder, convicted and serving time in prison, was, by Mr. Roosevelt, pardoned for the purpose, he said, of creating national unity. And straightway, from the day of his liberation down to the present moment, Earl Browder, the leader of the Communists in America, has been advocating the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt, and to date, notwithstanding his prior acknowledgment of the destructiveness of the Communist Party purpose, the President accepts the active support of Communists, Communist dollars, and the Communist organization.

In the draft of the program of the Communist Party of Michigan, among other things, it was stated:

> I. Political action is the order of the day: From the national committee resolution: "The 1944 elections are the most important Presidential and congressional elections since those of 1864. * * *"
> II. * * *: A primary task is the reelection of our Commander in Chief. * * *. This means: 1. Every Communist and Progressive must devote himself to organizing a crusade to draft Roosevelt.

The Communists, the Communist Party, through its leaders, its workers and its dollars, is actively campaigning for Candidate Roosevelt. They are political bedfellows. The record establishes that fact. It cannot be successfully denied.

In the August 1944 issue of Ammunition, which is the official publication of the education department of the International Union, United Automobile, Aircraft, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America—U. A. W.-C. I. O.—and which is actively and enthusiastically devoted to the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt to a fourth term, on page 8 you will find an article by Maurice Sugar, general counsel, U. A. W.-C. I. O., one of its most active members.

This is the same Maurice Sugar who, in 1917, in a United States Federal district court, entered a plea of guilty to a charge of conspiracy to induce persons to refuse to register in accordance with the Conscription Act then in force. He also entered a plea of guilty the same year to a charge of failing to comply with the Conscription Act then in force. He was sentenced to prison, and when he appealed his convictions were affirmed and the official record thereof will be found in 252 Federal 74, 252 Federal 79, and 248 United States Reports 578.

When this same Maurice Sugar, who is now so actively advocating the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt, was a candidate for city councilman in the city of Detroit, the Communist Party put out a campaign document asking the voters of that city to support him. Among other things, that document said:

> Vote for Comrade Sugar who is the friend of the foreign born and he will aid in making the revolution. Comrade Sugar has come out definitely against the church which has kept the people in darkness and ignorance for 1,900 years. His slogan is "close the churches." * * * Down with religion which is the opium which the ruling class feed you to keep you satisfied with the miserable existence which you lead.
> There is no God.
>
> To all the friends who hate the smug priests of the Catholic Church and the slimy hypocritical ministers of the Protestant churches.
> To all those who are oppressed by this damnable government we address this message. Vote for our candidate. Our candidate is Maurice Sugar, the International Labor defense attorney and member of the Communist Party.
> Remember the election is November 8. For further information about the Communist Party call or write to 5969 Fourteenth Street, telephone Garfield 9660.
>
> Comradely yours,
>
> _____ _____,
> District Organizer, District No. 7.

Today, Maurice Sugar and that same organization—never, so far as I know, having renounced any of its political beliefs as advocated at that time—are asking for the reelection of Candidate Roosevelt; and Candidate Roosevelt, President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of our armed forces, has, so far as I have been able to learn, never repudiated their present support.

It is true that the Communist Party, like a convict with a long criminal record, recently sought an alias, a new name. In its program for its Michigan State convention, it stated that one of the organizational and constitutional questions that would face the 1944 Communist convention was, "What is to be the new name of the Communist organization?"

At the national convention of the Communist Party, realizing that liberty-loving Americans had no use for its teachings, the Communist organization sought for and adopted a new name under which to carry on its old program. At the national convention it was voted that hereafter the organization should be known as Communist Political Association. And that is the name under which the ex-convict, the head of the Communist Party, Earl Browder, and the party itself, through its workers, its publications, and its dollars, now asks for the reelection of Candidate Roosevelt.

ANOTHER POLITICAL BEDFELLOW

Another political bedfellow of Mr. Roosevelt is the C. I. O. Committee for Political Action, with Sidney Hillman, with his foreign ideologies and his campaign slush fund, at its head. That committee has millions of dollars to spend—dollars which, with the aid of the administration, it has filched from the pockets of the workingmen.

It is working actively for the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt and it, too, in an attempt to deceive the people as to who was actually behind its campaigning, changed its name—from the "C. I. O. Political Action Committee" to the "Citizens Political Action Committee."

Still more recently, that organization, in addition to attempting to assess every worker in a war industry, every worker belonging to a C. I. O. union, a dollar to be used for campaign purposes, has caused veterans who had returned from the war and found jobs in industry to be discharged because of their failure to contribute to its campaign fund for Mr. Roosevelt's reelection, and has also attempted to collect campaign contributions from employers with which the union was dealing for the renewal of employment contracts.

Mr. Roosevelt's New Deal administration, through the War Labor Board, compels the blood relatives of men who are fighting and dying across the seas for the preservation of this Nation, if they would hold their jobs, to make contributions out of their earnings to a political fund to be used for the reelection of the Commander in Chief, or to lose their membership in the union. Think that one over, and, if you can think of a more arbitrary, unjust, despotic, Hitlerite act or procedure, name it.

NEW DEAL ASHAMED OF ITS NAME

Candidate Roosevelt himself apparently is ashamed or afraid of the implications associated with the name with which his political offspring was christened, for, like the Communist Party and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, he recently sought to get rid of the name and the unpleasant association of ideas which go with it by suggesting that it be called the Win-the-War party. His egotism is illustrated in the unexpressed thought that no one but New Dealers, Communists, and fourth-termers were fighting or contributing to the war.

BIRDS OF A FEATHER

There are two old and much-abused sayings. They are: "Birds of a feather flock together," and "Men are known by the company they keep."

You are familiar with the facts which show that Candidate Roosevelt, his backers and supporters, the New Dealers, the labor politicians and the labor racketeers, as distinguished from workers themselves, and the Communists are all working toward the same end and the same purpose. So judge for yourselves as to whether the fourth-term advocates, the New Dealers, the Communists, are birds of a feather, are all flocking together, all working for the one purpose of establishing here, before the war is over, a form of government which is not a republic.

In the early days of the New Deal there may have been some excuse for people being misled, blind to the issues to be decided at an election. The New Deal during the past 11 years has demonstrated its purpose. The Communists, the money changers who have returned to the temple, and the advocates of a fourth term, have made their purpose—the continuation in office of one man, government by bureaucrats, by directives rather than by law, the destruction of the citizen's right of appeal to the courts, the curtailment of his liberty—clear to all.

If these are the things the people want, it is their privilege to impose them upon themselves. If, on the contrary, they want to restore the Government of the forefathers, preserve the liberty and the opportunities which have made us the envy of all people, they have that privilege, come the November election.

If the people want Maurice Sugar, writing in the August issue of the U. A. W.-C. I. O. publication, convicted, as he was, of a conspiracy to violate a prior conscription law, enacted to carry on the last World War, to tell them what to do to win this war, that is their privilege.

If the people want to let Sidney Hillman, the apostle of foreign ideologies; Earl Browder, the ex-convict and head of the Communist Party, buy an election, select their President, that is their privilege.

If the people of this country want to go along with the Communist Party, whose purpose, as Attorney General Biddle said, is the overthrow of our Government by force; the Communist Party, which not so long ago, in its appeal for votes, stated "There is no God"; called for the votes of all those "who hate the smug priests of the Catholic Church and the slimy, hypocritical ministers of the Protestant churches," and who asked all those "who are oppressed by this damnable Government," to vote for their candidate, that, too, is their privilege.

It is also our prilivege to repudiate the whole crew of wreckers and once more, by our ballots, express our faith in God, the efficacy of religion, the soundness of our Republic.

Britain's Isolationism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a remarkable editorial by John S. Knight, a distinguished American publisher, which appeared in the Detroit Free Press Sunday, August 20, 1944, one of his newspapers. This editorial analyzes Anglo-American post-war problems and merits the consideration of all Americans.

The editorial, Mr. Speaker, is far more remarkable, because up to the time that Mr. Knight was sent to England by the administration's O. W. I.—Office of War Information—he was one of America's outstanding internationalists.

JOHN S. KNIGHT ANALYZES ANGLO-AMERICAN POST-WAR PROBLEMS

THE EDITOR'S NOTEBOOK

Are the British putting it over on us? I tried to answer that question as best I could in a series of friendly discussions based upon 10 months' observation of the official London scene.

In general, the answer was that the British are fearful of post-war American competition, are striving desperately to hold their world markets, and are determined to avoid going deeper into debt or to liquidate any more foreign holdings.

It is a policy based upon extreme realism and whether or not the British "put it over on us" would seem to depend upon the degree of realism that our own Government adopts in its dealings with the very able and clever British statesmen employed by Winston Churchill to prevent the "liquidation of the British Empire."

You have read much in the last few weeks about post-war lend-lease. It has been widely heralded as the means to be employed in reconversion of the world from war to peace. It has been justified as the method by which United States post-war trade will be promoted.

It is offered as a partial answer to the threat of depression and unemployment which may follow the sudden curtailment of United States exports now running at the rate of nearly a billion and a half a month.

I think all of us realize that the United States must play a large part in the rehabilitation of war-torn Europe. Both political parties are committed to that general principle.

The question is: How far should we go? To what extent are we prepared to draw upon our own resources in order to help a world economy? How large a load are United States taxpayers willing to carry?

Let's bring the situation up to date:

1. The present Lend-Lease Act permits nations entitled to lend-lease to place orders until July 1, 1945, and delivery of goods under those contracts can be continued until July 1, 1948. The only qualification is that lend-lease contracts must be in some way related to the general subject of "defense."

2. England wants lend-lease to continue after the fall of Germany and probably in the transition period following the defeat of Japan.

3. Russia has notified the United States that as soon as the war ends, she will begin paying for everything received, either in cash or credit. At the end of last May, lend-lease goods sent to Russia totaled $5,600,000,000.

4. France estimates that $2,000,000,000 will be needed in reconstruction funds after her liberation from Germany. It is conceded that years will elapse before the French economy could be reorganized to finance reconstruction through orthodox methods.

5. China is presently in a state of runaway inflation. The billions required to modernize its transportation, industry, and agriculture are not at hand. China is likewise a candidate for extended lend-lease favors.

6. South America has no need of post-war lend-lease. United States purchases of war materials and essential commodities have given these countries ample funds with which to deal through usual trade channels.

Added to these will come requests for help from Poland, Czechoslovakia, Holland, Belgium, and Denmark.

Without question, the devastated countries of Europe are entitled to a first and compassionate consideration.

U. N. N. R. A., the United Nations relief and rehabilitation organization, has already been granted $800,000,000 by Congress to aid in a work of mercy and reconstruction.

I anticipate no difficulty in dealing with Russia. For many years prior to this war, Russia purchased supplies and equipment from the United States through the Amtorg Trading Corporation and there was never any question raised about Russia as a credit risk.

I freely predict that our post-war political and commercial relations with Russia will be very close. A hint of this is found in a recent edition of the London Daily Mail which states that "as things have turned out, we (the British) have observed that Washington and Moscow have a great many interests and policies in common, enough to make Britain's offices as a middleman and interpreter between her western and eastern partners both unnecessary and unwelcome. This is a development well worth considering."

Quite naturally, Russia will press for all the lend-lease aid she can get from us. But there is likewise a disposition on Russia's part to attain a greater economic and industrial stature, to make her home front as robust and efficient as her military machine, to take her rightful place as one of the great powers of the world.

Rest assured that Russia has no intention of remaining permanently on the charity rolls.

But what about England?

We were told recently by the National Association of Manufacturers that the British are looking to the United States to support their domestic economy after the war. Their representatives are reputed to have informed our leaders that such action is absolutely necessary to stave off a serious economic situation in England.

According to the National Association of Manufacturers, the suggested program would cost the United States taxpayers two and one-half billions a year over and above all war requirements.

The National Association of Manufacturers makes the further point that because of its awkward position, "we have allowed the United Kingdom to sell billions of dollars' worth of lend-lease foodstuffs, clothing, and other civilian necessities and pocket the cash, which they, in turn, used to pay for imports from British colonies and dominions and Latin-American nations. Also, we have allowed her to sell huge quantities of lend-lease goods in the Middle East, the Far East, Africa, and Spain."

Never doubt an Englishman's ability to look after his own interests. We say this not in disparagement but with considerable admiration.

Through our help, the British have managed to keep their entire national debt, including some five and a half billions owed us from the last war, and which is still carried on their books, in the neighborhood of 75 billions, while our own debt is soaring to an estimated 300 billions.

Nor does England intend to lose her world markets. While we toss harsh words at Spain's dictator, clever Winston Churchill made a speech in Commons which inferred that good old Franco was not such a bad toff at that and why should he start kicking Spain around when after all, Franco kept the Germans out of the Iberian Peninsula, didn't he?

Or take the case of the Argentine. The British press is vigorously critical of Secretary Hull's bitter words about Argentina. Let's quote a few paragraphs:

"Mr. Hull has spoken of the Argentine in language similar to that employed by Russia about the Polish emigres.

"He has been supported by a chorus of newspaper editorials and columns whose extravagant distortions have worked up public opinion to a state of ignorant belligerency against the 'good neighbor' that won't be ordered about.

"Argentina has found herself in the same state as a small Chicago shopkeeper of the old days who refused to pay 'protection' to the local gang.

"Now if Argentina were a far-away country of which we in Britain know nothing, we could fairly sit this particular crisis out.

"But she is an old friend of Britain's—nearly 150 years of unbroken friendship between us—and she had the largest British colony outside the Empire.

"It is indeed strange that Mr. Hull, a southerner, does not better understand the Latin-American fear of Yankee 'carpet-bagging' both now and after the war."

Neither Churchill's remarks nor the quotations from the Daily Mail sound much like antifascism, do they?

But they typify top-flight official views in London. The Daily Mail, owned by Lord Rothermere, carries proudly on its masthead each day the legend, "For King and Empire." Its opinions are usually in complete accord with those of the Prime Minister.

Both Churchill and the Daily Mail are thinking in terms of post-war trade. They don't intend to lose any good customers if they can help it.

While the United States is using a justifiable moral and economic force against those of the neutrals who won't play our game up to the hilt, the British are totting it all up in terms of pounds, shillings, and pence.

When a Britisher discusses any phase of internationalism, he is actually weighing the fortunes of the British Empire. Basically, a Britisher is as nationalistic as a citizen of Moscow or a Midwest American farmer.

Considering that England's economic life is almost wholly dependent upon export and import trade, whereas ours prior to the war was something less than 10 percent, the British position is at least understandable.

I have said many times that it would be a mistake for us to think that eventually we can dominate the markets of the world.

Even as our foreign trade expands well above the prewar figures, there must be similar expansion for nations like England if we are seeking a stable world economy and peace in the years to come.

It has already been demonstrated that it is possible to reach agreements on oil and post-war aviation. Further progress can be made in international agreements without embracing the theory of cartelization. This development is all to the good.

But how are we as American citizens going to feel about underwriting England's domestic economy?

Remember, the bill will be in the neighborhood of two and one-half billions a year, equivalent to one-half the entire United States Federal Budget prior to 1932.

As of July 1, 1944, lend-lease aid by the United States to our Allies totaled more than 27 billions. Forty billions more have been authorized by Congress.

Based upon present calculations, our own post-war annual budget will probably exceed the $25,000,000,000 mark. This amount will increase in direct proportion to the length of time it takes to win the war.

Taxes will be stratospherically high for many, many years to come.

What may eventually became the popular American opinion was well expressed the other day by the Miami Herald:

"It is inconceivable that any large group of English would seriously consider asking the United States to go deeper into debt to save Britain from incurring debts that would more nearly equal our own.

"The far-flung empire—from India through Canada, Jamaica and South Africa—has populations and resources much greater than those of the United States. Unlimited credit and goods probably will be extended to Britain by the United States, but it is doubtful that we will wish to plunge on into debt by putting this assistance on a charity basis.

"Being in the empire business entails vast sacrifices and responsibilities which British populations have been willing to make for centuries. The empire has been saved from political extinction by all of the United Nations. None of the Britishers we are acquainted with would now consider asking that United States citizens undergo new privations to bolster the empire's economy."

Well, it may seem inconceivable, but that is precisely what the British Government intends to do. Its envoys are even now in Washington sounding out official and congressional reactions to the scheme.

As time runs on you will be hearing much more about it.

We respectfully suggest that it might be in order for Candidates Roosevelt and Dewey to say a few words on the subject during the campaign.

That is, if and when the campaign starts.

The Proposed Missouri Valley Authority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 18, 1944, captioned "M. V. A. goes to the Senate." The editorial deals with the proposed Missouri Valley authority which is provided for in a bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY]. The Senate will recall that on last Friday the Senator from Montana made a very able and enlightening speech on the bill and its provisions, and the reasons for the establishment of a Missouri Valley authority.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

M. V. A. GOES TO THE SENATE

This day—Friday, August 18—may prove to be a momentous one in the history of the Missouri Valley. On this day, Senator MURRAY of Montana introduced into the Congress of the United States a bill for the creation of a Missouri Valley Authority.

The sweep and grandeur of this legislative proposal is to be measured in terms of the 7,000,000 human beings it affects, and the vast territory of 530,000 square miles—more than 17 percent of the area of continental United States—that it embraces.

In his speech to the Senate today, Senator MURRAY correctly said that "the full development of resources proposed under this bill might well rank as the most important national development since the Louisiana Purchase, of which much of this territory was a part."

The purpose of the Murray bill—which, of course, was modeled after the Tennessee Valley Authority, now in its twelfth year—is to provide one unified authority over the Missouri River. It is one big plan for one big river.

The bill is designed to prevent floods, which, in the past 2 years alone, have caused damages of more than $100,000,000; to irrigate the arid upriver country and reclaim millions of acres for cultivation; to promote navigation; to foster commerce among the States; to strengthen the national defense; to conserve water, soil, and forest resources; and to promote the general welfare of the United States.

In his speech of introduction, published elsewhere in this newspaper today, Senator MURRAY made a masterful presentation of the case for an M. V. A. He told how, after generations in which rival and competing Government agencies and bureaus have futilely tried to solve the river's problems piecemeal, it has now become necessary to consider the river as a whole under the new techniques and scientific management which have proved so successful in the Tennessee Valley.

He told how floods have devastated millions of acres of farm land, how the water table has been lowered, how soil has been washed away, how lands athirst for water in the upper river have been denied it. He expressed the yearning of the people along the river's 2,470 miles when he said that they want the waters of the valley husbanded; the floods controlled; navigation for cheap transportation; the use of the river to provide electric power for homes, farms, and industry; the basic resource of soil fertility protected; the development of industry; the arid and semiarid lands of the upper river made rich and productive.

When President Roosevelt asked Congress to create the T. V. A., he said:

"If we are successful here (in the Tennessee Valley), we can march on, step by step, in a like development of other great natural territorial units within our borders."

The pilot plant that is T. V. A. has been successful beyond the dreams of the President or of the venerable Senator Norris, known as the father of T. V. A. It has redeemed a region which was crumbling to ruin and has made it one of the model territories of the country, to the point that the principles it embodies have now been given world-wide implication. What has been done for the Tennessee River can be done for the Danube, the Amazon, and the Yangtze-kiang.

And what has been done in the way of unified management of the Tennessee's waters can be done for the Missouri.

Senator Murray's bill, of course, will have its enemies. There always are obstacles to progress and reform. There always are those who stubbornly oppose new ideas and new principles. But his proposal is so sound, so good, and so promising, so majestic in its scope that sooner or later, it must prevail.

A Sensible Farm Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial which recently appeared in the Salina (Kans.) Journal. The editorial is entitled "A Sensible Farm Program."

The approval of the suggestions offered here would go a long ways toward giving us a contented and prosperous national agricultural program.

A SENSIBLE FARM PROGRAM

For more than 3 score and 10 years the Journal has been fighting for a square deal for agriculture. That is not only because of the economic value of farmers and stockmen who are financially strong, but because, by and large from this group comes the most independent, as well as some of the best informed votes in the country.

They vote for their own interests sometimes, but that often is in self defense, and not because they do not know what they are doing, or love their country so little that they are not sorry that conditions force them to do so. Recently a group of farm leaders met to discuss the farm situation, and to outline ways to "have a relatively high proportion of farms of family size operated by the owners."

Convinced, as we are, of the common sense of such a plan, we believe that most of the States of the middle west will also approve and endorse the idea of family sized farms. To further this goal, 11 recommendations have been made that should be studied by every citizen who wants to see Kansas a more prosperous State because of the greater opportunities it offers to a larger number of people. Here are the 11 planks:

"1. The way should be kept open for the majority of farm tenants to become farm owners.

"2. Continuous operation of the home farm by succeeding generations of the same family should be encouraged.

"3. Appropriate measures should be taken to discourage the inflation of land prices.

"4. Farm mortgage terms need to be so drawn as to facilitate and maintain the ownership of farms by those who operate them.

"5. Appropriate and effective steps should be taken to improve landlord-tenant relations.

"6. Tenure arrangements should be developed that will safeguard and improve our basic farm resource, the soil.

"7. Plans need to be developed for the post-war adjustment of rents and wages.

"8. Improvements should be added to many farms, both owner-operated and tenant-operated to encourage the most efficient operation.

"9. Families now living on inadequate farms should be encouraged to locate on better farms or to obtain better employment.

"10. New land programs should be developed in areas near cities where there is a merging of urban and rural economy.

"11. Post-war, back-to-the-land movements should be carefully guided and controlled."

War's Challenge—Youth's Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, all of us are extremely interested in what American youth are thinking during these critical days. I include as part of my extension of remarks today one of the most clear and well-thought-out statements on this subject by Miss Margaret Power, daughter of M. W. Power, of Salinas, Calif. These remarks were given at the commencement exercises at Salinas Union High School on June 4, 1944, and appear to me to be so much to the point that I commend them to all Members of the House.

The young Americans of today face one of the greatest challenges ever presented to the youth of our Nation. We are engaged in a death struggle on a world battle front to save our democratic way of life. The young manhood of our Nation is setting aside plans for careers, education, and families, setting aside all that they have ever learned of fair play, to fight a war in which the major rule is kill or be killed. These boys are not going into battle because an emperor god has decreed so, or because a power-mad ruler has ordered it, but rather because they wish to fight for a cause and a way of life in which they believe. The American soldiers of today are not bitter; they are not railing against a fate which has deprived them of the days of their youth and made men of boys; rather they have accepted this battle as a job which must be done.

The young Americans of today are going into service with eager, receptive minds. They are anxious and willing to learn. The thousands of United States troops on the many battle fronts of today are building a foundation for the world of tomorrow. Our boys in khaki are seeing at first hand how the people of other lands live. They are gaining a knowledge of the problems, the cultures, and the peoples of the world. They are cementing friendships which will result in closer trade and cultural relations after the war. They are gaining an understanding of nations which will help to build a new, freer world. Isolation is a word which will become obsolete with our generation. In the post-war world things are going to be considered on a world instead of a national basis. Our boys—the future leaders of America—are now gaining valuable knowledge which will help them to become not only better citizens of the United States but better citizens of the world.

American youth is having its eyes opened. We are realizing, many of us for the first time, that ours is not the only country of importance. We are learning that other nations have good ideas. We are looking at our government with eyes freed from the propaganda of party and prejudice. The returning veterans are coming home with the determination to build not only a lasting peace but a better America.

This war is presenting a challenge to the character of American youth. The boys in service are making constant readjustments. Rigorous Army supervision and discipline is not easy to accept or become accustomed to—especially for our boys who are so used to individual freedom. Each soldier must evolve his own individual philosophy. He must find the answer to the death and destruction of war and accept it within himself. It is not easy to see a buddy fall wounded or dead, and know that your turn may be next; but this is exactly what our soldier boys at the fronts go through day after day. Only those who have experienced war can realize its horror—and they will not talk about it.

The youth of America has and is proving itself strong. Our boys have made a glorious and heroic record on the battlefields of Bataan and Guadalcanal. The boys who are coming home are strong and sure within themselves. They have lost their illusions, but they have not allowed themselves to become cynical. They have become masters of themselves.

The young women of America are fighting in this war. They are nursing our boys in the front-line trenches. They are wearing the Navy blue and the Army tans. They are working on the production lines of the Nation.

For the past 20 years, there has been a steady increase in the number of women entering the business world, but up until this war the number has been a definite minority. Now for the first time the young women of America are assuming an important place in the field of industry. They are proving their dexterity, their worth. When the boys return the young women of our country will be able to greet them proudly. They will have done their part in the fight. More important, however, they will have gained a broader perspective, a keener knowledge of the problems of labor and industry. They will be able to assume their place in the post-war world with confidence.

The young women of America are proving their character. They are facing separation, perhaps death, from their loved ones with courage. They are picking up the threads of their lives and carrying on in the face of tragedy.

American youth is answering the challenge of the war. We are answering those of the older generation who have said of us that we are weak, pleasure seeking. We have demonstrated and are demonstrating that we can not only carry on in the face of adversity but that we can learn from tragedy and plan for a happier better world.

Insurance for Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, insurance for veterans is an extremely complicated subject which has been much simplified in a radio talk recently made by Capt. Kenneth C. Bradley, national insurance officer for the Disabled American Veterans.

Incidentally, Captain Bradley is an old constituent of mine, having long been a national service officer for the D. A. V. in Michigan. He is a retired wounded veteran of World War No. 1, who during the last 16 years has been devoting practically all of his time to assisting disabled veterans in their multivarious problems.

Captain Bradley's outline of the various types of insurance policies provided for our servicemen and ex-servicemen by the Veterans' Administration, I am sure, helps to make this subject much better understood by those who will take the trouble to read his excellent radio talk as here quoted in full as follows:

Life insurance, a subject concerning which most Americans are quite familiar, in time of war assumes entirely different aspects than is the case under normal conditions of life. This is particularly true with respect to the members of our armed forces and their dependents. Private insurance companies, by reason of the greatly increased risks to reserves, which participation in the grim tasks of warmaking entails, are unable to assume such risks when policy holders enter the armed forces to do battle with the enemy. As a result, most insurance policies contain a so-called war clause, which, in effect, precludes the payment of death or disability benefits where the death or disability is brought about by the hazards of military service.

To offset this inability on the part of private insurers the United States Government has, from time to time, provided insurance protection to members of its armed forces. At the present time all enlisted and commissioned personnel are permitted to carry from $1,000 to $10,000 of this protection. There are two types; namely, United States Government life insurance and national service life insurance.

Only those persons who were members of the active military forces prior to October 8, 1940, are eligible, under the law, to the former, whereas all who were in such service on that date or may have since entered such service are, or were, eligible to carry the latter, provided certain time and health requirements are met. To date upward of 12,000,000 policies have been issued by the Veterans' Administration.

All policies provide for payment of benefits to a designated beneficiary in the event of the death of the insured, provided, of course, premiums were timely paid. Premiums may be, and in most instances are, paid by deduction from the pay of the insured while he or she is in the active military service. Upon discharge therefrom, however, other arrangements must be made by the insured either by direct remittance or by deduction from disability pension, compensation, or retirement pay, if any. Provisions for payment of benefits, permitted beneficiaries, and types of permitted plans, as between Government life insurance and national service life insurance differ materially.

Military personnel engaged in the prosecution of World War No. 1 were issued Government life insurance on a yearly renewable term plan, in amounts of from $1,000 to $10,000, payable, in the event of the death of the insured, to his designated beneficiary or beneficiaries. Such beneficiaries were limited to certain specified relatives of the insured. In addition, the policy provided for the payment of monthly benefits to the insured on account of permanent and total disability. Subsequently, provisions were made for the conversion of this term insurance to other plans comparable with the commonly known plans of private insurance agencies. In all policies issued, whatever the plan, there was contained a permanent and total disability clause, together with the provision, on payment of additional premiums, for payment of monthly benefits on account of total disability (not necessarily permanent) which continues for at least 4 consecutive months. Limitations on the class of permitted beneficiaries was practically eliminated.

Until October 8, 1940, on which date the National Service Life Insurance Act became law, eligibility to Government life insurance included members of the regular military forces during peacetime. Thereafter the privilege of securing original policies of United States Government life insurance was canceled except as to those applications then pending.

The National Service Life Insurance Act, under which the great majority of present members of the armed forces are now covered, falls far short of its predecessor with respect to the benefits it provides. The outstanding difference is the lack of a provision for payment of benefits to the insured on account of permanent and total disability. The nearest approach to this is a provision for waiver of payment of premiums during the continuous total disability of the insured, which commenced subsequent to the effective date of the insurance and which has existed for 6 or more consecutive months. Persons whom the insured may name as beneficiaries are limited to the widow, widower, child, parent, brother, or sister of the insured. The term "parent" includes those who may have stood in loco parentis to the insured for at least 1 year prior to the insured's entry into active service. All national service life insurance is originally issued under the 5-year-level-premium term plan, and may be converted after 1 year to ordinary life, 20- or 30-payment life. No other plan is provided.

Time does not permit discussion of the many phases of these insurance plans, but the foregoing outline indicates that there is need for amending legislation to equalize the benefits afforded our fighting men and women.

The Disabled American Veterans in concert with other major veteran organizations has sponsored legislation, now pending before the respective committees of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, which is designed to correct the manifest inequalities existing between the two types of insurance authorized by existing law. The legislation when adopted would, we believe, provide for the men and women and their dependents a protection which, by and large, is comparable to that afforded the veteran of World War No. 1 and the peacetime soldier, sailor, and marine. Meanwhile, we are continuing our activities designed to assist the service men and women and their dependents in securing all such benefits to which they may now be lawfully entitled and to advise all who may wish such service through our Nation-wide service department. We have experienced paid representatives in all or most of the regional facilities of the Veterans' Administration, any one of whom is ready and willing, without fee, to assist in this work. The Washington staff is located at room 543, Munsey Building, and room 156, Veterans' Administration. Your speaker specializes on the subject of insurance and, like the other members of the staff, will be pleased to assist anyone desiring such aid on insurance problems.

Americans of Japanese Descent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, after Japan's sneak attack on Pearl Harbor, it was natural and understandable that many Americans in their shock and anger should conclude that all persons of the Japanese race are by nature hopelessly treacherous and that even those born and educated in America could never be trusted as true, loyal American citizens.

But in the end we Americans usually make up our minds on the basis not of snap judgments or prejudices, but on the basis of evidence. A good deal of incontrovertible evidence has already been accumulated such as the official reports that not a single case of sabotage was carried out in Hawaii by the Americans of Japanese descent, even though they constitute 39 percent of the population and had an ideal opportunity to do incalculable damage during those first few days of confusion.

Then the most thorough examination by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of those placed in relocation camps in this country revealed that the overwhelming majority has never given the slightest evidence of being a bit less loyal to the United States than, for example, the sons of Swedish, or German, or Polish, or English immigrants to this country. Those to whom any possible suspicion could be attached were carefully weeded out and segregated. The rate of voluntary enlistment in our armed services has been higher among the remainder than in any other minority group in America.

In the last week two extraordinarily eloquent bits of evidence appeared in the press, and I include them below; the first a news item in Time magazine of August 21, 1941:

RECORD

The War Department checked deep into the combat record of its famed One Hundredth Infantry Battalion, found that the Japanese-American combat outfit had set a top mark for gallantry. Already cited as a unit by Lt. Gen. Mark Clark (Time, July 31), the One Hundredth's soldiers had also won 9 Distinguished Service Crosses, 44 Silver Stars, 31 Bronze Stars, 3 Legion of Merit Medals.

Of the One Hundredth Battalion's 1,300 men—including 500 reserves—1,000 had been wounded in action, now wore Purple Hearts. Most remarkable record of all: Since the One Hundredth had been organized it had had not a single case of desertion or absence without leave.

Editorial from the American edition of the Shanghai Evening Post and Mercury, refugeeing temporarily in New York:

GOOD ADVICE TO NISEI

Under the heading "Don't be suckers, Nisei," the Japanese-American Committee for Democracy News Letter urges its readers not to accept the Socialist Party plank calling for a peace offensive.

The editor also pays his compliments to those who seize on a period of national emergency to build resentment over racial prejudice and discrimination. While holding that it is certainly necessary to perfect our democracy in due course, the editor declares that it is "far more necessary at this time to preserve the framework itself," adding: "It is the last word in specious, fatuous theorizing to give all of our attention to discussions on perfecting democracy while its very life and structure are threatened with Fascist bombs."

Finally he points out that "we Nisei (American born of Japanese origin) must choose our friends with extreme care. We cannot afford to be seduced by anybody and everybody merely because they happen to be good at shedding tears for us."

Anbody who can write courageous, sane words like those sounds to us like a true American. He may have the Sun Goddess for a remote ancestor, but his nearest living relative is Uncle Sam.

The Dies Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. SCANLON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. SCANLON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette:

PACKING A DIES COMMITTEE

By appointing two lame-duck Congressmen whose defeat was attributed to the opposition of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee to a three-man subcommittee to investigate the activities of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, Representative MARTIN DIES has shown precisely why his Committee on Un-American Activities stirs up so much controversy and produces so little remedial action.

When a congressional committee operating under the powers of Congress launches an investigation with public funds, one would think that the purpose of its inquiry should be to ascertain the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. If that were its objective, it would employ open-minded investigators to dig up all the facts relating to the subject under investigation; and then its members would study those facts judicially in an effort to determine what action Congress should take in correcting conditions or curbing activities which are fairly held to be un-American.

That Mr. DIES does not look upon a congressional investigation in that light and does not follow that procedure has been apparent for a long, long time; but his appointment of Representatives STARNES, of Alabama, and COSTELLO, of California, to a subcommittee to investigate the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is the best proof of that fact Mr. DIES has furnished. How can anyone except these two men, victims of C. I. O. political action, to conduct a fair, impartial, objective inquiry into the very activities which led to their defeat?

Certainly Mr. DIES did not appoint them to the subcommittee for such a purpose. By providing them with congressional power and public funds to use in getting even with their political foes, he virtually admits that his committee has been operating in this fashion all along.

Relation of the Home to Society

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech delivered by the Reverend John Schliepsick, of Hubbard, Iowa, before a meeting of lay members of the Lutheran churches in Waterloo, Iowa:

The Christian Parent Magazine defines the home as a spiritual relation between two personalities, who feel the same way about persons or things. Strictly speaking, a home consists of two persons only. Three or more persons in a family constitute a household. It is the mutual tie binding two people together that makes a home.

This human relationship of individuals to individuals is the foundation of the social life—is society. The association of the first couple on earth, established the first society, and to this day society is built upon the home. When God created man and woman, He placed them into a garden. This place where two people lived together in harmony and mutual understanding was the ideal home. Paradise was the ideal society, because all members of society were walking with God and serving God and each other in perfect love.

Since the fall of man into sin, this perfect and ideal society has been destroyed. Hatred and selfishness has supplanted mutual love. Home is set against home, man against man. Society is in grave danger of destruction. Some years back the author of a book entitled, "The Decline of the West" made the prediction that the western civilization will utterly collapse. Why? Because the home is being destroyed. The family unit is broken up. Home is no longer a haven of security, but a place to eat and to sleep.

The true relation of the home to society is that of the heart to the body. It not only is a part of the body, but the body depends upon the heart for its life. Take the home life out of society and you have chaos. No nation will long endure without strong home ties. Build strong homes and you will have a strong nation, an enduring society. Look at China with over 4,000 years of culture. It is the close home ties that has kept that nation. China is the only society that has withstood the changes of time. China has remained a society based upon family ties.

Our Nation grew from a small colony to the strongest Nation in the world. Not by power of sword, but by the building of home life. Liberty and freedom for every family to live in and regulate their own home was the power that made us strong. American home life as it was established in the days of development was the greatest asset of the Nation. Fathers and mothers were bound together in mutual interest and spiritual devotion. Fathers and mothers considered the rearing of an upright family as the first objective. The family was united about the home altar. Daily the family would assemble for worship and on Sunday the pioneer and his family would meet in God's house. Parents were respected by the household, and children were brought up in the fear of God.

Today there is general alarm about the decline of law and order. We hear a constant cry about the delinquency of youth. We know that our society is tottering. We find that the juvenile courts cannot stem the tide of lawlessness. What is the matter? Friends, it is the decline of the home that is devitalizing our Nation. Added to the general decline of our people descends the ravages of war and its demoralizing influences. Not only the tons of bombs and blockbusters, but the disruption of the family life is destroying the heart of the Nation. Like a tidal wave, the disrupted home life is engulfing the world.

Fathers and mothers are working. Many mothers are neglecting their home, not of necessity, but for money and pleasures. It is an indictment of society if a mother must leave home to earn bread for her family. It is a disgrace if a mother neglects her children, if she sacrifices the welfare of the home by seeking employment outside of the home. It is sacrificing our youth on the altar of Baal.

In the days of Joshua, the same temptations confronted the people. God had given

Israel the land of promise. Through war and travel the people had come in contact with the heathen worship and home-destroying life. After showing the result of such worship of Baal, namely destruction of the nations, Joshua pleads with the people to weigh well the profit and loss of such idolatrous practice. Placing the great alternative before them, he challenges Israel to make the decision. Whom will you serve: God, the true God, or Baal; life or death, a strong nation or slavery?

Friends, we, too, stand before this alternative. Our Nation, society is on the balance. What will we do? Continue the path of neglected homes with its doom? Or will we as individuals and families choose the God given way of life? Back to a true home life where fathers and mothers rear their children in the fear of God? Where children love and obey their elders? There the family altar is established and where the family serves the Lord? Choose you whom you will serve. "As for me, and my house, we will serve the Lord."

Address of Hon. Mary T. Norton, of New Jersey, to Democratic Women of Illinois

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at a breakfast given by the Democratic Women of Illinois on July 20 at the Blackstone Hotel, Chicago, Ill., in recognition of my twentieth year in Congress:

Looking over this great audience of women from every part of the country and realizing much that is in your hearts today, I feel a great sense of responsibility lest I shall not measure up to what is expected of a woman who has served in Congress nearly 20 years. Looking back over those 20 years, I know there were many things I could have done better.

Being the first woman elected by the Democratic Party, I had no woman to guide me, no precedent established by any woman of my party. I may say in all sincerity I was frightened. When I took my oath of office I prayed that I might live up to that oath. I have tried to do so. To the people of the Thirteenth New Jersey District I owe more than I shall live long enough to repay. Their confidence and loyalty gave me courage many times to do the difficult thing. And the road has not been an easy one.

I tell you this today because we have here at our guest table six women candidates for Congress and I think I know just how they feel—the hopes and fears deep in their hearts. I sincerely hope every one will be elected for they are greatly needed in Congress. With 24 years of suffrage behind us, we are much wiser politically than we were at the time the suffrage was adopted. We have learned that everything we do, everything we have—all our hopes and fears are tied up with government and that surely should be a challenge to every woman in America to establish a basis from which to proceed.

We are meeting here today on the eve of what may well be the turning point of the future of the greatest democracy in all the world. What we do this year may decide the future of civilization itself. We must face the fact that no country can long survive the frightful devastation of war as it is fought today. This is our second great war within 25 years. We won the first war and lost the peace—forgot in the years following the war how to maintain peace—how to build for world peace and prevent future wars. Over and over again we heard the phrase, "It can't happen here" and there were those who, up to the time of that tragic December 7, 1941, at Pearl Harbor, refused to believe it could happen here.

Following World War No. 1, holding strictly to an honorable agreement with our European allies, we destroyed our Navy. We believed we could live peacefully as a self-contained nation, asking for nothing, wanting nothing. Those years should be known as the adolescent period of America. We have come out of that period and are now on our way to a virile manhood with matchless courage and determination to see to it that it never will happen again. We have given, and will continue to give, freely of our great resources to win this war. We have given that which is far more precious, our sons, our husbands, and our brothers. We have not complained too much, nor have we broken in our grief. The great spirit that is America is prepared for greater sorrow and much, much more sacrifice. We know we are paying the price of liberty, of freedom, that no matter how high the price, it is worth what we pay. We know that we have a world to rebuild, that we are the descendants of ancestors who fought and died generations ago to make possible the America we have enjoyed. We want that kind of an America to continue for our children and generations to follow. It has been a wonderful America and we are fighting to preserve it and to extend the blessings we have enjoyed, freedom, liberty, democracy, as we have known them, to all the world.

When we take our place in this campaign we must have a clear picture of what all this means to us. We must know the facts and be ready to explain how the present administration in Washington met its responsibility in the Second World War. The Democratic Party has nothing to fear in this campaign. Our record of 12 of the most eventful years in our history speaks for us. They were years of great trial when momentous decisions were imperative. Our President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, never faltered. He has with matchless courage guided our ship of state through rough waters. When, following 12 years of Republican administration, people and business had given way to despair, his voice rang out with determination and courage, destroying pessimism, bringing to America renewed faith in ourselves and in our future. We have come a long way since then. We have come a long way since we thought we had brought peace to the world—Armistice Day, November 11, 1918. We made our great mistake then by refusing to become partners in a world tribunal for peace, the League of Nations. We cannot afford to make a second mistake. Then, as now, under the leadership of a Democrat and a great President, Woodrow Wilson, we fought a tragic war. We hoped it would be a war to end all wars. We promised the men who died to make the world safe for democracy that their sacrifice would not be in vain. But we did not reckon with a Presidential campaign or a Senate apparently controlled by a few willful men to whom the destruction of President Wilson and the League of Nations was much more important than the future of America. Will history repeat itself?

World War No. 1 came as a great surprise to peace-loving Americans because we knew little about European politics. A violent partisan strength kept us out of that war until it was realized that Germany threatened the freedom of the seas. The isolationists of that day were just as blind as are the isolationists of this day, who refused to face facts until Japan attacked Pearl Harbor. Read the records of the Republicans in Congress before we were attacked if you do not believe me. Some few there were who placed their country above political advantage, but, by and large, it was left to the Democrats to prepare for what even a blind person could see in the distance. When the blow came votes changed because then, as in 1932 when our economy collapsed, even blind partisans knew that not the future of the Democratic Party nor the Republican Party was at stake but the future of America. Ours was the responsibility and how well we have met that responsibility and discharged our obligation to this day will be told by the future historians of our Nation. We are too close to the picture now to get a true perspective. The facts are that no nation in the history of the world can compare with what has been accomplished in these United States under the administration of President Roosevelt. I am finishing my twentieth year in Congress. I served under the Republican administration when our Navy was scrapped. I heard the late Congressman Butler, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Naval Committee, confess on the floor of the House with tears in his eyes how wrong he had been in advocating the destruction of the Navy and begged the House to start building a Navy to protect our shores. His was a voice crying in the wilderness. Later, when President Roosevelt in his messages to Congress repeatedly called attention to our inadequate Navy he was called "warmonger" by the opposition. When a bill came to the floor to protect Guam it was ridiculed by the opposition, as were all his plans to strengthen the defenses in the Pacific. Through the years every effort to develop air power was hampered.

In spite of the protests from most Republicans, and some Democrats, the administration kept plodding on, utilizing millions of unemployed for the building of airfields, hangars, and runways, and the improvement of 640,000 miles of what are now military highways. While Hitler took 10 years to build his ruthless war machine, we have, in 3 years, under the courageous, able leadership of our Commander in Chief and the efforts of labor—unregimented free men and women—built an Army, Navy, and merchant marine which have won the admiration of the world, and which will, we hope and pray, bring victory and a just peace to America and to the world in the very near future.

In the years of grave emergency more than a decade ago, the Democratic Party wrote a record of achievement that will go down in history and make some of its brightest pages. Criticism we have had, and plenty of it, but no person or group or party can destroy the record of accomplishment when our country was practically in despair. When the emergency receded and we had reason to look forward with high hopes to our future, war struck its deadly blow. Again a courageous, fighting President, with faith in God and in America, became truly our Commander in Chief. He mobilized a great Army for war and victory. Industries were changed practically overnight to prepare to meet the greatest challenge to democracy the world has ever known. The result is well known but I believe will bear repeating. More than 10,500 ships of all sizes and types have gone down the ways. Our Navy is now the largest in the history of the world. We are producing twice as many planes each month as do all the Axis countries combined. We have manufactured approximately 70,000 light and medium tanks, more than a million and a quarter trucks, and billions of rounds of ammunition—and right here may I pause to pay my tribute of affection and admiration to the men and women of the assembly lines and in the factories of the Nation—the soldiers of industry. To them has been given the task of supplying the great armed forces fighting and dying all over the world, and, regardless of the mistakes of a few, they have done a great job.

All of this could not just happen. It happened because we have a Commander in Chief directing, organizing, planning day and night for everything and anything that can happen with a country at war. It has been a tremendous job and will continue to be until the last gun is fired and our brave men return to a grateful and glorious America. In the meantime, it is our job to see to it that all our teams working together will not be called upon to work under a new leader. That way lies confusion, great loss of time, and much delay in the return of the men who are giving all they have to bring a quick end to the war and a return to their loved ones. We must have no interruption of the plans that have been worked out so carefully and, thank God, with a minimum of the loss that was anticipated. Our job, the job of every American, but particularly the job of every Democrat, must be to reelect Franklin Delano Roosevelt and a Congress to support him until victory is achieved and later when nations will sit at the peace table to decide the future of the world. This is a big program, but one that should stir the soul of every human being who believes in freedom and liberty. To the women here who represent the responsible leaders of our great party, may I say with all my heart that never in your time will you be called on for greater service. It must be a service of the soul in you. It is for God and country, for the preservation of everything we love and hold sacred. It is a service that can be accomplished by individual effort, hard work, and great courage. But, it can and I am sure will be accomplished. Remember that when the leaders of the world sit at the council table to make their great decisions, we expect that Winston Churchill will be there, that Joseph Stalin will be there, that Gen. Chiang Kai-shek will be there—that, at least, one woman will be there—that representatives from the other great nations will be there, but we know that the most important place at that table must be occupied by Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

I do not believe there is an indispensable man, but common sense would indicate that when a great decision is to be considered, the man best qualified to know the facts is the best man for that particular task. We know that certain selfish political interests are at work ruthlessly trying to destroy the leadership of our great President. Their arguments are very weak. They fear a fourth term dictatorship, etc. They seem to forget that when a democracy is at war it is necessary for Congress to delegate great power to the President. Congress did provide by law for the total mobilization of all our forces, but Congress could not go out and execute the mobilization. The power to do so had to be delegated to the President. He has used this power with great discretion. How well he succeeded is evidenced by the almost unbelievable story of all that has been accomplished. Indeed, we have reason to feel great pride in the record of the Democratic administration through 12 of the most important years of our history. Brought through a frightful depression in 1932—enacting the most progressive laws ever attempted by any nation through 1933 to 1940, following which we were plunged into a tragic war—converting peacetime industry into war production, and at the same time mobilizing 9,000,000 men to fight a war—all this accomplished with a minimum of distress and dislocation.

And so, as I have said earlier in my speech, the record speaks. It cannot be challenged. It will live long after the opposition critics have passed from the scene of political strife, an example to those who come after of how the great Democratic Party, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, mobilized for peace and prosperity and within a decade converted that prosperity to win a war and bring freedom, liberty, and justice to a stricken world.

A Soldier's Right To Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial entitled "A Soldier's Right To Vote," which appeared in the Belleville (Kans.) Telescope on April 10, 1944. This editorial was awarded the prize last month in the National Editorial Association contest which was open to daily and weekly newspapers throughout the country. The citation was what is known as the Herrick Award, and the award committee gave the Telescope second place in the Nation-wide contest. The editorial was published in the issue of April 10, 1944, and the award was a $25 Government bond. The editorial was based upon President Roosevelt's stinging message to Congress on the soldiers' absent vote bill, which message declared the vote of Congress was "a fraud upon the American people."

The editorial was written by A. Q. Miller, Sr., who, together with his sons, publishes the Belleville Telescope. I also wish to mention the fact that the Telescope has just celebrated its seventy-fifth anniversary. It was founded in 1870 and for 40 years has been under the management of the Millers.

It seems most incredible that anyone would make the picayune charge that Congress is trying to prevent the soldiers from voting. No wonder our national legislators bitterly resented the implication by President Roosevelt which stigmatized them not only before the soldiers, but before the American people as well. On the floors of Congress and in public interviews Congressmen resented the charge, which they said not only questioned their motives, but also their patriotism. The President challenged them to stand up and be counted on the soldiers' vote bill—and they did, and the vote in the House showed 215 votes for a State-rights bill as against 164 votes for the President's Federal bill. Bills which had been favorably considered by Congress gave the soldiers the right to vote, not only on President and Congressmen, but also on State and local candidates, whereas the proposed Federal bill favored by the President permitted soldiers to vote only on President, Vice President, and Members of Congress.

The exact language of the President's message to Congress, as quoted by the press was: "I consider this proposed legislation (State control) a fraud on the soldiers, sailors, and marines now training and fighting for us and for our sacred rights—and a fraud upon the American people." This is a serious charge; it impugns the motives of Congress and stigmatizes them before the American people and the soldiers in uniform, smacks too much like politics—and certainly does not promote national unity.

Honestly, how many American people over 3 years of age actually think our Congressmen would pass a law to prevent soldiers from voting—or do any other thing to deny them their full sovereign rights as American citizens? It is presuming a lot on the credulity of the people to think they would believe such a serious charge. No wonder the Congressmen got fighting mad and resented such an implication, when they were trying to pass an absent-voting law, within the limitations of the Constitution, which would permit soldiers to vote not only on Federal officers, but also on State and local candidates. It is the sworn duty of Congress to initiate and enact the laws and the sworn duty of the President to enforce the laws. One of the basic and fundamental criticisms of the New Deal by Congress and the public generally has been the tendency of the executive branch of government to usurp powers belonging to the legislative branch of government.

Commenting on this surprising attack on Congress by the President at a time when national unity is so much desired, the Kansas City Star says editorially: "The President's blast at Congress on soldier vote legislation has contributed nothing to the solution of a complicated problem—on the contrary it has stirred up resentment and may serve to delay the kind of legislation that is needed and the kind that even Mr. Roosevelt himself would desire. Why then did the President come in with his charge of fraud," says the Star, "directed at the previous Senate bill and thus arouse congressional resentment; obviously, it was to get administration credit for what might be done in an effective way, and to shift responsibility for what might be done in another way."

Government Waste of Paper Seems Boundless

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, orders to cut down the use of newsprint have appeared on at least half a dozen occasions during the past year's time. Many of the Nation's leading daily papers have printed notices indicating that they have been compelled to reject many columns of paid advertising in order to comply with Government requests. There has been no evidence whatever that the Federal Government is itself prepared to comply with its own request.

In the past few days literally dozens of pounds of mail have been poured into the office of this Congressman from Government agencies of one or another group. The volume of reports, governmental information data, revisions of civil-service requirements, together with explanatory texts testifying to the great success of one or another Federal bureau, seems to be almost endless.

One A. A. A. agent has accumulated a library of mimeographed reports, surveys, instructions, and memoranda in the short space of a few months. Not only does such an overwhelming weight of written matter breed confusion worse confounded, it also leads to the belief that there is just no sense whatever in reading or acting upon any of it.

Meanwhile, the clamor against wasting paper continues. Our people are asked to conserve every scrap of paper available, but what is paper for the goose is obviously not paper for the gander. Uncle Sam keeps right on turning the stuff out of his mammoth mimeographing plants by the ton.

Britain's White Paper Bars Rescuing of Jews of Hungary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, Regent Horthy, of Hungary, it was announced, will permit all Jews holding visas for Palestine to emigrate from Hungary. Great Britain has made no response. Her declared policy is set forth in the MacDonald White Paper promulgated in 1939, barring mass Jewish immigration in Palestine and restricting the owning of land by the Jews already there. The mounting horrors of mass executions and deportations have not moved her to deviate an inch from such policy. Now that Horthy's statement has been made public, the onus is upon Great Britain and the responsibility cannot be shifted.

The Horthy offer to permit the emigration of Jews from Hungary is at one with all the indications that Germany's doom is at hand. Before she crashes, the Jews of German-dominated territories will feel the full fury of the tumbling regime. Let there be no mistake about that. It is difficult then how in the face of such horror, Britain can stand by a policy which was one of her last acts of appeasement in 1939.

It has been learned today that despite Horthy's promise that deportation of Jews has stopped, trainloads of Hungarian Jews continue to arrive at the Oswiecin extermination camp in Poland. The moving of Jews is now being accomplished at night.

In the Roads to Foreign Policy, Gibson said there was nothing sacred about decisions made by the British Government, and that if a great moral issue were at stake we have not only the right but the duty to make our point of view prevail. Just so. Palestine, as a mandated territory, was entrusted to Great Britain by the League of Nations. By separate treaty in 1924 the United States consented to the mandate. The League of Nations and the United States specifically based their consent on the British Balfour declaration, the declaration solemnly promising that Great Britain would do all in its power to facilitate the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people in Palestine. In barring the Jewish people from Palestine, Britain has betrayed the sacredness of both her treaty obligations to the United States and her mandatory obligations to other signatories.

A moral issue is at stake, and we have the duty to speak up. The need for sanctuary for the Jewish people is acute. The United States has opened free ports in this country and in north Africa. Mexico will do likewise. The Pope has intervened with Hungary officials in behalf of the Jews. The Red Cross has done all it can. Secretary of State Hull, President Roosevelt has protested the Hungarian deportations and threatened retribution to all those aiding in the massacre of Jews. Both major political parties of the United States have gone on record favoring a reiteration of the congressional resolution of 1922 favoring the establishment of a national homeland for the Jewish people in Palestine.

But Great Britain is adamant. The Horthy offer is explicit. Britain cannot dodge behind a self-promulgated, self-administered white paper.

Four hundred thousand lives are at stake.

Last Thursday the official Hungarian Telegraph Bureau took issue with the statement made Friday in the House of Commons by George Hall, Under Secretary of the Foreign Office, who said that the British Government has considered the advisability of granting British nationality to Jews in occupied territories, but does not believe that merely verbal protection will help these Jews. The Hungarian News Agency said that "The British strike a very humble and unassuming note as soon as it is a question of providing real help, and not of merely broadcasting propaganda phrases."

Is it to be an attitude of "Let George do it?"

Even within the restrictive terms of the White Paper there are some available certificates of entrance, but Britain doles them out grudgingly, one by one, so that it can be said that she has not altogether barred the doors of Palestine.

On August 15, the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees will meet again in London. Functioning since 1938, it has for all these years merely paid lip service to the need for asylum and rescue. Like the Bermuda Conference of more recent date, it shrugged off the problem is insoluble. The White Paper forbade the most practical solution—Palestine.

Undoubtedly, Great Britain will point to this meeting in London and counsel patience. Between 1938 and today, thousands could have been saved. Between today and August 15, still more lives can be saved. Great Britain can open Palestine to the Jews of Hungary, either for temporary or permanent residence. This is no time for more talk, more blueprints, more exploration. This is the time to act.

It is hoped that our American representative at the Intergovernmental Committee for Refugees will speak out forcefully for the right. American public opinion has coalesced. In urging the abandonment of the White Paper, our American representative will be honestly representing the people of the United States.

Irrigation for the Republican Valley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I have always contended that the extension of irrigation was a sound national policy and that it benefited the entire Nation. When this terrible war comes to a close the only new frontier which we can turn to for the creation of new farm homes is that which will be created by the further development of irrigation.

Floods and drought take a tremendous toll in the United States each year. Millions of acres of farm crops are destroyed every season, either by the lack of water or an overamount of water. Irrigation means a controlled water supply, consequently farming in an irrigated area adds stability to the Nation's food production. It makes possible a diversified type of farming and eliminates the problem of surpluses.

Irrigation pays its way. The farmers pay for the projects. The records show that of all the communities in the arid and semiarid West, the irrigated communities pay many times more in taxes, both State and Federal, than those which have no water projects. These irrigated sections become a permanent asset in our national economy, and are no longer a drain on the Public Treasury for various forms of drought relief. The added prosperity brought about by the extension of irrigation means a greater market for the products of our factories and more employment for American laborers. These benefits are not for just a season, but they are permanent.

Mr. Speaker, I want irrigation brought to every acre possible in the great Republican Valley and its tributaries. I wish to extend my remarks and include an address prepared for delivery by Mr. Harry W. Bashore, Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation. This address was to be given at the fourth annual meeting of the Republican Valley Conservation Association, held at McCook, Nebr., August 16, 1944:

Mr. Chairman and Nebraskans, having spent many years helping to bring irrigation water to farm lands in this State, it is an honor and a pleasure for me to discuss some of our mutual problems in this way.

I am going to talk to you about a river, your river. The Republican River, geographically speaking, is a tributary which, with other streams, forms the Kaw. And I am going to discuss Federal reclamation, in which I have been engaged for 38 years.

As I think what full use of the waters of the Republican could bring to the people of this valley in the way of security and prosperity, I feel more firmly convinced than ever that our country's greatness depends on the development of the little things—whether it be a little river which, joined with other waters, makes a larger river, or whether it be an individual who, through his irrigated farm or his small business, contributes his share toward making a mighty Nation.

The Republican River holds the key to the future development of this fertile valley. Both the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation have made plans which together will provide for the use of the waters of this stream in irrigation and for flood control. These projects in the Republican River Valley should be made ready for construction in the post-war period. They are needed; they are eminently worth while; they will provide employment, and they will provide new homes. I hope to see this river developed—its waters utilized to make more homes among you, and its floods controlled in the very near future.

I don't need to remind you that Nebraska has had a history of droughts and floods. The flood on the Republican River in 1935 caused 59 percent of the total flood damage of the last 50 years in this region. Such floods can be controlled by the construction of reservoirs in the Republican River Basin—reservoirs which will store water for the irrigation of about 188,000 acres of land in this valley.

All of you remember the droughts of 1934 and 1936 and the hardships that they brought. The same reservoirs that control the floods will store the water to irrigate the land. This is truly a multiple-purpose development which will serve the best interests of everybody.

When sufficient water is brought to these lands, the hopes and dreams of pioneer settlers will be realized. These pioneers refused to accept the verdict of explorers like Zebulon Pike and Stephen Long, who said the country was unfit for human habitation.

With the plans that you have made, cooperating with us in the Bureau of Reclamation, we shall be able to offer homes based on stabilized agriculture and to guarantee you and your children freedom from drought and floods.

Nebraska has suffered major droughts and torrential floods in her history. Shortly after the War between the States, there were tales of abundant rainfall in this part of the West. Migration to the plains rolled rapidly onward, now hesitating and now gaining momentum after years of heavy rainfall. It swept almost to within sight of the Rockies, and in 1887 a railroad settlement pamphlet said, "The rain belt has moved westward to within less than 50 miles of Denver. So much rain now falls in the eastern portion of Colorado that it is no longer fit for winter range for cattle."

Thousands of people rushed into what they thought was a new rain belt. Many of these people failed to grow enough for a bare existence. In a few years towns were deserted, whole counties were almost depopulated, and homes abandoned. Those who stayed on suffered hardships such as no one can understand who has never lived without sufficient water.

In all seriousness, we can say that the first hundred years were the hardest. Today, as we look at the comfortable homes in McCook, it is hard to realize that not so many years ago men built their homes from sod.

There was something of the idealist, as well as the realist, in those early settlers. They faced realities, but they had visions of what might come after them. It is this combination of hard-headed realism and frank idealism which has made possible the development of the West.

In the West, rainfall is uncertain. There may be unusual spells of rain, as there were back in the late eighties when they thought the rain belt had moved, and then again, there are times of terrible drought. To the west of the ninety-seventh meridian, the rainfall generally is insufficient for crops.

In the 601,000,000 acres of land in the arid and semi-arid region which are tillable, there is only enough water to irrigate about 43,000,000 acres—about 7 percent of the total area. The 43,000,000 acres are about twice the total acreage that is now served by all irrigation systems in the west, both private and Federal.

The development of the 21,000,000 acres now under irrigation has been a slow process. Early settlers diverted streams and irrigated valleys near the smaller rivers. Finally storage works were required to regulate the flow of streams and protect the water users.

By 1901, about 10,000,000 acres of land had been put under irrigation by private capital. In that year, President Theodore Roosevelt made a historic statement. He said to the Congress of the United States:

"It is as right for the National Government to make the streams and rivers of the arid region useful by engineering works for the storage of water as to make useful the rivers and harbors of the humid regions by engineering works of another character."

The Congress of the United States passed the Reclamation Act in 1902. It was designed to conserve the waters of the West and use them for the development of the vast areas of public land to which the Government had title.

More than 4,000,000 acres are now served by Bureau of Reclamation projects. Half of this area, which is in prosperous farms today, once was desert land. The remainder was originally irrigated by private capital, but had inadequate water supplies before the Federal systems came to the rescue.

Bureau of Reclamation projects have contributed greatly to the power and war-food needs of the Nation. Hydroelectric power—a byproduct of some reclamation projects—has filled a vital need in many wartime industries.

The 1943 farm crop from Bureau projects topped the pre-Pearl Harbor record by a 143 percent increase in values. Not only have these crops meant food for fighting men and food for the home front, but they have brought financial security to farmers on irrigated lands. It goes without saying that this financial security makes for better rural homes and communities.

We used to say that the cow, the sow, and the hen were mortgage lifters. But the farmers out on the Yuma project in Arizona and California can tell you how their mortgages have been lifted by lettuce—vegetable greenbacks you might call them.

I could cite many examples of mortgage-lifter crops on these reclamation projects. There is the prosperous North Platte area in Nebraska and Wyoming. This region under irrigation produces great quantities of sugar beets, alfalfa, barley, corn, potatoes, and beans. More than 300,000 acres irrigated in the North Platte Valley are served by Bureau of Reclamation facilities constructed in 1908.

The North Platte Valley development illustrates the expansion which comes with irrigation. Let's look at population trends in Scotts Bluff County, where most of the project acreage is situated, and in three adjacent wheat and grazing counties.

From 1900 to 1940 the population of Scotts Bluff County increased from 2,552 to 33,917, a gain of more than 1,200 percent. Each decade since then has shown an uninterrupted growth with 33,917 persons recorded in the census of 1940. Since the establishment of the North Platte project this county has grown in population at a rate three times as great as that of the State of Nebraska.

Even during the drought decade 1930 to 1940 the population of Scotts Bluff County increased 18.3 percent as compared with a net loss for the whole State of Nebraska of 4.7 percent.

A look at the population trend in three adjacent dry-land counties, Sioux, Box Butte, and Banner where wheat raising and dry farming predominate, tells a different story. These are typical Great Plains counties in which little if any irrigation development has taken place.

In 1900, some 9,700 people lived in these three counties. In 1940 the population had risen to 15,031, an increase of only about 54 percent in the 40-year period as compared with a gain of more than 1,200 percent for the Scotts Bluff County in that period of time. All of the growth in the dry-land counties occurred between 1900 and 1910. In the last 30 years th population of the dry counties has actually dropped from 17,457 to 15,031.

The full development of the unused water resources of the West means not only more irrigated farms but the expansion of existing cities and towns, and the creation of new communities which will provide vast home markets for the products of American factories. Over 400,000 new irrigated farms could be provided under present-day systems of farming. They would support an additional population of more than 6,000,000 people.

Such a program would create $16,000,000,000 of new property values, based on prewar prices. A domestic market would be built up for American products from factories and farms outside of the irrigated areas which would maintain pay rolls at a distance, keep transportation systems busy, and help to stabilize the business, large and small, of the entire country.

In a report which I made recently before a Senate Subcommittee on Post-war Economic Planning and Policy, I gave a preliminary inventory of 236 individual projects and small groups of miscellaneous developments that seem to be suitable for post-war construction in the 17 Western States. Thirty-nine of them or features of them have been authorized for construction, and work has gone forward under the war food or war power programs of reclamation.

The Mirage Flats project in northwestern Nebraska is one which, stopped by the War Production Board in 1942, has been authorized for completion to increase production of war food and forage products.

More than a year ago an application was filed with the War Food Administration and the War Production Board to begin construction of the Cambridge project, with Medicine Creek Reservoir, a diversion dam, and the main canal as the major features. When clearance was denied for the project as presented, a modified plan was submitted whereby the diversion dam and main canal would have been constructed so as to turn water from the natural flow of the stream onto the fertile lands in the Cambridge area. Other post-war projects in which Nebraska is interested are: Bostwick, Cedar Bluff, Frenchman-Cambridge, Kirwin, North Republican, serving Wray, Colorado, and Nebraska, and pumping units. Power transmission lines are to be built as required.

Construction of many of the projects in the inventory could be scheduled for timely widespread employment of servicemen and industrial workers after the war. Permanent settlement on new lands would be made possible, and productivity of lands now irrigated with undependable water supplies would be made secure.

Construction could be speeded up and work could be started on some of the potential projects on fairly short notice, when advance funds and authority are provided. Under such a schedule we estimate that nearly 150,000 men could be employed at sites of construction in the West within 9 months. Even a greater number could be engaged in the manufacture of equipment and other materials in sections of the country distant from the project areas.

Completion of all of the projects in the inventory would furnish employment equivalent to one and one-fourth million men working for 1 year. A total of 135,000 irrigated farms would be created for settlement by war veterans and others. Security could be offered 150,000 additional farms where production is now threatened by lack of irrigation water. A population of two and one-half million persons, including the merchants and businessmen in cities and towns who serve the irrigation farmers, would eventually be directly benefited. These results would flow from the irrigation of 6,700,000 acres of land now unused and 9,364,000 acres now farmed with not enough water.

The multiple-purpose projects proposed by the Bureau of Reclamation would provide power installations to help balance the agricultural development of the West by industrial expansion.

Irrigation water gives stability to western purchasing power, which is threatened in areas where there is insufficient water. It has been estimated that the annual purchasing power of the West for products of the Midwest, East, and South would be increased by $1,250,000,000 at prewar prices by the full development of these new farms and the communities they would serve.

The estimated cost of all projects in the inventory would be something over $3,000,000,000, based on 1940 price levels. One-third or more of that amount would be spent in the development of the Missouri River Basin, of which the Republican River projects are a vital part.

The comprehensive plan for the development of the Missouri River Basin is given in Senate Document 191. The projects outlined by Reclamation engineers in that report would be largely complementary to those recently suggested by the Secretary of War for flood control and navigation on the Missouri River. The reservoirs proposed by the Reclamation Service and the Army would protect property from devastating floods, and distribute irrigated areas widely through seven States: Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, the Dakotas, Kansas, and Nebraska. Farmers in these areas now depending on uncertain dry farming would be given an opportunity to have a secure living from the land. Each of the projects listed in the plan is justified, I believe, by the public benefits it would yield. All of them would be part of a unified plan for using beneficially the water resources of the Missouri River and its tributaries.

These benefits would include not just flood control, not just navigation, but what is most important to those who are destitute for water, irrigation.

Droughts in the Missouri Basin States during the past decade have cost the Nation, in grants and unpaid loans, more than one and a quarter billion dollars. I believe it was Mark Twain who said, "Everybody is always talking about the weather, but nobody ever does anything about it."

Well, the Bureau of Reclamation has not been able to change the weather, but we have been able to do something about it.

As I said, droughts have cost more than one and a quarter billion dollars during the last decade. But even with that expenditure, thousands of families were forced to abandon their homes.

That same amount of money which has been spent in drought relief is, roughly, equal to the cost of the proposed development of the waters of the entire Missouri River system.

The foundation of the Reclamation plan for the Missouri River Basin is a system of 90 reservoirs to impound water during flood seasons, to serve the double purpose of reducing flood stages in the streams, and to save water for use in dry seasons.

The approximate acreages to be benefited in Nebraska by the Missouri River Basin plan are 989,445 acres of new lands and supplemental water for 19,930 more acres.

Nebraska is an outstanding example of the benefits of irrigation to a State lying partly in a humid climate and partly in a semiarid country, and having a large part of its area subject to irregular rainfall. In the central and western parts of the State 610,379 acres are now under irrigation, according to the 1939 census.

The report on the Missouri River Basin points out the possibility of irrigating about 660,000 acres along the Loup and Lower Platte Rivers, chiefly with water from the Loup; more than 100,000 acres along the Republican River; and 240,000 acres by pumping from wells after other developments replenish ground-water supplies.

Irrigation has proved its worth in Nebraska. Although the western and central parts of the State in some years receive enough rain for grain and forage crops, the maintenance of a stabilized agricultural economy, except for the eastern portion of the State, depends upon irrigation.

The North Platte project is a good example of the permanent economic and social stability afforded by artificial water supplies.

Another Nebraska project, authorized and now under construction, is the Mirage Flats, which will irrigate 12,000 acres of land in northwestern Nebraska. Construction includes a reservoir on the Niobrara River of approximately 30,000 acre-feet capacity to bring water to fertile land that is now being dry-farmed. An earth and rock-fill dam is the principal engineering feature of the project.

Crop losses in Mirage Flats, a community in Dawes and Sheridan Counties, have been heavy during dry years.

All other proposed projects in Nebraska in the post-war plans depend on the Republican River. Ultimate plans of development here will bring maximum use of its water resources and provide flood control for the entire Republican River Valley and to some degree would protect areas along the Kansas and Missouri Rivers. Irrigation development on 188,000 acres would be accomplished by a system of 18 separate units.

Because there has been some discussion on how the Reclamation plan on flood control for the upper Republican River basin differs from that of the Army plan, our engineers have prepared a table giving the comparative storage capacities of the different reservoirs proposed above the Harlan County Reservoir by both the Army and the Bureau of Reclamation. It shows the relative differences in capacities reserved for silt and irrigation and for flood control on the six tributaries. If you are interested in these details, I shall be glad to leave a few copies with you for study.

Recommending Reservoirs Above Harlan County Reservoir

To make a start on the development of the Republican River, the Bureau of Reclamation has listed the following projects for first consideration in the post-war period:

The North Republican project on the Republican River is under study for irrigation and flood control. Two thousand eighty acres of new lands would be irrigated by the project and supplemental waters brought to 3,340 acres.

The Frenchman-Cambridge project on the Republican River, under study for irrigation and flood control, would irrigate 36,130 acres of new land and supply water for 17,015 acres.

Irrigation for 14,200 acres of new lands and supplemental water for 9,300 acres could be provided by the construction of five well units.

The Bostwick project on the Republican River, under study for irrigation and flood control, would irrigate 24,170 acres and supply water to 830 acres. Construction features are an earth dam, canal, and power plant with estimated 1,000 kilowatts. The Bostwick would also serve 65,000 acres of new lands in Kansas with an additional 2,000 kilowatts to be installed.

This list is subject to revision, additions, or substitutions, as the people of the Republican Valley make their wishes known.

I have attempted to tell you some of the things that the Bureau of Reclamation has accomplished in the West in 42 years and to outline certain post-war projects which we believe will be of the most service to the people.

In 42 years the Bureau of Reclamation has been able to bring prosperity to people on millions of acres of land in the West. There are great days ahead. The post-war plans I have outlined for the Republican River can be achieved with your help.

The Republican River compact providing for the equitable apportionment of the waters of this river and its drainage area among the three States—Colorado, Kansas, and Nebraska—laid the groundwork for the development of water resources of the river basin. It is an evidence of your ability to work together on this stream. Under it we can plan projects with assurance.

You and your association are to be congratulated on the cooperation that you have shown. It will take cooperation in the future as well and I am confident that it will be given. We can look forward to the sound development of the Republican River Basin for the use of its waters to the benefit of all.

I Support Soil Conservation As One Constructive Program to Help Missouri Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARION T. BENNETT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the amendment proposed here to permit soil-conservation districts to have a priority for purchase of surplus dirt-moving equipment was defeated. Only about 9 inches of topsoil stand between us and starvation. That soil is being rapidly destroyed. It is washing down the furrows, the ditches, the creeks and rivers, and into the oceans. Vast areas of the world which once supported great empires are now barren and the civilizations which grew upon them have disappeared. While we are concerned with a fight for survival against enemies from without we must not neglect those dangers which face us at home. Soil erosion is one of these enemies. What are we doing to combat this enemy? I am glad to say that my work in Congress in support of soil conservation is my answer to that question. I would like to make special reference here to what part Missouri is playing in this struggle by way of showing not only what has been done but what must be done under leadership of Members of Congress and others who understand the problems of agriculture and the broader influence these problems have upon the welfare of all the Nation.

Today, Missouri is mobilizing its forces for an intelligent, cooperative attack on the erosion problems affecting its wealth of farm land. With passage of a soil-conservation districts law, Missouri is building a locally initiated soil-conservation program on a firm basis of experience. State agronomists and conservationists have prepared the way for the farmer-initiated, farmer-organized district program of practical soil conservation.

In Missouri, the role of soil conservation is twofold. Not only must the land damaged by erosion be brought back to usefulness, but the richness of good Missouri soil must be safeguarded against impoverishment by wind and rain.

A little less than 2,000,000 acres of Missouri land has already been ruined by erosion. This is 15 percent of the total area of the State. Another 35,000,000 acres show evidence of moderate erosion.

However, Missouri faces the big soil-conservation job ahead with understanding with experience and facts as a basis for future work.

THE SOIL-CONSERVATION JOB AHEAD

For the first time in its history, the United States has a factual inventory of its basic soil resources. Recently completed by the Soil Conservation Service, this inventory presents a picture of the Nation's capital stock of farm land, classified according to its capabilities for various uses and according to its conservation needs. The estimate of these needs is based on 10 years of conservation experience by farmers in all parts of the country and on all appropriate technical information produced by research and agricultural experiment stations.

In this inventory the soil assets of the country are set forth, together with a clear outline of the work that needs to be done to keep this capital stock of soil usable in the immediate years ahead and for the long future.

The inventory shows that Missouri's lands are not now being used as wisely as they should be from the standpoint of protection against erosion and/or maximum efficiency. Of almost 14,000,000 acres now in cultivation, more than 2,000,000 should be retired to grass or trees to save them from serious erosion and to prevent waste of seed, fertilizer, and labor. On the other hand, there are more than 6,000,000 acres not now in cultivation that are suitable for this purpose—more than an adequate supply to replace lands now being unwisely cultivated.

The inventory also shows that more than 9,000,000 acres of Missouri cropland need carefully planned, improved crop rotations adapted to the farmers' economic needs and to the individual needs and capabilities of each specific acre.

More than 4,000,000 acres of Missouri land need contour planting, and about half a million acres need to be strip cropped. More than 15,000,000 acres of Missouri grazing land need seeding.

There are still other soil and water conserving measures needed to maintain and build Missouri's important farm-land resources.

WORK IS UNDER WAY

During the past decade a flexible, practical system of soil-conservation farming has been evolved in the United States from the combined knowledge and experience of farmers and technicians working on the land under widely varying conditions of climate, erosion, soils, crops, and slopes in all parts of the country.

The first concerted soil-conservation action on a Nation-wide scale began in 1933, when the Soil Erosion Service was set up as an emergency agency in the Department of the Interior to help farmers protect their soil against erosion. The new organization, gathering information on soil-erosion conditions and soil conservation farming methods, established demonstration projects in the principal agricultural regions and principal erosion areas of the country.

Among the early demonstration projects were areas in the vicinity of Bethany and Westboro, in Missouri.

When the temporary Erosion Service was renamed the Soil Conservation Service and established by act of Congress as a regular agency of the Department of Agriculture early in 1935 these demonstration projects were increased in answer to local demands and increasing concern about the damage being caused by erosion.

Thus, the demonstration project at Bethany and others that were subsequently established in Missouri were pioneer contributors to the program that has scientifically adapted soil and water conserving farming measures to fit the individual needs of every locality.

SOIL-CONSERVATION DISTRICTS

By the end of 1937 the Soil Conservation Service was working in 504 soil conservation demonstration areas, covering nearly 12,000,000 acres in different parts of the country. These demonstrations led directly to the development of soil-conservation districts. Farmers and ranchers had decided they wanted conservation work on their lands, and they had come to recognize that this required the cooperation of neighbor with neighbor in a very practical way. During the years of the demonstration projects they discovered that much more could be accomplished by working together than by working independently. Further, there was a growing desire in many parts of the country to make certain that soil-conservation work would be continued, with the same high technical standards, until the job was done. In short, there was a demand for a permanent, new type of farmer organization on a community basis, with legal status, to insure soil-conservation progress.

Thus it was that soil-conservation demonstrations were succeeded by soil-conservation districts. In the former, the Soil Conservation Service supplied much of the initiative as well as the technical aid in carrying out the actual work on the land. With the formation of districts, however, soil-conservation initiative rightfully passed over to district organization, and the Soil Conservation Service was able to devote its full energies to the task of helping farmers and ranchers in districts with their soil and water conservation work—especially with those soil and water problems requiring a technical knowledge and experience over and above what the farmer himself might be expected to provide.

Soil-conservation districts are formed under State laws which are permissive in nature. That is, the laws permit farmers to organize districts and they mark out the manner and means whereby this may be done. They also point out the status and scope of a soil-conservation district, once it is organized. But the laws do not require organization of districts. That is left to the volition of the landowners themselves. Farmers may or may not organize soil-conservation districts, as they see fit. The State laws merely provide a method and framework of organization to be used, if and when needed.

Soil-conservation districts can be initiated only on the petition of farmers and established only by the will of the majority, as expressed in referenda. Every landowner has a voice in shaping the policies of the district in which he lives. The aims of the district, its cooperating policies, and the soil and water conservation measures it decides upon, are set forth in a district program and a work plan. These are drawn up by the district supervisors, with the help of the landowners.

Soil-conservation districts are legally constituted units of local government. They owe no allegiance to any Federal office, bureau, or agency, or to any local organization.

The first soil-conservation districts law was enacted by Arkansas on March 3, 1937, but it did not become effective until July of that year. Meanwhile North Carolina passed a districts law and on August 4, 1937, chartered the Brown Creek District—the first to be formed in the country.

In Missouri, though soil-conservation work has been under way for some time, a districts enabling law was passed only last year. Since then, 13 counties have organized soil-conservation districts covering more than 4,000,000 acres and including over 30,000 farms. Johnson County in the Sixth Congressional District is one of these 13 leading Missouri counties. Additional districts are in the process of organization in other counties.

Thus, Missouri is ready to participate actively in the growing soil-conservation movement which today includes 1,122 soil-conservation districts in the 45 States that have passed districts enabling legislation. These districts cover almost 628,000,000 acres and include more than 2,924,000 farms.

BETTER LAND USE

The basic, guiding principle of soil conservation is the treatment of every acre according to its individual needs, and the use of every acre according to its indidivual capabilities. In furtherance of this principle, a wide range of soil and water conservation practices has been developed—adaptable to the differing amounts of rainfall and the wide variety of erosion conditions, soils, crops, and slopes in a country where no two farms are exactly alike.

Among the principal measures encouraged by the Soil Conservation Service, however, are:

Contouring: The plowing, planting, cultivation, and harvesting of sloping fields on the level, around the hillside, with bending furrows to fit the curvature of the land in order to retain and store rainfall in the soil and thereby to prevent soil waste and other damages of concentrated run-off.

Terracing: The building up of moderate embankment barriers across sloping fields to slow down run-off water and guide it safely to protected outlets.

Strip cropping: The planting of alternating bands of close-growing vegetation and clean-tilled row crops, on the contour, so that the strips of close-growing plants form a protective belt against erosion between the cultivated strips.

Close-growing cover crops: To protect the soil against wind and rain after harvest or during the season of the year when no other vegetation covers and protects the ground.

These and dozens of other carefully worked out soil-conservation farming measures together form the basis of a complete farm conservation plan. This is a plan of land use and land protection, made up specifically for the individual farm or other land unit, and based on the physical analysis of each acre to determine its capabilities and its needs in order to put it to the most productive use.

In Missouri, at the beginning of this year, 5,998 farms had been planned in this manner with the assistance of the Soil Conservation Service in cooperation with other Federal and State agencies. A total of 801,976 acres of Missouri farm land had thus been blueprinted for physical security, with the planned treatment applied to 680,127 acres.

More than 128,000 acres of Missouri farm land are now protected by contour cultivation; protective grass plantings and woody plantings have been applied to a total of more than 90,000 acres; 36,942 acres have been terraced and strip crops are established on 17,731 acres.

These figures represent soil-conservation treatment accomplished by Missouri farmers with the cooperation of the Soil Conservation Service. Research studies undertaken by Missouri agronomists and technicians in cooperation with the service are constantly adding to the store of soil-conservation farming knowledge and techniques. By working out a good pasture system especially adapted to the impervious Putnam soils of north central Missouri, these technicians have been able to help farmers protect and improve millions of acres in that part of the State.

Missouri's long history of soil-conservation research and experiment includes the early establishment at Bethany of one of the first experiment stations devoted to the study of erosion and its control. In the past decade, the State's contribution to an understanding use of such soil-conservation farming methods as contouring, terracing, and crop residue management is reflected in the increasing amount of soil-conservation work done on Missouri farms.

Original research by Missouri scientists is providing sound practical guidance for the district's program in the State.

Dean M. F. Miller of the university's college of agriculture, is a pioneer in the study of erosion. W. C. Etheridge, professor of field crops at the university, with his work on grassland and ponds, has helped bring Missouri to second place among the States in total area of farmland grazed. And Dr. W. A. Albrecht, chairman of the university's soils department, is opening up a new frontier for soil-conservation work in his investigations into the direct influence of soil health on human health and nutrition.

The 1-year rotation of small grain and lespedeza developed by Missouri scientists has been widely used in soil-conservation farm plans developed under the guidance of Soil Conservation Service technicians.

INCREASED PRODUCTION

Conservation farming on thousands of farms throughout the country, producing all kinds of crops, has resulted in an average per-acre increase in yields of at least 20 percent—with little or no additional labor, fuel, time, money, or machinery.

In Missouri, farmers on 128 typical farms, totaling 22,693 acres recently submitted actual figures on production before and after their adoption of soil-conservation practices. The average annual yields of all major crops were a little more than 31 percent greater on the 128 farms after soil and water conservation methods were applied—an increase equivalent to the total production from 7,247 additional acres without soil-conservation treatment.

Average yield of corn went up 39 percent after soil-conservation measures were adopted. Average yield of wheat went up 26 percent. Average yield of oats was increased almost 21 percent and a 10 percent increase in the average yield of soybeans permitted the raising of 1,437 more bushels on 89 less acres than were devoted to that soil-depleting crop before the farm plans were put into effect. These 128 Missouri farmers increased their dairy herds by 22 percent and their beef cattle by more than 46 percent. An increase of 18 percent in hay and pasture acreage helped make possible the increases in livestock.

From these farms where soil-conservation measures were applied to the land, the practices are spreading in widening circles. According to 95 of the Missouri farmers interviewed, more than 300 others adopted one or more soil-conservation practices as a result of seeing them in successful operation on their farms. Fifty-seven of the original 128 soil-conservation farmers helped 225 neighbors and friends install soil and water conserving practices.

POST-WAR

With the fund of information and experience developed by farmers in recent years, many soil-conservation districts are preparing careful post-war work programs of soil conservation. Specific tasks are being outlined, the cost and labor requirements estimated, and priorities established.

The Soil Conservation Service estimates it could efficiently put some 100,000 men to work within 6 to 8 months after the war, protecting and improving basic soil resources in soil-conservation districts. Need for this work and its value to farmers and States have been established by the farmers themselves, for they have tested the efficiency of conservation farming and are asking for more technical assistance in applying conservation measures to more and more land.

Here are some of the types of work that urgently need doing, and which men demobilized from the armed forces or released from war industries could do under qualified technical supervision:

First. Drainage of wet farm lands.

Second. Development of stable outlets for farm terraces and diversion ditches.

Third. Planning of steep eroding slopes with trees, shrubs, vines, legumes, and grasses.

Fourth. Planting gullies and worn-out fields—for protection and to put every acre to useful work.

Fifth. Development and improvement of water resources for livestock and for use in gardens and fields, including construction of stock-water reservoirs, farm ponds, and development of springs for livestock use.

Sixth. Flood-control work on agricultural lands.

Seventh. Quarrying and crushing limestone for use on acid lands.

Eighth. Productive development of submarginal lands, with a view to restoring their usefulness.

Ninth. Planting of protective windbreaks on farms and ranches.

Tenth. Dune-erosion control.

Eleventh. Stream-bank erosion control.

Twelfth. Highway-erosion control.

Thirteenth. Production of shrubs, tree seedlings, and new grasses and legumes for control of erosion, when such plants are not otherwise available.

Fourteenth. Construction of terraces and diversion ditches.

The number of men who can be put to work building up and protecting the soil resources of America is limited mainly by the availability of proficient conservation technicians to guide and supervise the work. By the second year after the war is over, probably 3,000 qualified technicians could be recruited and trained, in addition to the present technical staff of the Soil Conservation Service, to direct soil-conservation work in a post-war program. These technicians could utilize efficiently the labor power of at least 500,000 man-years during the first 3 to 4 post-war years.

Some of the results that could be expected from such a program are:

First. Approximately 1,200,000 farms safeguarded against erosion and made more productive.

Second. Improvement and permanent protection against erosion on about 200,000,000 acres of farm land.

Third. Drainage of from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 acres of wet lands.

Fourth. Virtually complete flood control on some of the lesser streams.

Fifth. Protection against the effects of drought on millions of acres.

Sixth. Substantial social and economic advantages that cannot be tangibly measured.

FLOOD CONTROL

Soil and water conservation work on the land has proved effective in reducing the hazards of floods. Water is slowed in its rush to the rivers because conservation methods tend to hold raindrops where they fall and because the soil itself provides the greatest water reservoir in the world with the exception of the oceans. Conservation work on the land can in this way reduce the frequency and minimize the hazards of floods. On many small streams it is entirely possible that floods can be prevented altogether by conservation treatments on land making up the contributing watershed.

Especially important to Missouri's flood-control program is the growing interest in farm ponds. This water-conserving measure has been included in many soil-conservation farm plans. And work of Soil Conservation Service technicians in designing ponds to suit the needs of the individual farm has helped encourage the use of this flood-controlling farm improvement.

Conservation measures can be an effective insurance against results of prolonged and damaging periods of scant rainfall. By storing water in the soil, conservation measures avoid needless waste of water that might better be utilized by crops. And the enormous reservoir of the soil is able to retain vast amounts of moisture, collected in rainy seasons, against later days of heat and little rain.

A CONSTRUCTIVE AND SENSIBLE PROGRAM

In conclusion, I want to point out that farmers who organize themselves into soil-conservation districts are entitled to the free technical aid of specialists in engineering, irrigation, drainage, and wildlife management, to loans of labor and equipment where available, and to certain seeds and nursery stock. The details of this program are too numerous for me to discuss here. The Federal Soil Conservation Service, in the Department of Agriculture, has many helpful and illustrated booklets showing how to organize these districts and giving concrete examples of how soil-conservation practices mean more dollars in the farmer's pocket and increased national wealth for all of us to share. This information is available upon request from the Service or from Members of Congress who will be happy to send it to their constituents.

In recent years we have seen many crackpot schemes advanced to solve the woes of the farm. Soil conservation is not a crackpot idea and neither is it a cure-all for the farm problem. But it is a practical, proved, and necessary approach to a sounder agriculture. I urge farmers who are not organized into soil-conservation districts to take steps now to reap the benefits of this worthy program. Our wealth and prosperity are rooted in the soil. Let us protect at home this soil we fight for abroad. We must work out our own post-war salvation with the old-fashioned American initiative and willingness to work and save, which is so typified by the American farmer.

Freedom Can Own the Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by James Morgan from the Boston Sunday Globe of August 20, 1944:

FREEDOM CAN OWN THE FUTURE—FREE NATIONS ARE WINNING A COOPERATIVE WAR BUT MUST YET WIN A COOPERATIVE PEACE TO THWART WORLD WAR NO. 3 BY THE SLAVE STATES

(By James Morgan)

If we are to have any peace in this perverse world, it will not be enough to have the angels on our side. It will be necessary also to have some cooperation from the devil, the devil of human selfishness. That is what we are trying to obtain by these preliminary give-and-take agreements about food, money, and oil, with still others to come on such subjects as rubber, shipping, airways, and communications.

Virtue is its own reward, but happily it is also the best policy. There be some who object that this is a too sordid calculation. Nevertheless, it is well that we can justify and prove the soundness of our ideals and morals on the lowest grounds. The Ten Commandments themselves find their secular validation in the general belief that the way of the transgressors of them is hard. We should, as Emerson bids us, hitch our wagon to a star; but we earth-bound mortals must be careful to keep the wheels on the ground and our heads out of the clouds.

ALL AGAINST WAR, BUT NOT ALL FOR PEACE

Like Calvin Coolidge's preacher in his sermon on sin, we are all "agin" war. It doesn't pay, as multitudes have learned only within recent times. Even the head hunters in the jungles of the South Pacific, those dreaded cannibals of yesterday, are become today the gentle, trustful befrienders of our lost soldiers and castaway sailors. The boiled missionary joke is outdated.

In the spread of the knowledge that war does not pay, mankind has made a truly astonishing progress. It still remains to be convinced that peace does pay. The peace of Versailles certainly did not. If it had paid, we should have been spared this war.

In that armed truce from 1918 to 1939, the peoples drifted from bad to worse, from unrestrained boom to complete collapse. Demagogues in Italy, Japan, and Germany, nations with little accumulated wealth to cushion the great depression, easily aroused the jealousy of their unemployed youth and the envy of their bankrupt industrialists by blaming it all on the foreigners—and the Jews—and the Treaty of Versailles.

If we ourselves could have had such a convenient alibi for our sins we, too, would have been more ready to listen to our Coughlins, Gerald L. K. Smiths and to the Ku Kluxers in their various guises. But all we could do was to vent our rage on one another and turn out the party in power at Washington.

CAN WE MAKE PEACE THAT PAYS?

We made a paper peace after the other war and it did not pay even its makers. That is why Mussolini, Hirohito, and Hitler could tear it up and throw it in our faces. If we can make a bread-and-butter peace this time it may pay us so well that we will enforce it.

Peace is not a positive force. It is only an absence of war. Once it is ended war has a fatal facility for receding into forgetfulness with amazing quicknes. Its madness becomes unimaginable directly the guns are silent. Military alliances begin to go to pieces within the hour of the armistice. They depend solely on the cohesive power of fear, and fear is about the most transient of our emotions. Remove that pressure and wartime allies fall apart.

We talk bravely of making a hard peace with Germany and Japan. That would take years and years of patient enforcement and therefore as many years of unity among the enforcers. But great nations cannot long remain united by hatred and fear of foes that have been reduced to helplessness. Unless the victors in this war can be bound together by strong, selfish interests, inevitably they will become rivals for the markets of their former enemies and for the political support of defeated Germany and Japan in a balance of power. These compacts on economic subjects could become alliances for peace.

REMEMBER THE GENEVA LEAGUE

An international organization for security against war, such as the planners will begin planning this week in Washington, cannot survive in vigor a long period of pease unless it is tied up with other international agencies whose business it will be to justify that peace with positive benefits. A municipal government with nothing else to do than provide a police force and a fire department would become an object of indifference and neglect among its citizens. This would leave it ineffective even in its negative functions of preventing disorder and putting out fires.

To keep alive and hold the support of the community, a city government must have constructive departments charged with the positive functions of giving day by day service. It must provide streets and regulate their traffic; it must provide water, sewers, schools, libraries, parks, hospitals, and care for the public health and the poor. Thus it makes itself indispensable to the homes and businesses of the population.

PEACE HAS NO SELFISH PRESSURE GROUPS

We must have international cooperation for peace if we are to have international cooperation against war. If Nations should organize only to prevent war, their organization would go stale and fall asleep after a few years of peace while it was left with nothing to do but play checkers.

We must provide services for peace, else any machinery set up merely to prevent war will be useless. It will not earn the good will and the prestige necessary to give it effective authority. We cannot expect it to stand alone. We shall have to evolve and build up around it a group of international commissions or institutions ,operating every day in the week on questions that get down to the lives of the peoples and their bread and butter.

This advance across the no-man's land between old stubborn frontiers, both on the map and in our heads, will not be easy going. It will have to cut a way through the wire entanglements of special interests and pressure lobbies enrolled on the side of jealous and exclusive nationalisms, with their flag-wrapped votaries crying aloud, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

To enlist selfish interest and lobbies on the side of international cooperation will be a slow process. But unless and until nationalistic bickering and haggling over lesser economic risks or sacrifices can be subordinated to the greater, universal interest, governments will be unable to cooperate in curbing the conflicts of trade. These are the sources of war, which burns up in a few years all the profits of a generation of peace.

SHALL THE FUTURE BELONG TO FREEDOM?

The Fascists and the Nazis contend that the free peoples cannot take this next step forward. They parrot Karl Marx's argument that our economic system, based on individualism and the profit motive, breeds a blind greed incapable of the common sacrifices necessary to save itself.

While Hitler sat in jail 20 years ago this year writing Mein Kampf, he admitted that his program for the conquest of Germany, then of Europe, and ultimately of the earth might not succeed at the first attempt. In that event, his Nazis would go underground, or back to the beer cellar where he plotted the putsch that caused his arrest. They would bide their time until the free nations had failed again, as they failed after World War No. 1, to make a peace that would pay.

Confidently the imprisoned prophet predicted that we would be too stupid, too short-sighted in our class and nationalistic selfishness to make a peace that paid. With our failure, World War No. 3 would come, when we would be eager to exchange our liberties for his "new order" and throw open our gates to the German conquerors.

That is the taunt and the challenge the totalitarians have flung at us. Now the time approaches for us to answer and show how dumb or how enlightened we are in our selfishness. We have fooled them by our ability to unite in war and achieve an international command of our naval, land, and air forces such as had not been seen before since the rise of nations.

The agreements negotiated and yet to be negotiated are a promise of a post-war cooperation among the free nations in a new order of their own. To paraphrase Lincoln at the outset of the Civil War, we shall meanly lose or nobly meet a great opportunity, possibly the last opportunity, to save our form of civilization. If we can unite in peace to disprove the dogma of the slave States, as we have united to overthrow them in war, the future will belong to freedom.

Did You Get Those Black-Market Nylons?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, J. Edgar Hoover's F. B. I. has just broken up one of the most lucrative black-market rackets unearthed in the whole war period. The arrest of several manufacturers alleged to have diverted nylon threads from the manufacture of parachutes and glider tow-ropes to the production of nylon stockings discloses the magnitude of a despicable fraud perpetrated upon the boys whom we have sent overseas to fight and die for our liberties.

It appears that raw nylon, received in a factory for conversion into thread was occasionally shipped out in lesser quantities with the discrepancy explained as "spoiled products." Then the "spoiled" material was shipped out to hosiery factories for processing. In some cities, the price of these black-market nylons ranged upward to and beyond $10 per pair, and those who purchased such hose were buying the lifesaving parachutes meant for our airmen and were contributing to a vast fraud on the people of the entire Nation.

Black-market transactions cannot be justified by any elastic conscience. Mr. Hoover has scored again. More power to his elbow.

Disposal of Government Property and Liquidation of Small Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House (H. R. 5125) to provide for the disposal of more than $60,000,000,000 of surplus Government property, plant, and land, has been materially improved by amendments adopted in the committee. The terms of the legislation, if finally approved and administered, according to the intent of Congress, will give the small-business man an opportunity to purchase for resale whatever surplus goods are available in small lots and at reasonable prices. This is the way it should be, instead of the original proposal that would only permit a few large operators to buy large quantities of goods at bargain prices.

The intent of the legislation also provides for the disposal of surplus goods through regularly established and legitimate business channels. Such intent is written into the bill to stop a few fly-by-night speculators from buying up tremendous quantities of property at 5 or 10 cents on the dollar to be resold at fabulous profits. This is what happened after the last war and we will not tolerate it again.

I urge the Senate and conference committee to retain the provisions for small business, as well as the intent to distribute surplus property through regularly established and legitimate business channels.

LIQUIDATION OF SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few remarks in regard to the plight of the small-business man in this country. On September 28, 1942, in a speech delivered in this House, I predicted that administration policies would force the liquidation of thousands of small-business men. I feel it timely to quote from that speech to show what has happened in the past 2 years. On September 28, 1942, I said:

LIQUIDATION OF SMALL BUSINESS

Tens of thousands of small-business men in retail, wholesale, industrial, and service establishments are being forced out of business because of the growing scarcity of goods for civilian needs and other restrictions imposed by Federal agencies. Amongst these are automobile and tire dealers, gasoline stations, electricians, plumbers, lumber dealers, jobbers, traveling salesmen, all types of small manufacturers who cannot convert to war production, country daily and weekly newspapers, retail merchants and professional men, and many others engaged in supplying civilian goods and services to the public.

I have registered many vigorous protests against unnecessary liquidation of this great American middle class. They, together with farmers and laborers, have been, and still are, the backbone of our democracy. Liquidate them and you destroy the factors which have given stability to our system of government and way of life. These groups are making tremendous sacrifices to win the war in being forced to give up their business, trade, and profession. In spite of this, they still continue to buy bonds, pay taxes, and give patriotic service to their country and community. They must be kept alive and in business, for when they pass out of the community picture big business, which does not possess a community soul, steps in solely for the sake of profit. I strongly urge that no effort be spared by the administration and Congress to keep this group in the economic picture. If this is not promptly done, our smaller cities and villages will become ghost towns, with the unemployed walking the streets and in distress.

ONE MILLION AND SEVENTY-THREE THOUSAND SMALL-BUSINESS ESTABLISHMENTS CLOSED THEIR DOORS IN 1942–43

To bear out the prediction which I made in my 1942 speech I want to quote figures from the Department of Commerce on the closing up of small American business. These statistics show that 1,073,000 business enterprises or over 30 percent of American businessmen were forced out of business in 1942–43. At least 90 percent of the business places closed or liquidated were small-business enterprises, as such establishments employed 4 or less people. In the 1940–41 period 914,000 small-business men were forced to discontinue business—largely as a result of administration policies. This makes a grand total of nearly 2,000,000 small-business places being liquidated during the past 4 years.

This liquidation of small business is a tragedy to American economy. For 11 years the Roosevelt administration has given lip service to small-business men and promised aid for survival, but little or nothing has been done. Congress has repeatedly legislated to assist small business in its fight for survival, but New Deal policy makers have refused or failed to carry out congressional enactments in this respect.

The hope of our great American middle class of people, which includes small business, profession, labor, and agriculture, can only be realized in a change of administration to run the affairs of the Federal Government, and in the selection of a Congress that will fight to recover American freedom and opportunity for all citizens under our system of representative government.

Resolutions Adopted at the Reunion of the Second Oregon Volunteers of the Spanish-American War and Philippine Insurrection of 1898–99 Held at Portland, Oreg., August 13, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, at the reunion of the Second Oregon Volunteers of the Spanish American War and Philippine Insurrection of 1898–99, which was held in Portland, Oreg., August 13, 1944, some important resolutions were adopted worthy of consideration by all Members of the Congress, as well as all American citizens. I therefore include these resolutions as a part of my remarks. They are as follows:

Whereas the Second World War has demonstrated that the United States was woefully unprepared for war when it came; and

Whereas our Army and Navy were small in size and lacked trained men to fill the regiments in the Army and to man the ships of the Navy; and

Whereas our enemies were fully aware of this state of unpreparedness for war that existed in the United States at that time; and

Whereas if the United States had possessed in 1940 a large and powerful Army and Navy, such as we have now, and a large and powerful reserve force of young men who had already been trained for war, our enemies would never have provoked a war with the United States; and

Whereas millions of our young men were rejected for military and naval service on account of physical and mental disqualifications, which a proper training period would probably have removed: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Veterans of the Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry of the Spanish War and Philippine Insurrection at their annual reunion in Laurelhurst Park, Portland, Oreg., August 13, 1944, commemorating the capture of Manila, Philippine Islands, August 13, 1898, That the Congress of the United States of America should now enact a law providing that every young man of the United States on reaching the age of 18 years shall be enrolled in the Army or Navy of the United States and shall undergo, for a period of 1 year, a system of physical, mental, and moral training which will best fit him for the patriotic duty of defending his country and maintaining its sacred principles of liberty, justice, and fraternity which are set forth in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

PERCY WILLIS,
Chairman.
RICHARD DEICH,
Secretary.

SECOND OREGON VOLUNTEER INFANTRY POST-WAR AIMS

Whereas it seems to be fashionable now, with certain people, to predict what our post-war aims shall be; and

Whereas war veterans should be heard when a post-war settlement is effected: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the veterans of the Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry of the Spanish War and Philippine Insurrection, at their annual reunion, held in Laurelhurst Park, Portland, Oreg., August 13, 1944, commemorating the capture of Manila, Philippine Islands, on August 13, 1898, That in their opinion the Allied Nations should firmly insist upon the following:

(a) Complete evacuation by Germany of all the occupied countries under her control.

(b) All German war factories, including plants for the manufacture of war planes, submarines, war ships, cannons, small arms, machine guns, and ammunition, be totally destroyed.

(c) German schools be placed under control of the Allied Nations for many years.

(d) Allied garrisons to be maintained in all large German cities for many years, to enforce the terms of the peace treaty.

(e) Complete destruction of all German war equipment, including war ships, submarines, war planes, cannon, machine guns, small arms, and ammunition, and tanks.

(f) The German General Staff to be abolished and prevented from reorganizing.

(g) Germany to be divided into separate states, including Prussia, Saxony, Bavaria, Hanover, Württemberg, and others, and prevented from combining again into one nation, these separate states to be organized under supervision of the Allied Nations.

(h) The German press to be under control and supervision of the Allied Nations for many years.

(i) German assemblies of all kinds to be strictly controlled by the Allied Nations for many years.

(j) Freedom of religion to be established and maintained. Rights of the Masonic fraternity and the Christian Science Church to be reestablished. And be it further

Resolved, That in addition to the foregoing, Japan should be required to evacuate and relinquish all control over China, Manchuria, Korea, Formosa, the Philippines, Indochina, Malaya, Burma, the Dutch East Indies, Guam, Wake Island, the Aleutian Islands, and all other islands which she has unlawfully acquired; and be it further

Resolved, That the Allied Nations should firmly insist upon for Japan all the demands made upon Germany in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i), and (j) as heretofore outlined, substituting the names Japan and Japanese where required and excepting that it may not be necessary to divide Japan into separate states; and be it further

Resolved, That Italy should be required to undergo similar treatment as Japan; and be it further

Resolved, That the responsible heads of the Governments of Germany, Japan, and Italy, and a certain number of their most important leaders, will be tried by military commissions of the Allied Nations and duly punished.

Chairman.

Celler Urges Upon Halifax New Declaration on Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

HIS EXCELLENCY THE EARL OF HALIFAX,
British Embassy, Washington, D. C.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: At the recent political conventions in the United States, both the Democratic and Republican Parties incorporated specific planks into their platforms calling upon Great Britain to permit unrestricted Jewish immigration and land ownership in the mandated territory of Palestine and for its establishment as a democratic Jewish commonwealth.

Such unanimity on a single issue should make crystal clear to the government of your honored country that there is strongest bipartisan support in the United States for the abrogation of the Malcolm MacDonald white paper, which, in so many words, precluded immigration and land ownership in Palestine on the grounds of race and religion. As you know, this so-called white paper was violative of three solemn pledges:

1. The Balfour Declaration, accepted by the United States.

2. The concurrent resolution adopted by the Congress of the United States in 1922.

3. The Anglo-American Treaty signed in 1924.

Contrary to the trend of general public opinion in this country, action on the bipartisan Wright-Compton resolution, introduced into the House of Representatives, was held in abeyance in deference to the wishes of your government.

Announcement was made recently of the resignation of Sir Harold MacMichael as High Commissioner of Palestine and of his replacement by Lord Gort, formerly military governor of the island of Malta. It is earnestly hoped and desired that this change will usher in an era of good will, friendship, and understanding between the British Colonial Office and all the inhabitants of Palestine.

In view of the formal statements made by the two great political parties in the United States, coinciding with the appointment of a new High Commissioner, an excellent opportunity is now presented to the new administration in Palestine and to the British Colonial Office to eliminate the heart-breaking restrictions against Jews which resulted from the so-called Malcolm MacDonald white paper. Coming at this time, such a declaration of a change in policy would revive the hope and the courage of any living Jews now trapped in Hitler's Festung Europa. It would likewise have a salutary effect on the future of Anglo-American relations.

Respectfully yours,

EMANUEL CELLER.

I sent the same letter to His Majesty's Minister for Colonies in London and to His Excellency, Lord Gort, at the Government House, Jerusalem.

Russian-Trained Sidney Hillman Directs Political Action Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, money is now being solicited from laboring men and women to swell the slush fund of the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. Millions of dollars are being taken from the pockets of working people for term No. 4 and to smear and purge every candidate for Congress—Democrats or Republicans—who will not surrender to left-wing radicals and Communists. Sidney Hillman, Russian-born and Russian-trained, is the czar of this C. I. O. Communist front. With the aid of Browder, leader of the Communist (dissolved?) Party, this alien-minded group seeks complete control of the political and economic life of 132,000,000 American people. It was Hillman who was elated over the Red control in sit-down strikes. If the subversive elements in this country can rise to power by wringing dollars from the sweat of loyal Americans by Communist technique, then free elections have come to an end in the Republic of the United States.

I offer for the RECORD a clear and concise statement by the noted columnist, Frank R. Kent, which appeared in the Detroit Free Press of August 11, 1944, entitled "Hillman as an Issue":

HILLMAN AS AN ISSUE

(By Frank R. Kent)

WASHINGTON.—As the weeks go by it becomes clearer that the Russian-born Mr. Sidney Hillman, with his communistic background and affiliations, his C. I. O. Political Action Committee, his Communist-controlled American Labor Party and his $6,000,000 fourth-term fund, is the outstanding figure in this campaign, and that he and what he represents are likely to become an outstanding issue.

And they should be. For this is their fight. It has been from the start; it will be to the end. And success will put the forces lined up behind Mr. Hillman in a position of dominance and power such as no one dreamed they could achieve.

For the first time the radical and subversive elements are not only lined up solidly behind a Presidential candidate but, taking practical possession of his party, are making the fight for him. That is not exaggeration; it is a simple statement of the facts.

And when you link them with a Federal machine of three and one-half million jobholders, plus the weight of the Kelly-Hague type of city bosses, the formidable nature of the fourth-term combination can be realized.

That this situation is distasteful and offensive to the great bulk of the American people there can be little doubt. Nor, once clearly comprehended, can there be much question that the reaction would be strong and unfavorable.

The difficulty is to get the facts home to them. This will be the big test of Governor Dewey's ability as a candidate. For, it is accepted that he is going to meet the C. I. O.-Communist combination head-on. Not to do so would be stupid as well as cravan and Governor Dewey is neither. As every vote the C. I. O. can influence and every Communist in the country is pro-Roosevelt anyhow, it is clear he can lose no votes by a bold challenge.

On the contrary, if his challenge is strong enough and his attack skillful enough, there is no other way in which he can gain as many votes.

Ghosts at the Oaks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of Monday, August 21, 1944:

GHOSTS AT THE OAKS

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Dumbarton Oaks, the great mansion that takes up a long, long block out on R Street in Georgetown, is one of the most beautiful houses in the world. Robert Woods Bliss, former United States Ambassador to the Argentine, and his wife, spent most of their leisure time during 30 years in the diplomatic service collecting rare things to adorn it. Then they gave the whole works to Harvard University as a combined art school and museum.

Scholars have come long distances to study in rich quietude at Dumbarton Oaks, hidden behind its high brick walls and the forest of trees that muffle vulgar sounds from the streets.

Today, Undersecretary Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., Britain's Sir Alexander Cadogan, Russia's Ambassador Andrei A. Gromyko, China's Ambassador Dr. Wei Tao-Ming and numerous other officials are gathering at Dumbarton Oaks to sketch out what they claim will be an international system of enforcing peace. The news columns are full of details about what they say they will do.

But as they meet, they will be troubled by ghosts. Big old houses like Dumbarton Oaks are all supposed to have ghosts, anyhow, according to the books we have been reading late at night recently in a last desperate search for a way of cooling off.

Such ghosts usually are members of the immediate family, and may even be called by their first names after a proper introduction.

The ghosts at Dumbarton Oaks are different in that they number several million and are all strangers, and what is worse, foreigners. They are, in fact, Poles.

Of course they won't disturb Communist Ambassador Gromyko with their groans and chain-rattling for he is by long years of training accustomed to the ghosts of murdered millions. But it will be interesting to see how Mr. Stettinius gets along with them.

These Polish ghosts are haunting Dumbarton Oaks because they want to see what Mr. Stettinius does about the test case of sincerity for all the four-freedom shouters. To wit, Poland.

You may well have forgotten it by now, but the war in Europe started on September 1, 1939, because Poland told Hitler to go to hell on several other counts.

The Poles were put up to it by England and France. On March 31, 1939, Prime Minister Chamberlain told the British House of Commons: "In the event of any action which clearly threatened Polish independence and which the Polish Government, accordingly, considered as vital to resist with their national forces, His Majesty's Government would feel themselves bound at once to lend the Polish Government all support in their power.

"They have given the Polish Government an assurance to that effect. I may add that the French Government have authorized me to make it plain that they stand in the same position as do His Majesty's Government."

The Poles thought that promise meant something, so they tangled with Hitler in September 1939 while Britain and France waged their famous sitzkrieg.

But not Mr. Gromyko's Russia. Stalin had just engineered a deal with Hitler in late August for Germany and Russia to partition Poland for the fourth time.

Hitler explained it all to the Germans after the fact on October 6, 1939, in a speech to the Reichstag:

"Poland of the Versailles Treaty will never rise again. This is guaranteed by two of the largest states in the world. Final reorganization of this territory and the question of reestablishment of the Polish state are problems which will not be solved by a war in the west but exclusively by Russia on the one hand and Germany on the other."

In Moscow, Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov echoed almost Hitler's exact words in a speech to the supreme council of the U. S. S. R. on October 31, 1939:

"One swift blow to Poland, first by the German Army and then by the Red Army, and nothing was left of this ugly offspring of the Versailles Treaty."

And at the end, for you to remember and think about these days, he added:

"We have always held that a strong Germany is an indispensable condition for a durable peace in Europe."

Stalin, who has never yet demanded "unconditional surrender" of Germany, has repeated that declaration in favor of a "strong Germany" time and again, these past 2 years.

Between them Hitler and Stalin have killed millions of Poles. We have just seen pictures of the German murder factories in which the Gestapo have gassed and burned Poles by the thousands.

The world is properly disgusted and horrified by what the Nazis have done. But what about the equally bloody work of the Reds?

The ghosts at Dumbarton Oaks today will be a trouble to Mr. Stettinius. Because Poland is the test case.

And what chance does he have of giving the Poles a square deal, with Mr. Gromyko of Russia looking Mr. Stettinius coldly in the eye—and Pal Joey's armies ripping through Poland again for the fourth invasion of that country since 1939?

The F. E. P. C. and the P. A. C. of C. I. O.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED GOSSETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, in a radio speech on June 29 during my recent campaign, I condemned the policies and actions of the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. and the so-called Fair Employment Practice Committee. Many people have written me for copies of this address. Because of the general interest in these two organizations, and because the American people should be fully informed concerning these threats to our democracy, I am now including it in my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

This is the third of a series of six 15-minute speeches over this radio station delivered by way of report to you folks who have honored me by election to the Congress. In these short talks only a few problems can be briefly discussed. In talk No. 1 I discussed the growing menace of bureaucracy and what we should do about it. In talk No. 2 I discussed the work I have done and expect to do in our fight against discriminatory freight rates and against trusts and monopolies, especially the gigantic farm machinery trust.

This talk will be devoted to an attack upon two other evils which threaten our domestic peace and security. Only by recognizing and understanding evils can we defend ourselves against them. By understanding the cause of disease we can eliminate disease by removing the causes. There are two new cancerous growths in American life which, if unabated, will bring us to grief. We'll discuss in order named the so-called Fair Employment Practice Committee, which could more properly be called the Unfair Employment Practice Committee, and the so-called Political Action Committee of the C. I. O., a radical, communistic group who are seeking to defeat public officials unfriendly to their program of state socialism. The principles and objectives of both committees are obnoxious to the American way of life, and constitute threats to our free institutions. The responsibility for these two committees does not rest particularly upon either Democrats or Republicans. In fact, an appropriation for the F. E. P. C. was recently saved in the House of Representatives by the votes of Republican Congressmen. The Fair Employment Practice Committee was created by Presidential decree for the alleged purpose of promoting fair employment practices throughout the country. From the beginning, however, it has meddled in the legitimate practices of legitimate business and has now grown into an arrogant, obnoxious bureau which seeks permanent status and authority. While only 10 percent of our population is Negro, 65 percent of the personnel of this committee is Negro and much of the white personnel has a communistic tinge, many of them being notorious radicals with Communist affiliations.

One of the first acts of this Committee was to attack 22 railroads and 4 rail brotherhoods for alleged discrimination against Negroes. When 12 southern railroads refused to employ Negroes as conductors and engineers they were cited for contempt. Many of you are familiar with the recent order of the F. E. P. C. directing the Dallas News to delete any mention of color in advertisements. A News ad stating, "Wanted, colored man to work at night as paper handler" was held to be discrimination against white labor. The paper was ordered to disregard race and color in both advertisements and employment.

Another case in the Western Electric plant at Baltimore further illustrates the nature of this Committee. When partitions were torn out between white and colored toilets the company sought to rebuild them. The F. E. P. C. immediately stepped in and decreed that no separate toilet facilities should be maintained in the plant, stating that to maintain these separate facilities was an act of discrimination.

The purposes and objectives of this Committee are to break down all forms of racial segregation. This Committee would force upon the country complete social equality, the indiscriminate commingling of races. As your Congressman I spoke against this Committee on the floor of Congress and sought to eliminate its appropriation. This attack was not an attack upon the Negro, for whom I have great sympathy. Segregation is not discrimination. These vicious and misguided individuals have no more right to force whites into Negro society than to force Negroes into white society.

The Lord made the different races and colors of people. Race purity is a virtue, not a vice. The quail and the turtledove do not cohabit. The catfish and the bass live in the same waters but do not unite. I feel sure many Negroes are proud of their race and wish to keep it relatively pure.

Prior to 1940 pictures were required on civil-service applications and a designation of the race to which one belonged. In 1940 a civil-service bill provided that pictures should no longer appear on civil-service applications, and that race should not be disclosed thereby. At that time I successfully offered an amendment to strike this provision from the bill, contending that prospective employers should at least have the right to see the picture of the person to be hired, and to know the race to which such person belonged. I contended that if a Negro were sought for a certain job, a Negro should be secured, and vice versa. Although I was successful in the Congress, the Civil Service Commission, as a result of pressure from certain groups in the Capital, and from certain politicians seeking Negro votes, deleted these distinguishing marks from their records. This was a first step in the campaign that has led to the F. E. P. C.

Your Congressman is one of a small group who has pledged himself to defeat proposed plans and legislation for the continuance of this un-American agency which, through bureaucratic coercion and intimidation, would completely revolutionize the American system of free enterprise and would eventually destroy the social and economic standards of all races.

Now for the second part of this talk, my attack upon the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. First, let me say, like many other southern Democrats who fear and distrust this Committee, I am a friend of labor, organized or unorganized. My ancestors on both sides of the house have been from the beginning of time farmers and laborers who earned their living by the sweat of their brows. The folks who toil have always been the backbone and bulwark of democracy and are entitled to protection from radical, communistic leadership that would destroy them.

In my 1938 race for Congress the first line of my platform was this: "I believe in democracy. I hate communism and fascism." In May of 1940 I succeeded in attaching the following amendment to a National Defense War Department Appropriation bill: "Provided further, That none of the money authorized under this legislation shall be used to pay the salaries of any Communist or Fascist." That was among the first efforts made in the Congress to purge our Government of Communists and those who have contempt for the Constitution.

A few months ago, for the avowed purpose of defeating Members of Congress unfriendly to their program, the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. was created, headed by Russian-born Sidney Hillman, long the President of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, C. I. O. Mr. Hillman came from Russia in 1907 and is said to have objected to military service during the first World War. His Political Action Committee has been condemned by William Green, President of the A. F. or L. as being Communist inspired and dominated. Even radical John L. Lewis, who I at one time, perhaps in error, called Public Enemy No. 1, has labeled this Committee a Communist organization. Nevertheless this Committee has boasted of some $4,000,000 in its political pot to spend in electing friendly candidates and defeating unfriendly candidates, and has opened 14 regional offices throughout the United States, including one in Dallas. I consider it a compliment to be on the blacklist of this Committee. If I am defeated, they will take full credit for it.

Among the Committee's avowed friends at this time is Earl Browder, long president of the Communist Party of America, and recently released from the penitentiary. This organization has strongly supported the Fair Employment Practice Committee, and is advocating its creation as a permanent agency of Government with increased power. It has opposed parity prices to farmers, has advocated Federal antilynch laws, and Federal laws abolishing poll taxes. It would destroy all States' rights. It has condemned all forms of segregation as discrimination, and has at all times placed so-called social gains, group privileges, ahead of the country's war program.

I wish I had time to tell you the complete story of Thomas de Lorenzo, who is typical of those whom the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. defends. When the war broke out the Navy gave millions of dollars in airplane contracts to the Brewster Aeronautical Corporation. About the time the war program began Thomas de Lorenzo became president of the C. I. O. union which controlled the Brewster plant and its 20,000 employees. From the beginning the Brewster plant had labor troubles. Numerous strikes, slow downs, and failures to meet schedules cost the Government millions of dollars and many airplanes, and finally resulted in the cancellation of the Brewster contract. In exhaustive hearings before a congressional committee it developed that Thomas de Lorenzo, president and dictator of the C. I. O. at Brewster, had gone under six different names. He admitted having lied about his age, name, and former employment at the time he was hired by Brewster. He admitted having sworn falsely in court when he secured a change in his name. Although at one time he swore he had never been arrested, he later admitted 15 charges and convictions of misdemeanors and two indictments for felonies. He admitted filing several false income-tax returns, of having lied on a civil-service application, and of having sworn falsely to his draft board. After admitting all these numerous cases of perjury and false swearing, Mr. de Lorenzo stated that he had no intention of changing his way of life, and expected to lie whenever it was necessary.

Mr. de Lorenzo admitted causing a slowdown in the Brewster plant at one time because three women, not members of his union, were found asleep in the fuselage of a plane, and discharged by the foreman. After admitting responsibility for strikes and slow-downs and a loss in airplane production Mr. de Lorenzo made this statement, "Our policy is not to win the war at any cost. The policy of our local union is to win the war without sacrificing too much of the rights which we have at the present time." He repeated, confirmed, and verified this statement subsequent to its making. At another time he confirmed and admitted having stated, when it was pointed out that a loss of airplane production might cost the lives of American soldiers, that "If I had brothers at the front who needed the 10 or 12 planes that were sacrificed I would let them die." In other words, this reprehensible president of C. I. O. Local No. 365, U. A. W., C. I. O., who completely dominated the labor in one of our large airplane plants, was more concerned with imaginary grievances and selfish gains than with the blood of his own brothers.

In a speech on the floor of Congress on February 26, 1942, I read the following report from the Washington Post:

"Alex Blaint, who was reported by the Associated Press yesterday as having led Congress of Industrial Organizations workers out of the Monarch Aluminum Manufacturing Co. plant at Cleveland, figured last year in hearings before the Dies Committee Investigating Un-American Activities. On June 10 he was pictured before the committee as a Communist, an alien, and a former convict. He denied testimony of two witnesses who said he had told them he was a Communist, but admitted he was a Hungarian whose final citizenship papers had been held up, and that he had served 11 months in a reformatory on a charge of automobile theft."

I then added: "An alien and an admitted ex-convict stops production on vital airplane parts. This is an insult to patriotic labor throughout America."

There are many Alex Blaints and Thomas de Lorenzos within the folds of the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. They cast an ugly shadow upon the marvelous production record of American industry and American labor. They cast an ugly shadow, too, across the years immediately ahead.

Such groups as the F. E. P. C. and the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. are threats to the security, happiness, and prosperity of the American people, particularly the people of the South and Southwest.

As your Congressman I shall continue to fight against these baneful influences in American life. Their weapons are false propaganda, fear, threats, coercion, intimidation, and political action against those who thwart their designs. America must not be dominated by any selfish-interest pressure groups. To expose and defeat them shall be my constant aim and effort.

Commander in Chief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Mount Vernon (Ohio) News of August 16, 1944:

COMMANDER IN CHIEF

Technically the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of all the armed forces of the country.

In actual practice, however, this title is a nominal one. Military duties are left to military men who by reason of careful training and long experience are qualified to assume the responsibility of directing our armed forces during time of war.

So, Presidents as a rule have ignored the fact that, by virtue of their office, they are heads of the country's armed forces. They have been content to be known as the Chief Executive of this great Republic.

Not until Mr. Roosevelt came upon the scene; in fact, not until he became a candidate for a fourth term as President was use made of the more or less honorary title of Commander in Chief.

Now, though, the New Deal publicists are making full use of it—for political purposes. Mr. Roosevelt is being referred to more often in these sources as Commander in Chief than he is as President of the country.

The reason is obvious.

The big appeal for reelecting Mr. Roosevelt to a fourth term is based upon the theory that a change should not be made in the office of Commander in Chief while the war is in progress.

The theory that Mr. Roosevelt is the military genius that is directing our effort does not hold water.

Mr. Roosevelt is a civilian and always has been. All of his efforts have been devoted to politics. In politics he has had plenty of experience and plenty of training, and has come to be recognized as one of the smartest, if not the smartest, politician in American history.

However, experience, training, and skill in politics do not qualify a man for military position, even a minor one.

All of our top-notch military men, all those of England, Russia, Japan, and Germany, are men who have devoted their lives to study of military problems. They are graduates of the finest military schools in the world, and most of them have had wide experience in actual combat.

There is one notable exception—Adolf Hitler, the German fuehrer who takes a hand in the development of German military strategy. And Hitler has had military experience, as a corporal in the German Army in World War No. 1.

But this experience was not sufficient to qualify Hitler for military leadership, judging by the disastrous results that have attended his interference with the grand war plan developed by the German high command.

German military leaders are blaming Hitler's blunders for costly defeats suffered by German arms; they are accusing him of having arbitrarily overruled the high command in matters of such tremendous importance that they have brought Germany to the verge of defeat.

It thus may be seen what happens when a civilian attempts to give military decisions, when politics and military matters are scrambled.

There is no danger of the United States suffering military defeats through civilian management or political complications. Mr. Roosevelt is too wise for that.

He leaves military matters to military men. General Marshall, Admiral King, General Eisenhower, General MacArthur, Admiral Nimitz and all the other crack military men plan the campaigns and execute them.

Our part of the war is being directed by men well qualified through long years of training and study, through experience and natural aptitude. The results of this practice are a succession of great victories.

Any attempt to place credit elsewhere is misleading and takes credit away from those who have toiled long years to prepare themselves for the task of leading American forces to victory.

The plain truth of the matter is that Mr. Roosevelt is not the military genius behind American successes in battle. He is Commander in Chief of our armed forces in name only.

The New Dealers' attempt to promote him as such is a political trick designed to remove objections to a fourth term and keep Mr. Roosevelt in an office that is civilian and political, pure and simple.

It is taking unfair advantage of the war emergency by mixing politics and the war effort.

Process of Elimination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED NORMAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. NORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD today an editorial from the Daily Washingtonian, of Hoquiam, Wash., published by my able friend, Mr. Russell V. Mack.

The editorial points out that the Republican Presidential and Vice Presidential candidates have disowned and denounced political and racial bigots seeking to fasten themselves on the G. O. P., and it asks the pointed question of whether the Democratic Party should not have the same courage and disown and denounce the political bigots who are obviously hoping to take over this party and, with it, the whole country.

Detailing how Mr. Dewey and Mr. Bricker "lopped off the America Firsters from the fringe of the Republican Party," Mr. Mack wonders why the Democrats do not cut out from the heart of their party "other elements which are foreign to American principles and policies?"

He refers to the American Communists and their fellow travelers who, he says, "have merged with the American Labor Party and are making their presence felt in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee."

Mr. Mack ends the editorial with a very clear and pointed question which I think can well be studied by not only Democrats—the real Democrats—but by every American who has the great responsibility of making the right selections when he marks his ballot this fall. This question, as phrased by Mr. Mack, is as follows: "So wouldn't it be well if the Democratic candidates followed the Republican example now and repudiated, once and for all, these other elements which are foreign to American principles and policies?"

I am glad to insert here the entire editorial for the information of my colleagues:

PROCESS OF ELIMINATION

Inevitably in our two-party system of government each party collects some embarrassingly bigoted groups who, though small in number, still command enough votes to make the professional politician think twice before reaching for the ax. This year the Republicans collected Gerald L. K. Smith and the America Firsters; the Democrats, Earl Browder and the Communists.

The other day, however, Thomas E. Dewey and John W. Bricker lopped off the America Firsters from the fringe of the Republican Party. In strongest terms of denunciation and repudiation, they scorched Smith for his attempt to put Governor Bricker's name on an America First ticket.

This repudiation is commendable and necessary. It gives notice that we have no existing political haven for racial bigotry, just as the two party platforms make it clear (though they may differ in detail) that there is no room for isolationism in either party's post-war policy.

The repudiation certainly cost some votes. Smith claims 3,000,000. True or not, he does control a substantial number. If an America First ticket can be put in the field it might cost the Republicans one or more States. In the Midwest the America Firsters' stronghold, the Republicans carried Michigan by less than 5,000, Indiana by only 25,000, and lost Illinois in 1940.

Nevertheless, the great majority of Americans will applaud this denunciation, and the candidates' refusal to accept organized support from a group whose beliefs are associated with racial bigotry. For certainly such bigotry is repugnant to the spirit and tradition of a nation founded on the principle that all men are created equal.

So too is political bigotry. It may not be so distasteful at the moment, since the American Communists—for whom the war began with the invasion of Russia, and international collaboration with the Teheran Conference—are currently starry-eyed champions of democracy. Only the most naive, however, can imagine that their conversion is anything more than momentary and expedient, or that it is not subject to change without notice.

The American Communists have embraced, if not the Democratic Party, at least its national ticket. They have merged with the American Labor Party and are making their presence felt in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. Their organizational ability—smooth, seasoned, zealous, and tireless—can win votes.

So wouldn't it be well if the Democratic candidates followed the Republican example now and repudiated, once and for all, these other elements which are foreign to American principles and policies?

What Shall We Do With Germany?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ZEBULON WEAVER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH GERMANY?

As the end of fighting approaches we find throughout our Nation a baffling confusion about what, and how, to do with Germany when this end comes. If we are not careful we may find ourselves in the position of the Negro who caught the bear, and then hollered for someone to come and help him turn it loose.

Recently, in a Town Hall meeting, the subject of what best to do with Germany was debated by four very distinguished men, mostly German-born, and all well enlightened on Germany's traditional behavior, yet, they did not agree. This clearly tells us that this most important subject should not be left wholly to those supposed to know internal Germany, but should have the attention of every thinking citizen in the land. For, whatever course is finally decided upon, the staggering cost of carrying it out must come from the Allied taxpayers' pockets. There can be but little hope of ever recovering this enormous sum from a financially destitute Germany.

Whatever we do must be founded on the prevention of another war. To accomplish this, we must first smother out completely the Nazi form of government. But, how can we best accomplish this? Experience has taught us that destitution, and internal turmoil, inevitably brings about government destruction in a more lasting manner than any other agency. This desired destruction of nazi-ism will come about much faster if we do not occupy Germany for any prolonged period. To speed its destruction we must not, in any sense, play Santa Claus for them. For, should we occupy Germany for the purpose of creating and establishing a new government to regulate those stubborn bull-headed people, we must first refuse to recognize the entire Nazi regime. And, the minute we do this, we shall have assumed the responsibility of a German government. This immediately invites the German populace to lean on us for protection from want. In this manner we would have upon our shoulders the burden of the after-effects of their war of which they, the German people, should justly bear the brunt.

The more we study the impending situation the clearer it becomes that the destitute will demand that we supply their needs. If we refuse this, we shall be blamed for years to come for causing all the hardships in Germany, when, in truth, our presence would have no relation whatever to the cause of it all. Better judgment here dictates that we do not allow the spirit of vengeance to lead us into this position. But, rather that we allow them to look to themselves for adjustment of their own grievances. We need have no thought of inflicting punishment upon them; they will do it themselves. Then why should we remain there and ameliorate their own self-inflicted punishment? Besides, since we are going to be heavily taxed with our own readjustment and that of the devastated, occupied countries—which most certainly should be put before Germany—how can we justify ourselves in the expenditure necessary to govern the rehabilitation of Germany?

Occupy Germany; yes, by all means, every inch of it, but temporarily for the following purposes only:

A. Release and return to their respective countries all prisoners and captive labor now being held in Germany.

B. The demobilization of Germany's entire military structure, including the Gestapo. The surrender to us of all weapons of war and the machinery for its manufacture, all to be melted down as salvaged junk.

C. Arrest all known war criminals and send them to the several countries in which their atrocities were committed, to be dealt with according to the laws of justice in these countries. Also, round up and try those whose war crimes were committed on German soil.

D. Return to each occupied country all that can be found of which they have been robbed by the Germans. This to include the gold and securities that were plundered from their vaults. Germany must be made to pay back to these countries, in value, for what she stole that cannot be found.

E. Return, at once, to Germany, from all the occupied countries, Germany's disabled whose care is now being forced upon these countries.

F. Drive back into Germany all German settlers of Nazi extraction that Germany has placed upon seized lands of the occupied countries.

G. Return to Germany all war prisoners, sick and well, that they too may share with the German people the hardships brought on by their own brutal war activities. (Reduce our load and increase theirs.)

All this in order that the German people have the fullest load of their responsibility in facing the effects of the brutal war they have conducted. The cost, to us, of all this the German people must eventually pay.

With this, and whatever else may be found necessary, accomplished, we then withdraw our troops from German soil, bring most of them home, and inform the German people that they have 2 years, or such time as may be deemed necessary, to reorganize and form a new government. No former Nazi officer, or official, or school teacher, is to be eligible for office or position. Then, there must be the destruction of all Nazi insignia. The wearing of other than civilian clothes by any former officer, or official of the Nazi party must be forbidden.

(This latter is important, for the German people, traditionally, are natural worshipers of bombastic display, and worship of German officers, whose continued strutting in public in uniform would only keep alive the Nazi military spirit that we wish to help the decent German people to destroy.)

The German people must be given to understand that they are to have perfect freedom in the selection of their leaders and school teachers, so long as none of them have had any affiliation with the Nazi regime. This new government must provide, and protect, a free press and radio communications.

An alert border guard must be maintained, at their expense, to prevent any of them escaping their own self-inflicted after-war hardships. The German people alone must combat the natural reaction from training their citizens to rob, plunder, rape, and slaughter helpless and inoffensive people. They themselves must fight their gangsters whom they have trained to do these things. No American life should be jeopardized in this inevitable turmoil.

From time to time, and at the expiration of the allotted time for their reorganization, they must submit to a complete and thorough investigation throughout the entire structure of their new government, for approval or disapproval, of their activities in bringing about a better and freer Germany. It shall be the duty of the Allied Council making these investigations, to search out, and order the removal of any traces of nazi-ism from office, and, more particularly, from the schools.

It cannot be repeated too often that the German people must be made to understand that expected help from any of the Allied nations will depend entirely upon their own manner and principle of reorganization in obedience to the terms given by the Allied Council. The Germans, as a nation, must be completely ignored until they have founded a new and acceptable government.

Germany must be denied all financial help. In this connection it must be seen that from a permanent army of occupation she would reap the benefits in many, many millions of dollars from sales to our soldiers, billet rent, any many other Army expenditures. From their vision of these benefits we could justify them in begging for our occupancy, or attempting to bring it about by treachery. It must be clear to all that prolonged occupancy of Germany will only alleviate their grievances. For the harder time they have amongst themselves, the more and sooner will be their reaction against nazi-ism that brought it upon them. In this, and in no other manner, can they be forced to create their own hatred for nazi-ism and war. It is true that the prevailing spirit for revenge demands that we occupy Germany, and make them, by force of arms, do as we want, but intelligence here dictates that the more we leave them alone the more they will punish themselves. And, as we have seen, occupancy would only alleviate the hardships that would naturally come upon them.

The Hitler youth, thousands upon thousands of them, schooled and trained into an obsession of finding joy in murderous brutality, are not going to be easily, if ever at all, tamed. So let the German people who approved of, and aided in distorting these minds, tame the wild beasts themselves. Let these brutishly inclined people, for once, get enough of themselves and the effects of their fanatical faith in nazi-ism.

Based on an intimate knowledge of the behavior of these people and their deceptive mannerisms I venture that, beyond the obsessed and arrogant youth, when the Army enters Germany for occupancy it will be almost impossible to find any civilian that will admit that he ever believed in nazi-ism. They will plead that they have been cruelly oppressed, which is true in some cases, and they will hold out their hands for pity and help. But behind this veil they are, in majority, what they are, Nazis to the core. How, otherwise, then are such people to be dealt with?

HERRMAN M. KNATH,

OTEEN, N. C.

The Pearl Harbor Disaster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, the American people have not, cannot, and will not forget Pearl Harbor.

Though nearly 3 years have elapsed since that unparalleled catastrophe happened, this administration has persistently refused to tell the American people the whole story and the full truth about this tragedy.

Pearl Harbor is not a political football to be kicked around all over the field, but is a sad and tragic event in our history about which the American people want to know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

The Democratic candidate for Vice President of the United States in this week's Collier's magazine, by inference and innuendo, has leveled serious charges against Admiral Kimmel and General Short, who were in command of our armed services at Pearl Harbor when the Japs attacked.

Admiral Kimmel, in his letter addressed to Senator TRUMAN and released yesterday to the press, branded the charges of the Vice Presidential candidate as false. Said Admiral Kimmel:

> The real story of the Pearl Harbor attack and the events preceding it has never been publicly told. This has not been my decision. For more than 2½ years I have been anxious to have the American people know all the facts.

Mr. Speaker, following Pearl Harbor I demanded publicly both in and out of Congress an immediate court martial of these two commanders. I wanted neither to attack them nor to defend them, but simply give them their day in court. They have been denied by this administration an opportunity to defend themselves in public. If they are guilty, they should be properly punished and relieved not only of their commands, but also of their retirement salary of $6,000 a year. If they are innocent, they should be exonerated of all blame.

Instead of a regular court martial—the natural, normal, and logical procedure invariably followed—this administration chose to send a commission to Hawaii to investigate. And instead of being told the full facts surrounding this lamentable event we got the garbled Roberts report. Admiral Kimmel in his letter to Senator TRUMAN truthfully states:

> The Roberts report upon which you rely does not contain the basic truths of the Pearl Harbor catastrophe. * * * Until I am afforded a hearing in open court it is grossly unjust to repeat false charges against me when by official action I have been persistently denied an opportunity to defend myself publicly.
> I suggest that until such time as complete disclosure is made of the facts about Pearl Harbor, you refrain from repeating charges based on evidence that has never met the test of public scrutiny.

I ask for nothing more than an end to untruths and half-truths about this matter until the entire story is given the people, who I am convinced will be amazed at the truth.

Mr. Speaker, repeatedly, I have stated that the true story of Pearl Harbor would rock this Nation and shock the American people when they once hear it.

Last December I succeeded in getting a resolution through both houses of Congress extending the statute of limitations for 6 months for the court martial of Admiral Kimmel and General Short. Three weeks before this extension expired in June, I introduced another resolution making it mandatory that courts martial be held within the next 3 months. That resolution passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 305 to 35. But this administration, not wanting to face the issue before the general election this November, succeeded in getting the resolution modified, calling simply for an investigation by the War and Navy Departments, and extending the time to 6 months, or until December 7, following the election this fall.

Why the attempt is now made by one of the candidates on the national Democratic ticket to make Admiral Kimmel and General Short the scapegoats for the Pearl Harbor disaster, I cannot understand unless it is to protect the Commander in Chief of our armed forces at that time, and to prevent the revelation of the real truth that might prove most embarrassing to if not destructive of fourth-term ambitions.

Certainly Admiral Kimmel and General Short, like every other American, are entitled to their day in court, and they should not be blamed for this worst military defeat in our history until they are given a free, open, public, and impartial trial. Perhaps the American people will act as a jury on this case when they go to the polls on November 7.

Unless the War and Navy Departments now investigating Pearl Harbor report soon to the Congress, it is the duty and responsibility of this democratic House to have brought before the appropriate committees of the House both Admiral Kimmel and General Short to tell their full story.

Great Britain Must Act To Save Hungarian Jews

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, with the announcement that Regent Nicholas Horthy of Hungary has consented to permit emigration of Jewish children under 10 who can obtain visas and of adults who have visas to Palestine, Great Britain can no longer deny her responsibility and hide behind the MacDonald White Paper.

Every excuse for barring Jewish immigration in Palestine is gone. Certificates of entrance to Palestine can no longer be withheld on the ground that the Jews cannot, anyway, escape from Germany or German-held territory. No military necessity precludes the transfer of Hungarian Jews to Palestine. The offer is clear. The Jews of Hungary can escape death. The only passport to freedom is a visa to Palestine for the hunted and helpless Jews of Hungary. Surely, Britain cannot now betray the humanitarian instincts of mankind. Surely, the British Government will not permit the Horthy Government to say that since nobody is really interested in saving the Jewish people of Hungary, he might just as well let the Germans have them to do with them as they will.

Up to 3 weeks ago, Hungary deported 10,000 Jews daily to the Polish camps Berkinau and Oswiacien. It is estimated that 400,000 Jews still survive in Hungary.

These precious bits of paper, the certificates of entrance to Palestine, mean salvation to the Jews in Hungary. In the tussle between politics and human values, must not human values prevail?

All Allied Nations must act in concert to aid the remnants of Hungarian Jews before it is too late and they too disappear as did the 4,000,000 victims of Hitler's fury. It will be to Britain's everlasting shame if to Horthy's offer she gives no answer but silence.

If Great Britain does not unbar the door of Palestine to the escaping Jews, she will have then abandoned these people to the Nazi will. What that will is, we have seen. As defeat comes closer to the Reich, she will vent all her fury on the driven Jew.

It must be remembered at all times that Palestine is a mandated territory, that in administering the territory Britain is administering a trust. The interest of the United States in Palestine has been manifested through its congressional resolution of 1922, in the Anglo-American treaty of 1924, and, more recently, in the platform planks of both American political parties. The Anglo-American treaty was a joint act of the United States and Great Britain, wherein it was agreed that no one shall be excluded from Palestine on the ground of race or religion. That treaty was violated with the promulgation of the MacDonald White Paper, which closed the doors of Palestine to Jewish immigration and restricted land owning. If the sanctity of treaties is one of the pillars of civilization, and we so regard it, why must this treaty of 1924 be regarded as a scrap of paper?

In the meantime, what is the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees, now functioning in London and of which Great Britain is a member, doing? Its chief obstacle, it has always complained, is the inability of the refugees to escape.

Now the exit has been provided. Will it act so that Britain can provide the only practical entrance? Or will the committee embrace the terms of the MacDonald White Paper as it has previously done and as did the conferees at the Bermuda conference? The issue can no longer be hidden. No white paper must stand in the way now. No diplomatic niceties can obscure the choice. Once again it is human lives against the Chamberlain appeasement policy of the MacDonald White Paper.

San Francisco's Manpower Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, on August 17, 1944, the San Francisco Examiner published an editorial headed "West coast manpower."

The article sets forth conditions facing San Francisco's Bay area. Under permission granted me, I ask that the editorial be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that all Government agencies may be informed of our problem in the far West:

WEST COAST MANPOWER

War workers of the San Francisco Bay area are entitled to official assurance, now, that they will not be penalized for remaining on the job here until the last shot is fired.

Responsibility for giving such assurance, and for backing it up with tangible evidence, rests upon every military and civilian agency of the United States Government which is concerned with bringing the war to a successful conclusion—not only in Europe, but in the Pacific as well.

What we face here in the bay area is a war manpower crisis that has suddenly developed because of the general belief that X-Day, when Germany surrenders, cannot be many months away.

Included in the working population of the Bay area are 225,000 in-migrants—men and women who came here from other States and who have done and are doing a magnificent war job.

Their roots are not here, however, and to the sense of insecurity that comes from being away from home, there is now added the disquieting belief that other parts of the country will be swiftly reconverted in part to civilian production when Germany collapses, while the west coast is forced to remain on a strict, all-out war basis until Japan yields to Allied might.

Thousands of these in-migrant war workers, determined to be ready for peacetime employment when Germany is crushed, already have departed for their homes in other States. Other thousands are making ready to leave.

Yet X-Day will not see a slackening of the war effort in the bay area and on the coast as a whole. On the contrary, it is then that the full fury of America's striking power will be unleashed against Japan, with a consequent need in this region for even more production, more ship loading, more services, and more manpower.

Lack of manpower in the bay region will hamstring this final effort as effectually as the loss of fighting men and fighting ships.

It cannot be allowed to occur, and the Labor Management Committee of the War Manpower Commission, northern California area, has presented a solution that is both simple and equitable.

The Commission proposes as a necessary first step that there be equality in conversion between the coast area and the balance of the United States, to the end that there be no economic premium held out to those who leave this vital area.

It would achieve this by immediate announcement by appropriate Federal agencies that as of X-Day, employers on the coast may reconvert to civilian production a proportion of their war work, this diverted proportion to be performed elsewhere in the United States.

The program further calls for immediate implementing by employers in the form of paper work such as planning and blueprints; the limited accumulation of stock piles; such provision for retooling as the exigencies of war permitted, and actual production of civilian goods at once in industries where manpower and materials are currently available.

Such implementing would provide instant, tangible, visual evidence to war workers that reconversion in the West offers as many post-war job opportunities as will be found elsewhere in the United States—that no economic penalties will be imposed on loyal war workers who stay to finish the job.

This is a program not only for the bay area and the Pacific coast.

It is a program for America—a just and broad-gauge plan for winning the war abroad, and winning the peace at home.

The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege during my brief service in the House to participate as a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation in the formulation of legislation to provide a program for the readjustment of our returning service men and women and for their reestablishment in civilian life.

I want to take this occasion to summarize, for these servicemen and their families, the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, generally referred to as the G. I. bill of rights, which provides:

WAR AGENCY

This law makes the Veterans' Administration a war agency, second only to the Army and Navy, placing it high in priority for employees, equipment, and material; especially for new hospitals, for the construction of which an appropriation of $500,000,000 is authorized.

RECORDS AND ADVICE

Records of all disabilities will be completely assembled before the degree of disability is passed upon, and prior to discharge the serviceman (this includes women, too) may consult with representatives of veterans' organizations, located at hospitals, about making claim for post-war benefits. A serviceman cannot be compelled to sign any statement relative to the cause of injury or disability, and if such a statement, though signed, is against his interest, it will be null and void.

REVIEW OF DISCHARGES

In the event a discharge is other than honorable, unless it is the result of a general court martial, the veteran may have all facts reviewed by a board in the War or the Navy Department, as the case may be, and, if justified, a new discharge can be issued. Officers retired for disability, not in line of duty, may also call for a review of the action of the retiring boards.

READJUSTMENT BENEFITS

Upon discharge, other than dishonorable, after 90 days' service subsequent to September 16, 1940, or upon discharge for an actual service-incurred disability, veterans, regardless of rank, will be entitled to—

EDUCATION

One year's education, and a further period of education equal to the time in service not to exceed, in all, 4 years, if war service interfered with, interrupted, or delayed the veteran's education. If the veteran was not over 25 years of age when he entered service it is provided that his education shall be automatically held to have been delayed or interfered with. If he was over 25 he must make a reasonable showing of these facts.

Uncle Sam pays for all books, tuition up to $500 per year, and a monthly subsistence allowance of $50 if without dependents—$75 with dependents. This will not afford regal fare, but it will get him through school.

A veteran can choose his own course, or courses, in any approved school wherever located, but he must pay his own transportation to such school.

Continuance of training, of course, depends on maintaining records satisfactory to school authorities as to grades and conduct.

For older men, primarily, or younger men if they need it, a year's retraining or refresher course is provided so they can bring themselves in line with improved and up-to-date practices in their trade or profession.

LOANS

A guaranty by the Government of 50 percent of a loan, or loans, to be made by a private financial institution in his home community or elsewhere, or by a governmental lending agency, the aggregate amount guaranteed not to exceed a total of $2,000. Interest shall not exceed 4 percent, and the Government will pay the first year's interest on the amount guaranteed. Proceeds of such loans must be used in the construction, purchase, or improvement of a home; purchase or improvement of a farm; or establishment of a business.

This section is expected to become operative in October.

EMPLOYMENT

Under supervision of the Veterans' Administration the utmost assistance in obtaining employment is offered veterans through existing agencies, and in every State a veteran's placement officer (himself a veteran) will be on the job to help see these opportunities are given.

READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCE

A weekly readjustment allowance of $20 per week during unemployment—by compliance with State laws relative to unemployment compensation, that is, if unemployed, he applies for work, cannot obtain suitable work, and keeps his file alive—for a period of not more than 52 weeks (based on length of service—24 weeks for 90 days' service and 4 weeks for each month of additional service) during a period of 2 years after discharge. Requirements are rigid enough to discourage "goldbricking" and to prevent duplication of benefits.

In the case of a self-employed veteran in business or a profession, or operating a farm, whose net income is less than $100 per month, there will be granted the difference to bring his monthly net income up to $100 for not more than 12 monthly payments.

This section takes effect Sunday, September 3.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

For all these benefits the Veterans' Administration is the single agency to which the veteran need apply, and the application should be made to the regional office of the Veterans' Administration for the area in which he resides. Applications for benefits must be made within the following periods after discharge:

Review of discharge: Within 15 years after discharge, or effective date of this act, whichever is later.

Education: Within 2 years after discharge or end of war, whichever is later. Education benefits end 7 years after the war.

Loans: Within 2 years after discharge or end of war, whichever is later, but in any event within 5 years after the war.

Readjustment allowance: Within 2 years after discharge or end of war, whichever is later.

Future bonus: If later legislation provides for adjusted compensation—bonus—the amounts paid hereunder will probably be deducted from such bonus payments.

These benefits are in addition to those already provided under existing laws relating to disability compensation, pensions, hospitalization, and vocational rehabilitation, which for the most part are the same as those provided for veterans of World War No. 1. There are a number of details not included here, but this gives in general terms the high points of the law. If you have any questions regarding details, get in touch with any veterans' organization—American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans, Purple Heart, and so forth—or, if you prefer, write ERRETT P. SCRIVNER, House Office Building, Washington, D. C. We here are at the service of veterans and their dependents at all times to answer questions or to assist in the presentation of claims under this act or any other statute granting benefits to veterans.

Weekly Papers Have Great Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, at this critical era of American history it is imperative that the people be intelligently informed, so that they may be fortified in approaching crucial problems. More than half of our citizenry resides on farms or in small communities which are served by weekly newspapers. Therefore it is timely to observe the comment made by Albert S. Goss, master of the National Grange, in pointing out that weekly newspapers have a greater influence over farmers than any other media.

I am personally acquainted with the country editors of Idaho, and I am in accord with the conclusions of Mr. Goss to the extent that our Idaho weekly papers are doing an outstanding job in serving their readers, our State, and the Nation. Under leave to extend my remarks, I insert the following statement by Mr. Goss, which appeared in the American Press in July 1944:

Weekly newspapers go into nearly every farm home in America. They are more closely read by the farmer than any other publication which he receives. Unquestionably the effect they have on formulating rural opinion is tremendous. In this way they are possessed of a great privilege and a great responsibility. They are in a position to influence the American farmer for good or ill as is no other instrument in our land.

Over 53.6 percent of our people are either farming or directly dependent on farm trade for a livelihood. Here is the place where the most of the new wealth of the Nation is created. National prosperity is dependent on the production of this wealth.

The foundation of this prosperity lies among these 53.6 percent—the very people who are served by most of the weekly press.

Anything which fosters the production of this wealth and the prosperity of this segment of our people is in the national interest, while that which retards its production will not only destroy the prosperity of 53.6 percent but will also bring disaster upon the whole Nation.

As obvious as this is, and as simple as it sounds, many in our urban centers fail to recognize these basic truths and contend that our prosperity depends on cheap food, often priced below cost, without regard to the effect on the 53.6 percent who are the very foundation of prosperity. These people are the last stronghold of our free enterprise system. Here is found our strongest opposition to centralization of Government, to regimentation, and to subsidies, even though they may be the immediate beneficiaries of such a system.

Unfortunately, more often than not the great metropolitan papers and national news magazines have not understood the problems and the difficulties which our farmers are facing. Radio commentators with a city background also have failed to appreciate what American agriculture has done to maintain our American way of life.

As a result, the thousands of weekly newspapers throughout the Nation must carry the burden of telling the truth about the problems of our basic industry: Agriculture.

During these war years the threat to constitutional government is growing day by day. The stresses and strains of war are heavy, but the danger from external foes has served to weld us together in our struggle toward victory. However, once that victory is attained, the dangers of national disunity will be multiplied one-hundred-fold. No longer faced by exterior danger, and with enormous economic problems to be solved, it will be the task of responsible leaders of agriculture, labor, management, industry, the press, and the radio to work together to preserve all that is best in our social and political system. In this post-war era, the country weekly and agriculture, by developing a closer relationship, can and will lead the fight to preserve our democratic society.

Weekly papers should make it a point to keep in close touch with local farm organizations, and they, in turn, should use the papers as a means of keeping themselves informed on the problems and the thinking of the entire community.

Truly the weekly press and the farmers working together have a large part to play in maintaining the American system of free enterprise.

Foreign-Trade Zones—Ocean Gateways to Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Thomas E. Lyons, executive secretary, Foreign-Trade Zones Board, before the thirty-first annual conference of the Pacific Coast Association of Port Authorities at Portland, Oreg., July 19–21, 1944:

Foreign trade for the post-war year of 1948 (assuming the war then will be over) will total more than $13,500,000,000 of which our imports will account for nearly $6,500,000,000. These estimates, based on 1942 values, are contained in the publication Foreign Trade After the War released last October by the Department of Commerce. An estimate of post-war imports of $8,000,000,000 by a New York banker published in the 1943 National Foreign Trade Convention Proceedings evidenced the fact that the Department of Commerce figures may be conservative.

Foreign Commerce Weekly recently published a study setting out our exports for the years of 1929 and 1937 as 29,100,000 and 28,800,000 cargo tons, respectively. Our imports for these identical years total 25,000,000 and 24,800,000 tons, respectively. Post-war tonnage estimates are set out as 34,000,000 tons exports, and 33,000,000 tons, imports. In other words, according to the Commerce Department study, post-war export tonnage will be 17½ percent over 1929 and 40 percent greater than in 1937. Import tonnage estimates for the post-war period run approximately 33⅓ percent higher than either 1929 or 1937.

The foregoing figures all refer to dry cargoes—the traffic in which you gentlemen, as port officials and terminal operators are particularly interested.

At first blush one pauses to wonder where sufficient bottoms will be available to transport this great volume of material. War requirements for a bridge of ships to span the seven seas has supplied the answer. By the end of this year we will have a cargo fleet of approximately 50 million tons—equal to two-thirds of the entire world's merchant marine at the outbreak of the war. Although substantial units of the cargo fleet will be required to maintain essential post-war military and relief activities, sufficient tonnage should be immediately available for resuming and extending essential trade routes.

War requirements prompted the Maritime Commission to accelerate the initial program for the construction of the highly efficient C type cargo ships and the Commission's recent change over from "Libertys" to "Victorys" assures ample high-speed merchant tonnage to inaugurate this new era of foreign trade. With an adequate supply of ships and sufficient available cargo, what else might be needed? The answer is obvious—ample marine terminals immediately available for efficiently handling these ships and their cargoes. For the present practically every pier, wharf, quay and transit shed in our major ports and in some instances, in the smaller ports too, capable of serving ocean-going vessels, is being employed in the war effort. What part of these facilities can we expect to be immediately available for commercial shipping? Let us review briefly the situation after the last war for it may supply the answer and help us set a clearer course for our post-war activities.

When World War No. 1 broke on us in 1917 our military leaders were confronted with the job of embarking and supplying a huge expeditionary army from piers and docks which had already proved inadequate for normal commerce.

To meet this situation, the most ambitious terminal-warehouse construction on record was carried out by the United States Army in 1918. Under the guiding genius of Gen. George W. Goethals, the builder of the Panama Canal, a series of terminals was erected at a cost of more than $150,000,000. These bases were located at Boston, Brooklyn, Newark, Philadelphia, Norfolk, Charleston, and New Orleans. It was first proposed that the terminals be of a temporary nature but General Goethals expressed his feelings that with American ports backward in modern terminal equipment, these bases for a comparatively small additional cost for permanent construction could become a useful addition to the Nation's port facilities.

During the period between the two World Wars limited new port facilities were erected by municipal and State agencies, such as the State docks at Mobile and the Smith Cove Terminal at Seattle. Except in the case of the excellent railroad-owned Harborside Terminal on the New Jersey side of the New York harbor, private construction of public terminals during the past two and one-half decades was practically nil. Following the First World War substantially all the Army terminals were made available for commercial operations and contributed substantially to the sum total of port facilities. Before our entry into the present global conflict most of the Government-owned terminals had been withdrawn from commercial use, and when our ship construction and acquisition program was fully under way many municipal and private facilities, both piers and complete terminals, were requisitioned or leased for military operations.

As war requirements taper off, both public and privately owned harbor facilities will be turned back to their former operators. This is especially true where the Government has acquired marginal piers either individually or in groups. Terminal properties which incorporate both waterside facilities and adjacent storage warehouses will not be released so readily, and federally owned facilities such as the well-coordinated Army bases, and prior to the war leased for commercial uses, will be the last to be mustered out. In fact, some of us feel that defense needs for these terminals will remain long after the war is over.

An inventory of these marine terminals shows that a substantial part—and what is more important, some of our most efficient harbor units—will not be standing by to resume vital international trade functions immediately following termination of hostilities. These facilities include 30 or more piers and wharves, 80 to 100 berthing spaces, and nearly 20,000,000 square feet of shedded and warehouse space.

So we have the anomaly of (1) a vast new merchant fleet, and (2) an anticipated increase in foreign trade over any previous period, while at the same time a substantial reduction of avialable port facilities so essential to both. Despite this possible handicap, foreign trade will continue for our products will be in demand not only in the home market but also abroad. While basic commodity prices often determine buying habits, transportation and handling charges may appear unimportant in the early periods of post-war rehabilitation. However, lets not deceive ourselves, unless these service costs are held in check our shipping interests and our industrial plants will find foreign buyers turning to other sources of supply the moment new marts are opened. In short, it seems clear that our post-war foreign trade must be resumed under conditions which indicate that our port facilities will not only be limited but outmoded as well.

That we face a serious problem is conceded by eminent shipping and port authorities including Walter P. Hedden, director of port development of the New York Port Authority. Mr. Hedden, who is also president of the American Association of Port Authorities, recently reminded the Post-War Reconstruction Institute at New York University that "Transportation is as good as its terminals" and that "Port facilities for handling ocean freight and passengers include not only the steamship piers themselves but supporting warehouses, channels, railroad switching, tracks, and classification yards * * * and all sorts of handling equipment."

Mr. Hedden pointed out that old-type piers, well known to all of us on many water fronts, were not adaptable to the use of modern cargo-handling equipment. Among other suggestions he indicated that programs of modernization, redesign, and enlargement of piers will become necessary to meet changing conditions. Although Mr. Hedden was referring specifically to the port of New York, his description fits many of our other harbors.

It seems to me that our future foreign trade—and our merchant marine too—will depend on the creation of modern port terminals rather than on modernization of existing piers. Rehabilitation of existing structures or even the erection of new piers offers little in the way of a solution of the problem of holding commodity handling costs at levels which will assure the free flow of commerce.

While my primary interest concerns our foreign commerce of the future, the needs of post-war shipping are just as important. Our merchant marine of the future will have a sea speed of at least 50 and possibly 100 percent greater than our pre-war fleet. Much of this advantage of speed will be lost if merchant ships dissipate valuable time in port and terminal operations. Because of greater investment in propelling equipment, vessel port costs are relatively higher as the indicated speed is increased. While ships in all trades must of necessity spend idle time in port, this is particularly true in the nearby trades where vessels normally complete more voyages during a specific period.

Shipping men express concern that piers, built 20, 30, or 50 years ago are capable of taking care of the modern cargo ship which will constitute our post-war merchant marine. Increased size of vessels and improvements in handling gear prompts the question of the ability of these pier structures to provide adequate transit sheds to temporarily hold and sort cargo. These same officials point out that the hatch openings on the modern ship are much larger than on earlier vessels.

A spokesman of the Maritime Commission pointed out to the American Association of Port Authorities last October that the typical post-war cargo ship will have seven or eight sets of cargo gear as against five in the vessels of 1920 design, and that the amount of freight which can be discharged in a working day of 8 hours is 60 percent greater. He recommended wider and longer cargo piers, pointing also to the increasing quantity of freight delivered to shipside in large tractor-trailer highway units, which have difficulty in maneuvering on the old type piers.

This same official stated that port time is a necessary evil and it must be minimized. Up to 40 or 50 percent of a ship's active life is spent in port and this must be reduced. This can only be accomplished by the availability of the most modern of dock plants.

Current press articles on post-war plans of some of our ports indicate that substantial funds will be expended for future repairs and extensions. An official of one of our prominent Pacific-coast ports recently reported that between six and ten million dollars will be required for its post-war port program. Even when measured by present-day high construction costs, this sum would represent a substantial part of the expense of erecting a modern port terminal with all essential facilities, including shipside storage warehouses.

Officials of a number of Atlantic ports are at present surveying their respective harbor facilities to determine additions which might be needed to meet changed traffic conditions after the war. In several instances questionnaires have been sent to shippers and steamship lines to elicit their views on the types of commodities, shipping services, and port facilities necessary to handle future trade. These officials know that the economic fabric of many nations will be altered as a result of this global war, and some countries which heretofore were substantial importers of specific commodities may later produce substantial quantities of the same commodities for export.

Let me give you an illustration: Prior to the war, we imported from the Orient 500,000 long tons of rubber or enough to fill 100 ships of 5,000 tons capacity. Since Pearl Harbor our imports including those from Latin-America, have been negligible when compared to our needs. In the meantime we have developed a synthetic rubber industry capable of meeting not only our war requirements but essential civilian needs as well. Should this synthetic-rubber industry be continued after the war (determination of policy will be up to the Congress) some of our ports specializing in this trade might be forced to find other use for facilities provided for handling this commodity. On the other hand, many new articles can and will be developed from synthetic rubber and plastics. These new items will offer an immeasurable export tonnage for which our ports must be prepared to handle.

Congress on several occasions has recognized the importance of efficient harbor terminals as an aid to shipping and foreign trade. A definite policy with respect to water terminals was declared in the Rivers and Harbors Act of March 2, 1919, in the following language:

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress that water terminals are essential at all cities and towns located upon harbors or navigable waterways, and that at least one public terminal should exist, constructed, owned, and regulated by the municipality or other public agency of the State and open to the use of all on equal terms."

So concerned was the Congress to insure the construction of shipside facilities that it vested the Secretary of War with full discretion to withhold funds appropriated by the act for harbor projects if in his opinion no water terminals existed or were definitely planned adequate for traffic needs.

FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES

In 1934 Congress took another forward step to encourage construction of efficient ocean terminals at our ports when it enacted the foreign-trade zones law, designed to encourage and promote our foreign commerce. The act sets out the essential requisites for a modern ocean freight terminal, including shipside warehouses and connections with adequate inland transportation facilities. In return for providing these facilities and operating them as a public utility, the operator of the zone, which may be either a public or private corporation, is granted special privileges for handling foreign merchandise not intended or not ready to enter customs territory.

The following list sets out many of the advantages and economies which the foreign-trade zone offers to importers:

1. There is no expense for bonds or customs inspectors when imports are stored or manipulated, whether dutiable or nondutiable.

2. Buyers may examine and samples of merchandise may be withdrawn at any time.

3. Imports may remain in storage with no time limit.

4. Substandard foreign products are reconditioned before customs appraisal and liquidation. Goods not meeting standards of Government inspection agencies may be destroyed or reexported.

5. Ships, lighters, railroads, motortrucks, or parcel post make direct delivery to or from zone, insuring efficient and frequent carrier service.

6. Foreign products may be held on consignment for spot delivery without being subject to customs regulations.

7. Domestic products may be assembled, repacked, or combined with foreign products for exports. Draw-back formalities are unnecessary.

8. Imports arriving improperly marked are remarked to meet customs requirements, and heavy penalties are thus avoided.

9. Imports under "quota" restrictions may be received in any quantity in excess of quota and held without customs liquidation awaiting the next quota period, thereby enabling owners to obtain loans on warehouse receipts.

10. Alcoholic beverages and other liquids imported in bulk may be bottled, labeled, and packed prior to customs entry and without being subject to State or Federal licensing agencies.

11. Inland importers may arrange to examine foreign merchandise here and save costly transportation expense to interior points on defective merchandise that would be later returned. Examination prior to customs entry precludes the possibility of payment of duties on damaged or unsalable merchandise.

12. Importers may erect their own structures within the zone to perform manipulating operations adapted to their needs.

When I last reported to this convention at San Diego in 1942, I indicated that the New York Foreign Trade Zone was the only such facility operating under the Celler Act. Since then no new zones have been established, although the ports of New Orleans, Houston, and San Francisco have applications pending with the Board for the establishment of foreign-trade zones in their respective ports as soon as war conditions permit.

Two years ago I also reported that a substantial part of the area of the New York foreign-trade zone had been acquired for war purposes. In 1943 war demands again forced the New York foreign-trade zone to release one of the spacious piers which it occupied temporarily on North River and to move to more restricted quarters. Despite these two wound stripes, the New York foreign-trade zone continues to do a substantial business. While many commodities formerly handled through the zone have been withdrawn from international trade, other products from other world areas have replaced them. One interesting item which utilizes considerable covered storage and manipulating space, and, believe it or not, outside storage areas as well, is Latin-American liquor. Scarcity of alcoholic beverages in this country has opened up a lucrative market for our pan-American neighbors. So essential is the foreign-trade zone for the handling of foreign spirits that importers who are unable to secure covered storage gladly pay identical rates for all-weather open storage to secure foreign-trade zone privileges.

In concluding, may I remind you that our ports are vestibules to world trade. The traffic which flows through them directly affects the economy of every part of the Nation. It is your responsibility to see that these harbors are kept open and that they are provided with every essential facility which will expedite commerce and promote our merchant marine. Foreign-trade zones, if established in our gateway ports, will provide a type of integrated terminal service which will not only attract new traffic to the port itself but will also tend to increase commerce and coastal shipping in adjacent ports.

Post-War Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, this morning the colorful mayor of the city of New York, Mr. LaGuardia, appeared before our committee and gave some most interesting testimony concerning the disposal of surplus war commodities. I find that on the 13th of August the mayor made a broadcast to the people of New York concerning post-war problems. As usual, Mayor LaGuardia discusses this most important subject with understanding and patriotism. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of his address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, yesterday I stated to the Senate that the colorful mayor of New York City, Mr. LaGuardia, had appeared in the morning before the committee formerly headed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and now headed by the Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD]. Mr. LaGuardia gave some very interesting testimony before the committee on the very subject which is now under discussion; namely, the disposal of surplus war commodities.

On yesterday I asked unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of a radio address made by the mayor of New York City on the 13th of August concerning the problems to which reference has been made. This morning I have been informed that the matter which I requested to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD exceeds two pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and no estimate of the cost having at that time been given—the estimate is that it will cover approximately three pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at a cost of $156—it is now necessary, in order that the address may be printed in the Appendix, that I renew the request which I made on yesterday. Therefore, in accordance with the rule I ask unanimous consent that the radio address made by Mayor LaGuardia on August 13, 1944, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POST-WAR PROBLEMS

Patience and fortitude.

I want to talk today about our post-war problems. As of today, we are not prepared for peace. It took a long time to prepare for war. It will take a long time to prepare for peace. To date, precious time has been wasted. There should not be another minute lost. Congress will have to speed up. We all want the war to end at the earliest possible moment. We are all hopeful that it will end in Europe before long. Yet we are not ready to meet the situation at home when it does. Nothing short of a miracle will save us from a great deal of trouble and anxiety. It is just taking too long to get the post-war program settled and the necessary legislation enacted in order to prepare and be ready. Failure to be ready will be extremely costly, perhaps 10 times more than a constructive program, besides the trouble, the hardship, the suffering, and the anguish that will be caused. Relief is always costly and does not settle anything.

Those of us who were close to the unemployment situation know what relief costs, and we know that it is not a final solution. We must provide work and opportunity and security. Relief, idleness, and sympathy will not do.

Let us look at the situation. Over 10,000,000 men and women are now in the armed forces; about 30,000,000 men and women are now employed in war industries, including transportation, agriculture, and mining; 75 to 80 percent of our factories, shops, plants, and yards are now engaged solely in war production. The problem then is to get the demobilized veterans into jobs, to keep war industry workers in employment, and to transform war plants back to peacetime production. In addition, we must keep agriculture going to its maximum production. We know that all 10,000,000 men in the armed forces will not be discharged at one time. The first impact, though, will be felt for several months after demobilization starts. We must be prepared to give these men jobs, to keep them in jobs, and to absorb veterans in gainful employment after they are discharged.

Many mistakes have been made here at home. Mistakes are bound to happen in a great emergency and in such a gigantic task. Many of the mistakes were pardonable because of inexperience. Some of the mistakes were unpardonable because of past experience.

To meet this gigantic problem, everyone must do his share. The responsibility may be divided into four parts:

1. The Government.
2. Industry and commerce.
3. Agriculture.
4. Wage earners.

What should each do?

THE GOVERNMENT

1. The Government: The House of Representatives should proceed without delay to enact into legislation the remaining part of the Baruch recommendations not yet written into law or contained in the George bill. Congress should perfect the contract termination law and proceed at once to provide for aid and assistance in converting industry back to peacetime production.

It should, insofar as is possible and practical, define its taxing policy for 1945–46. This, of course, is always subject to the act of a subsequent Congress. However, a declaration of a tax policy, while not binding on a subsequent Congress, would be reassuring to industry and commerce and at the same time would have great force and would be considered with great respect by the new Congress.

Congress should approve a Federal-State-municipal public-works program, with immediate appropriations made available to Federal, State, and local governments for the preparation of engineering and architectural plans and specifications, and definite commitments as to the amounts of grants to State and local subdivisions of government. Congress should pass the Federal highway bill with authorization for increased appropriation. It does not provide enough as it now stands.

A careful study of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 should be made to obtain timely, perfecting, and clarifying amendments if they should be deemed necessary. Nothing should be left in doubt. The rehabilitation and educational features of this law are excellent. Here the mistakes and experience of the last world war have been helpful.

The reemployment provisions, of course, are necessary, but providing an employment agency does not create jobs by and of itself. In this instance, as in every other, it will be seen that a comprehensive plan is absolutely necessary. The Veterans' Reemployment Agency will be of great value if industry and commerce are able to give jobs. It will be useless if there are no jobs.

Provision should be made in the guaranty of veterans' loans to permit the pooling of individual loans among veterans who desire to join in an approved business venture.

The Government should now provide a guaranty of loan to industry and business for the purpose of deferred maintenance, expansion, replacement of equipment and machinery of any company or individual who has been or was solvently engaged in industry or business prior to or during the war.

Provisions for displaced war workers must also be made. We must be realistic. We cannot talk about the consumption of consumers goods and purchasing power and remain silent as to what is to happen to millions of war workers who will necessarily lose their jobs. The provisions in the Kilgore bill were not at all excessive or exaggerated. A large number of workers unemployed, with barely a subsistence allowance, will only prolong the period of resumption of peacetime production.

As the George bill goes from the Senate to the House, careful consideration should be given by the members to many excellent provisions in the Kilgore bill. Out of it all should come a well-balanced, easily administered, effective plan for part of our post-war problems. Both bills provide too much machinery for administration. Any attempt to mix, to mingle, or to merge any administrative duty, direct or indirect, with the legislative branch of the Government would only create a governmental melange, not in keeping with our philosophy of government, and will cause trouble. It has never and will never work. When congressional committees want information they have the power to get it. For a congressional committee to sit with an advisory committee in the administration of any law is not only impracticable but dangerous. The administration of all provisions of law, I repeat again, should be streamlined and decision and responsibility definitely fixed in as few individuals as is possible. Both bills contain the weakness of divided authority, too many committees, very unwieldy and cumbersome administrative machinery.

A great deal of our trouble has been caused by disparity of labor conditions in various States. This condition is now sought to be perpetuated in the George bill. Every post-war problem is a national problem. The displacement of war workers and the rehabilitation of industry is not a State problem but a national problem. Unemployment allowance should be uniform. True, there might be a slight differential in the cost of living in the various sections of the country. In the main though it necessarily must be uniform in amount, in administration, and in terms and conditions. To separate this into 48 administrations is not only costly but unscientific. It may create patronage and pap but it will not be as efficient as a national system. Imagine 10,000,000 workers shopping around for the States having the highest unemployment insurance. Imagine an administration allowing travel expense without a complete coordinated national plan of knowing just how, where, and why money is spent for travel and expense of families of war workers. Some may have a right to return home, others may want to go where work is available, but all of this has to be coordinated and brought under the supervision and control of one administration. Provision for 48 State administrations of unemployment insurance may be good politics. It is bad, very bad socially and economically.

The delay in obtaining necessary post-war legislation, the duplication and legislative confusion created by two bills on the same subject in the Senate, each reported out by committee, the need of one comprehensive plan, all indicate the necessity of an over-all study and consideration of these problems by Congress. To those not familiar with parliamentary procedure, the difficulty may not be apparent. Under the present rules, with different committees considering the various parts of the entire program, delay, duplication, omission are all bound to happen. The House of Representatives has seen this in the appointment of a Special Post-war Study Committee. The weakness of this committee, though, is that it has not been given the necessary power to report definite legislation. It can only make recommendations. That means delay, more hearings, more study, more investigations, more reports. It would be very helpful if each House of Congress appointed its own special legislative committee on post-war problems. This committee should consist of the chairman, ranking majority and minority members of the Ways and Means, Appropriations, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Agriculture, Labor, and, if necessary, Army and Navy Committees, with full power to prepare and report legislation to their respective bodies. This will bring under one consideration, at one time, the entire picture and will enable proper approach and treatment of the various problems, the necessary tying in of all post-war activities, coordination and cooperation, and eliminate a great deal of bureaucracy and personnel.

The Government in Washington must be streamlined. The greater number of war agencies should be terminated. All duplication and overlapping must be eliminated. Each department of Government should absorb the functions of the various agencies which pertain to its particular field. This subject alone could be discussed at length. I may do so at another time.

It is absolutely necessary that insofar as is prudently possible, without impairing the post-war program, which will be very costly, the Government should estimate its post-war expenses for a period of 5 years. In order to avoid any misunderstanding, disappointment or irritation, a definite policy on lend-lease must be proclaimed now before it is too late. We may have to give some aid to the unhappy invaded countries. It should be restricted to such countries. Lend-lease, though restricted, after the termination of hostilities, must be limited to goods and commodities. All of the countries will need building materials, machinery, clothes, food, and medical supplies. This all can be supplied under the provisions of lend-lease with easy terms of payment or exchange later in commodities. There should be no cash loans except for a critical or emergency situation. I am talking about Government money. Reestablished governments or new governments, of course, would be permitted to float bond issues on such terms as they are able to negotiate.

A system of universal military training will have to be established for all boys between the ages of 18 and 21, giving choice to the individual as to when he will serve within that age period, or compulsory at 21. Suitable arrangements, of course, can and must be made for college students without interruption of their college or post-graduate courses. This is very easy to accomplish. Alongside of this, States must strengthen their compulsory educational laws in order to take from the competitive labor market children of tender years and immature youth.

On the other end of the pool, a more uniform system of old-age pensions should be established throughout the country. No old age pensions should be allowed where the beneficiary continues employment in any competitive field. Unemployment insurance should be more uniform throughout the country. This, of course, is only palliative and not a cure. Let us give more thought as to how to keep people at work rather than how to keep them out of work. Labor wants work with decent pay, not idleness with relief. We must establish security of employment to such an extent that the cost of unemployment insurance would be greatly reduced and the benefits to seasonal workers greatly increased.

We have learned that a great deal of destitution, which is very costly to local and State governments, comes from the disability of the head of the family to work owing to illness. At this date little need be said as to the need of a health insurance system throughout the country. It is past the study stage. Sufficient information, knowledge and even experience, have been obtained to put such a plan into operation.

We have heard too much of surpluses. Paradoxically, it has caused hunger in our country. It is almost unbelievable that when we had the greatest unemployment, we had the greatest food surplus. The same is true as between nations. Some countries had surpluses and did not know what to do with them, other countries were in want. That is one of the main causes of war. It must be removed. Just talking about it will not solve the problem. We must act and we must be prepared to go into operation to care for surplus the moment the war ends. Oh, for the first few months there will be such need of food and material in Europe, Africa, and Asia that the laissez-faire, the happy-go-lucky, the unthinking, the day-by-day businessman, the pawn-banker, will say—"Oh, everything is fine now, why worry?" I tell you that there is cause to worry. No people within a country from now on will go hungry and no country in the world will go hungry. Our Government should provide at once a surplus commodity export corporation operating on a hemispheric basis in concert with like organizations of Central and South America. A like government corporation should be established for the European-African territory, and the third for the Pacific-Asiatic area. Heretofore we have talked about surpluses but we do not really know if we ever had a real surplus of anything. A surplus is that amount of any given commodity over and above the needs of all the people. What we have called surplus was the amount over and above the purchasing power of the people. Do I make myself clear? As an illustration: We had great trouble in the past with surpluses of dairy products, milk, butter and cheese. I say we have never had a real surplus of dairy products in this country. If every infant and child in the United States had sufficient and the proper quantity of milk every day, if every family had sufficient and the proper quantity of butter every day, ignoring cheese entirely, we would not have had a surplus of dairy products. Therefore, to balance the world's surpluses, it is necessary that a definite formula be established.

Roughly stated, it means that the daily needs of the people of the entire country should be taken as the normal required amount of any commodity. The amount over that requirement is then declared a surplus. That surplus then is taken with the surplus of the same commodity of other countries in the hemisphere, and placed in the pool. It is disposed of by sale or exchange to countries needing that particular commodity. The European or Asiatic countries do the same, and provide for sale or exchanges between the three world surplus commodity corporations. When the commodity arrives in the country requiring it, it is then distributed through the regular channels of trade in accordance with the economy of that particular country. It is not difficult. We have the food; we have the raw materials; we have the demand; and soon it will be learned that a perfect balance can be maintained. Of course, this would eliminate speculation. This would eliminate monopoly. This would prevent excess profits and excess suffering. By the establishment of the hemispheric surplus pool, a market is assured to the farmers of each nation for all that they produce. No more economy of want, no more curtailing production, but encouraging production. There is no originality in this idea. It has been talked about and studied for years. Selfish interests have always been able to oppose it in this and other countries.

Now let us consider another kind of surplus, temporary but quite important—that is surplus war supplies. Let us get right to the point. Congress is giving a great deal of attention to legislation regulating sale of surplus war supplies. The amount of surplus supplies will not only be gigantic, but fantastic. Now right here let us remember that the Army and the Navy should be praised and not criticized for having such enormous amounts of every kind of supplies on hand. It is their job to fight and win the war. They dare not take any risk as to when and how the war will end. It is their responsibility to have ammunition and weapons and food and materials and supplies of every kind everywhere—when and where it may be needed—in sufficient quantities. Therefore, the American people should know that the enormous supplies which we will find after the war is the result of a fine and thorough job on the part of the Army and the Navy.

More thought and study has been given to the disposal of war-surplus supplies now than had been given before the end of the last war. A superagency of government has been established with a splendid personnel, which is intended to cover all the procurement agencies of the Government that will have surplus supplies on hand. Every detail has been worked out as to cataloging, pricing, advertising, financing, and, as I stated, Congress is now considering definite legislation.

I make this prediction—that if the selling agency is perfect, that if the laws enacted by Congress provide for the efficient and speedy disposition by sale of all war-surplus material, that within 90 days after the same will go into operation, the Congress will hastily repeal its own legislation and stop the sale of 99 percent of the surplus supplies. Sounds strange, doesn't it? Well, it is a fact. Just look. Are we not bending every effort to get industry back to peacetime production? Do we not want to employ every man that it is absolutely possible? Well, then, if we want to do that, do you not see how the sale of the surplus supplies through the regular channels of trade will retard peacetime production? Yes; there are some articles on the list which will be helpful in restoring peacetime production; tools and dies, and machinery may be needed at once, but no machine should be sold unless it is needed to restore peacetime production and not if another machine could be made in the time that it is required. Some raw material, such as copper and lumber, and other materials, should be sold, but only so much as will get peacetime production going up to the time that same material can be produced. If all the reserve aluminum on hand were sold as surplus supplies now, it would close down the production of aluminum for a long time. That in turn will cause the unemployment of thousands of workers. Take, for instance, planes and motors for airplanes. Why there will be an enormous quantity on hand. If all of the surplus were to be sold here and abroad, I predict that there would not be an airplane motor constructed in our country in 5 years. That would cause unemployment to hundreds of thousands of workers. Airplanes that may be used for commercial purposes should be loaned to commercial air lines as replacements for present worn equipment on condition that an order for a new plane with new motors is placed for each plane and motor loaned which will be returned on delivery of the new plane and new motor. The same is true in trucks and cars, in paint, and bolts and nuts, and in the thousands and tens of thousands of different articles and goods that the Government will have on hand.

The Government, of course, should use materials and goods for its own establishments. It should give to state and municipal government replacements of materials and supplies that it may need, but only on condition that the State or municipality authorize the appropriation for the succeeding year of its normal requirements for such material and supplies. There is a great need now of blankets and sheets and medicial supplies in our hospitals. But how about the mills, how about raw wool and cotton? If all the shoes and clothes that the Government will have on hand are to be sold through regular channels of trade, it sure will retard resumption of leather and textile production in this and other countries.

Someone will ask, "Well, isn't it wasteful not to sell all of those surplus supplies?" The answer is "Yes," of course it is wasteful. War is wasteful and destructive and this enormous amount of surplus supply is just part of the waste and destruction of war. So let us not fool ourselves. I have told committees of Congress just what I am telling you now. We must be realistic and practical. It is less costly to pay wages to produce new goods than pay insurance for unemployment.

INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE

2. Industry and commerce: Everybody is talking about free enterprise today. When I say everybody, it seems from the member of a local of organized labor, to the President of the United States. It seems to be the will of the majority of the American people. That being so, then we must face this big problem honestly, frankly and realistically. Free enterprise means business for profit. If that is the will of the people, then business and industry must be given a chance to operate. Given good wages and wholesome working conditions, an opportunity of profit commensurate with the capital and risk involved must be made possible. Talking about profits, taxes tantamount to almost complete requisition and free enterprise at one and the same time, simply does not mix. Hog-tying legislation likewise interferes with free enterprise and the profit system and the creation of permanent employment under this system. Now mark you, I am not giving my views. I am stating what must be realistically faced if those who talk about free enterprise want to bring it about successfully. In the modern, scientific, industrial age in which we are living, we must not be frightened at big undertakings. Many of the consumers' goods and desirable goods cannot be produced today unless they are produced in maximum quantities and the manufacturer is permitted to avail himself of every possible economy in the purchase and processing of raw materials, the manufacture and distribution of the ultimate goods.

Industry and business, as I said before, has a responsibility. Granted that it should know exactly how it stands in legislation and insofar as is possible taxation, it must reconcile itself to fair and reasonable profits, to new conditions pertaining to labor, to close cooperation with its employees, and the recognition that the employees come to have a vested interest in something that they have contributed in building and creating. The time may not be distant that a certain percentage of profits beyond a fair and reasonable return may be shared by management and labor. Security of employment is necessary and in the long run economical to the employer himself. Therefore, production should be systematized in such way as to avoid seasonal work. There is no reason why the automobile or the petticoat manufacturer should produce only in a certain season of the year. Given its model or style, production may well be spread during the 12 months of the year.

Business and industry should now be ready with its post-war plans for deferred maintenance, expansion, replacements, and enlargement or new enterprise. There is plenty of money available, and, as I stated, the Government may provide some sort of partial loan guaranty. There is nothing more discouraging, and I am sorry to say I have heard many important, yes, even big bankers and businessmen, tell me, "Oh, wait, let's win the war first." This type of mind will not fit in the post-war period. This is the pawnbrokers' and pushcart peddlers' mentality. All the shenanigans and questionable promotional schemes which flourished in the early days of railroads and right down into the late twenties must be forgotten. If business or industry sells bonds, the investors must know that they are absolutely good with sufficient property back of them. In exchange, the investor takes a lower rate of interest. Watered stock and overcapitalization must likewise be avoided; the stockholder must be assured that he is in a business and not a lottery. More labor and owner representation will have to be given on the directory boards. Existing restraint of trade and antitrust laws must be brought up to date to meet the technology of mass production, changed labor conditions, and magnitude of modern industry. The Department of Commerce must be vested with the authority and power to protect honest business and industry. An opportunity should be given to business and industry to apply for approval of contracts, agreements, or any undertaking before same is put into operation, in order to ascertain if it conflicts with any existing restraining or trust law. When industry and business want to do the right thing, they should not be placed in jeopardy or tempted to violate the law when it is not their intention to do so.

I want to state again now, that I am simply stating what should be done if a system of free enterprise is to be the policy of our Nation.

AGRICULTURE

3. Agriculture: With the exception of perhaps the last few years in this country, agriculture has never had a chance in this or any other country of the world. For centuries, countries of the older world thrived on the exploitation of the peasants. In this country, industry profited, in the past, by misery of the farmers. That day should be gone and gone forever. Unless we are very careful, we may again depress agriculture to the depths of bankruptcy and poverty as was done after the last World War in this country. Wonder how many realize that the job of a shirtmaker in a shop in New York, or a mechanic in a plant in Detroit may depend upon the wheat crop in the Argentine or in Australia, to say nothing of the economic condition of the farmers of this country.

Our agriculture economy must be based on a policy of plenty. Everything that the soil can produce must be encouraged. Parity, not parity-plus, but real parity prices must be assured to the farmer, and what is more, that he will find a market for his crops. This is only possible with the world surplus pool I talked about a moment ago. The American farmer is entitled to fair and just compensation for his labor, the labor of his family, and for fair, just and reasonable returns for his investment. That is all he wants, that is all he ever asked. If he gets that, he is prosperous. If the American farmer is prosperous, he buys clothes and furniture and household goods, machinery and all sorts of things that we make in the city. That means employment in the cities—wages—and in turn a good market for his products. Now when you put this circle in reverse, it is just too bad. The farmer is broke and he cannot buy, and because he cannot buy, the fellow in the city does not have a job and he cannot buy sufficient food. It is just as easy to keep the gear forward as to let it slip into reverse.

If the nations of the world are really desirous of maintaining peace, nothing is more important than that all of the people of the world should have enough to eat. God Almighty has placed sufficient food on earth for all the people. It has not all been equally distributed; but the balance is there. While one country may produce one crop in surplus quantities, it does not have another commodity it needs and which another country produces. To think of people starving with a surplus of food of any kind is not only stupid, but sinful.

LABOR

4. Labor: We now come to the wage earners. Labor has an opportunity to make a great contribution to our post-war adjustment. It has the greatest opportunity in the entire history of industry. Labor has gained a position, its rights have been recognized. This brings with it responsibility. Granted a policy of a decent living wage, security and provision against unemployment, it necessarily follows that labor must produce sufficient to create such wages and working conditions. Wages must necessarily be maintained by production. Slow-down, limited production, idle stand-bys, are costly to labor and to industry.

Speaking very frankly, in the period of adjustment following the war, with the huge number of discharged war workers and demobilized soldiers, full and complete cooperation will be necessary. Unless ample, equitable distribution of work is provided between the discharged war workers and the demobilized veterans, there is great danger of irritation, friction, and serious trouble between these 2 groups. There are some 30,000,000 men and women, as I said before, now employed in war industries. Let us assume that there will be about 10,000,000 who will not be required in war industry and 10,000,000 who eventually will be demobilized from the armed forces. Here we have a pool of 20,000,000 men and women for whom work must be provided. As I see it, in all governmental post-war public improvement, the employment should be distributed on a 50–50 basis between demobilized veterans and unemployed war workers. The same ratio of one-half veterans and one-half war workers should be followed as closely as conditions will permit in all post-war new industry, and in continuing industry and business insofar as is possible. Women who have homes and are not self-supporting, as well as overtime and dual employment will all have to give way in order to provide a greater spread of employment. Organized labor should be the one to present this plan and to see it enforced. That in and of itself is sufficient to avoid the danger of friction between veterans and organized labor.

In order to maintain the purchasing power necessary to provide permanent employment, it is essential that production increase. I repeat, the whole situation depends upon the wage earner producing. Everything should be based on that. The greater the production, the greater the stability of employment. The greater the production, the better the wages.

I have felt for a long time that a fixed, fair, and just annual pay with steady work is better than a fictitious hourly rate with little or no work. I have always felt that full-time jobs for all is better than jobs for some with overtime. I am quite aware that the old-line labor leader disagrees with that. However, this is something that all trades should consider. An annual pay with steady work will bring more return to the individual and his family than an hourly rate, uncertain, indefinite, and seasonal. I have heard from both employers and union leaders that it is impossible to fix an annual pay for seasonal work. That is not so. It is quite possible to provide greater income to the worker on an annual basis and yet reduce the cost of production to the employer. This is something which should receive the prompt attention of labor.

Labor should see to it that the standards of wages are more uniform throughout the country. The wage-and-hour law has helped considerably. That is not enough. Working conditions, rules imposed by labor, if good in one section of the country should be good in all sections of the country. Often it is not wages, but working conditions that drive an industry out of one section into another section of the country. That is not good for industry and in the long run it is not good for labor. Fair employers who want to do the right thing for labor, who pay good wages, who recognize the right of labor, should be protected by labor itself against unfair competition caused by inferior working conditions in other parts of the country.

Jurisdictional strikes must be avoided. Surely labor can provide the genius and the good will to prevent a stoppage of work often involving hundreds of innocent workers on a job because of some jurisdictional dispute. The employer or the contractor is helpless. Government mediation or conciliation agencies are helpless.

A great deal of thought should be given to this. The art of construction, improvement in machinery, plastics, and new materials will come into use rapidly after the war. These are often the causes of jurisdictional disputes as to who will do the job. This is labor's problem. The employer, the contractor, is not concerned. The cost is the same to him. Therefore it is labor's responsibility to provide the machinery for the adjustments of such disputes within its own rank without the interruption, the delay, or losses to the contractor or employer and to labor itself. I know that people unfamiliar with labor conditions will believe that a suggestion of this kind is wholly unnecessary, but those who have experience know how costly a jurisdictional strike is to both labor and employer. Assurance of the elimination of this evil should be complete.

Labor organizations have sought honorably to maintain the terms and conditions of agreements. Recently a bad practice has been creeping in of mass "sickness" and stoppage of work, which, of course, is nothing but an unlawful strike. In such instances the labor organization concerned should assume the responsibility of filling the vacant ranks in order to continue service and production in accordance with the terms of the agreement that labor itself has signed and pledged to maintain.

Labor can be most helpful in maintaining standards of living as well as in the social well-being of the people of this country. It can also serve very helpfully in establishing relations with labor of other countries in aiding to establish proper standards of living, and the end of systems of starvation wages detrimental to countries where decent standards exist. Labor must also police its own ranks and drive from within its midst crooked leaders and anyone who would racketeer or who would betray the cause of labor. And, finally, labor must not only open its doors but its books to the returning veterans without excessive initiation or admission dues. In fact, it would be smart to give membership to men and women in labor organizations on the presentation of an honorable discharge. We must not forget thousands of boys have been instructed and trained in skilled trades. The Seabees of the Navy, the Engineer Corps of the Army, the Signal Corps, the Air Corps, yes, and tanks, and all the mechanized branches of the armed forces, have instructed and trained thousands and thousands in skilled trades.

These boys must have a chance to work. These boys are entitled to a job. I strongly advise labor to take these veterans into their organizations and to adopt the system of sharing the work—one worker and one veteran for every two new jobs available.

In conclusion, I say that I know a great deal of all this sounds visionary, but I can assure you it is not only necessary but practical. To slip up on any one of the various factors necessary for a post-war prosperous, peaceful world is courting disaster. I hate to say this, but unless we are sure that the economy of our own country will be well-balanced, that there will be work for all and social security, we are in for very serious trouble. Is it not better to plan ahead and to deliberately prepare for the situation, constructively and in an orderly manner? If we fail, it will be disorderly and troublesome. It will lead to serious conditions, even more serious than we dare to contemplate. And it will be so much less costly to arrange our post-war national system intelligently than to be caught unprepared, to be met with trouble, and costly palliatives and makeshift solutions.

Will the post-war period be costly? Yes; because it is part of the war and it is just impossible to snap back into peace and normal peacetime conditions in one instant. With provisons already made by Congress or now under consideration, the fiscal year following the end of the war will require about 70 percent of the last war fiscal year. The second year perhaps 50 percent of the average yearly cost of the war. The third year 25 percent and from that point tapering off. This, of course, assumes a complete, well-coordinated post-war program.

Some will say, "But some of the suggestions will be costly." No; not at all. Social security will not be costly if our economy is based on a huge production and people are employed. There is one complaint that the plan for disposing of surplus food and other natural resources will increase the cost of living. No; not at all. Much cheaper than providing relief for the unemployed, much cheaper than subsidizing reduced production or killing of livestock. Much cheaper when it will bring into the country goods and commodities that we cannot grow or produce.

It will be pointed out that not disposing for cash surplus war materials will entail a great loss. Not at all, when you consider the loss in employment and production awaiting the consumption and use of the surplus war material. Some employers will say that the annual pay will increase the cost of production, and labor leaders will say that it is not practical and that the workers will get less. Both are wrong. It can be mathematically demonstrated that it will increase the pay of the worker, reduce the cost of production.

I feel that we are the most fortunate people in the whole world. Our task is so much easier than the post-war task of Great Britain, France, or China. We cannot even compare the ease of our post-war task with that of the invaded countries or of Germany and Japan by the time we are through with them. To start with, we have the resources. Our country has not and in all likelihood will not suffer any devastation. Would it therefore not be an unpardonable failure and a blemish on our generation if we fumble at this time? The disastrous effect, the failure of a plan to provide for a sound economic post-war society in our country, will bring havoc and ruin to us in this day and make it extremely difficult for the next and the generation after that. The problems that we must consider and solve are not political. Our problems are economic and social. We cannot delay. We must work out, not a democratic economy or a republican economy; it must not be teutonic or slavic or Latin—we must evolve a purely American economy to meet our needs, our habits, our customs, and our system of government. It will require generosity in politics, particularly in this year; it will require good will on the part of all men. It will require unselfishness to the greatest degree on the part of all the groups: Capital, labor, social, and political. It will require unselfish, patriotic teamwork. It will require courage, the like of which no statesman in the entire history of our country has been called upon to display. It can be done—it should be done. With God's help, we will do it.

Editorial Comment on Resignation of James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix two editorials and an article dealing with the subject of the resignation of Hon. James A. Farley as chairman of the Democratic committee of the State of New York.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Sun of June 9, 1944]

FARLEY'S RESIGNATION

Pressure of business is James A. Farley's announced reason for resigning as chairman of the Democratic State committee after 14 years of effective service to his party organization. Mr. Farley declined to go beyond his own formal statement, but the mere fact of his resignation is bound to stimulate speculation, first, that it is a sure sign that Mr. Roosevelt is a candidate for a fourth term; and second, that it is as sure an indication that Mr. Farley is as strongly opposed to a fourth term as he was to a third term.

In fact, some will be tempted to link Mr. Farley's resignation, effective on July 11, with the revolt of old-line Democrats in Texas and South Carolina and Mississippi. Many Democrats have discovered that their only rôle in the national convention this year will be to second a nomination already made by the radicals and left-wingers. The alliance of Democrats and new dealers that was a source of strength to the Roosevelt candidacy in 1936 and again in 1940 may be a source of weakness this year. Politeness and a sense of the past may forbid Mr. Farley to say more at this time than is covered by his formal statement that he has submitted his resignation for business reasons. He is as candid as he is polite, however, and his attendance at the Democratic National Convention as a delegate from New York will provide him with an opportunity for blunt speech.

[From the New York Telegram of June 9, 1944]

THE FARLEY RESIGNATION

A host of Democrats in this city and State, we think, will sincerely and deeply regret the resignation of James A. Farley from the State Democratic chairmanship he has held since 1930. There will be few to disagree with him when he doubts that "any man in my position has ever enjoyed the friendship of the leaders and the party workers as I have." The genial Farley personality has time and again transcended political or tactical differences. He was born for friendship.

Though Mr. Farley makes business duties and obligations his reason for resigning, it will seem to many that the Democratic leader who so vigorously fought a third term for President Roosevelt in 1940 can see scant consistent scope for his leadership in the prospect of a fourth-term campaign in 1944. His position therein would be, to say the least, both uncongenial and embarrassing.

Naturally, anti-Roosevelt Democrats whose hostility to a fourth term has already developed even to the point of urging a third party may now turn hopeful eyes toward Mr. Farley, recalling that only 4 years ago he was ready to accept a Democratic nomination for President and make his break with Mr. Roosevelt complete and final.

With fourth-term provocation, a new party is not inconceivable. Stranger things have happened. But Mr. Farley quietly announces his intention of attending the coming Democratic National Convention as a delegate, and Jim Farley is far too experienced and astute to commit himself faster than events.

Business may call him away from present party office. But we bet it won't take him permanently out of front-line politics.

THE MORALS OF JIM FARLEY

(By George E. Sokolsky)

Few men in the United States have paid as high a price for principle as Jim Farley. All the stories that small men concoct to belittle him fall by the wayside in the face of what is these days an astonishing adherence to moral principle, namely, that even in party politics conscience must be the guide. Jim Farley put himself and his party second to his country. Jim Farley loves the United States, its baseball sand lots, its clubhouse politics, its machines for the control of the votes of the people—but even more, the Constitution of the United States, which made it possible for his Irish forebears to settle here in freedom and opportunity. And feeling that way, he could not join in an act of political opportunism which he believed would let his country down.

And so Jim, a man of inherent loyalties to the essential, could not go along with a third term. To him a third term was a betrayal of the traditions of constitutional America. It renounced the principle of limited tenure in office; it encouraged the despotism of irremovable bureaucracy. It reduced the Presidency to the position of a king surrounded by mayors of the palace.

So Jim Farley broke with the man whom he had made President of the United States. Men have short memories these days and, of course, the children are not taught contemporary history. Yet the fact is that by 1930 Franklin D. Roosevelt was not an extraordinarily notable figure either in the United States or in Democratic politics. He had been rescued from what seemed an inevitable and tragic oblivion by Al Smith and John Raskob, who had made him Governor of the State of New York because Al Smith desired a worthy successor to himself—worthy from the standpoint of Democratic Party politics. He had made a fair to middling good Governor—but Jim Farley, the original inventor of the convention blitz—set out to make his friend the Democratic candidate for the Presidency. No one in those years nor in the years when Jim was chairman of the Democratic National Committee, questioned the value of his services in getting that first nomination, and if Mr. Roosevelt permits his smearing jackals to belittle Jim now, he condones something cheap and vulgar. Jim's contribution to the Roosevelt career commands a gratitude that can know no turning among decent men.

To this Irishman from Rockland County then came honors and dignities and power. Yet when he left the Postmaster-Generalship to adhere to his principle of no third term, Jim Farley was sorely in debt, as every one in New York knew, and he went to work selling Coca-Cola. Farley remained chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee, a position which became decreasingly important as Sidney Hillman and MARCANTONIO developed increasing power. In a word, even in the State committee, Jim Farley was pursued by the relentless forces of the Communist allies of the mayors of the palace in the White House. He might have returned to power did he but court their good will. That was too high a price for Jim to pay.

Some weeks ago some newspapermen devoted space to belittling the morals of Jim Farley by announcing that he was selling his soul to be mayor of New York or United States Senator from New York. Their object was to give the impression of an abject Jim Farley, crawling on his hands and knees, to beg the forgiveness of David Niles, manipulator of the President Forever Movement and Sidney Hillman, the current national boss of the New Deal operations for a fourth term.

Jim's answer is to resign his chairmanship of the New York State committee. He is now a free lance, free to devote his skill and services to his country, to fight against a fourth term unhampered by commitments and the votes of the Hillman Democrats. And the consequence of this resignation will be that no history will be able to record that at the Democratic Convention of 1944 there were no daring men, no self-respecting men, no patriots who put country above personal advantage. Jim Farley resigned to be free to pursue the truth as he sees it.

Soviet Stand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mark Foote from the Bay City (Mich.) Times of Monday, August 21, 1944:

SOVIET STAND

(By Mark Foote)

WASHINGTON.—Genesis of Governor Dewey's warning against power politics and a Big Four military alliance to control the world undoubtedly was an article in Izvestia, a magazine published in Leningrad by the union of Soviet writers. The New York Governor also is known to have been disturbed by reports of what happened at the Roosevelt-Churchill-Stalin conference at Tehran.

Since in Russia expression of thought is rigidly controlled by the Government, it was natural to surmise that this article in all likelihood reflected the Soviet's views in respect to an international security organization. This suspicion was emphasized by the fact that the article bore the signature of one N. Malinin, whose name means nothing to most Washington diplomats. It may have been a pseudonymn for some high Russian official, possibly Maxim Litvinov, former Ambassador to the United States.

Irrespective of the motivation of Governor Dewey's warning and regardless of whether or not the newspaper article was officially inspired, the two documents have served a worthy purpose. They elicited from John Foster Dulles, Governor Dewey's spokesman on foreign affairs, a declaration that international affairs should be and would be a subject of discussion during the Presidential campaign. This is in all respects desirable.

It is no secret that Woodrow Wilson's idea of open covenants, openly arrived at, has been thrown into the discard. It was disregarded at the food conferences at White Sulphur Springs, at Bretton Woods, and again at the Dumbarton Oaks Conference which opened Monday. Newspapermen were admitted to the first session, but henceforth will be barred, while American delegates were given specific instructions not to reveal anything to the press. Marine guards were posted about Dumbarton Oaks to keep the newsmen out.

Communiqués will be released at regular intervals apprising the press and the people of the country of the progress made in the negotiations. No one would contend that conferences of such far-reaching importance should be conducted in a glass house. But there should be a fair balance between Old World methods of "secret diplomacy" under which so many shady alliances and understandings have been fashioned in the past, and the sort of premature publicity which might ruin the negotiations.

Without the shadow of a doubt the Malinin article goes counter to the expressed views of both Secretary Hull and Governor Dewey in respect to the voice of the "small nations" in the organization to maintain world peace. And if it does represent the views of the Soviet, it is well to have it aired and discussed during the preliminary sessions of the conference. Such discussion may avoid misunderstandings and possible disunity and for such a doctrine becoming a part of an international agreement—to be announced full-blown in a communique a month or so hence.

Malinin says that the new organization must turn away from this principle of "false equality (of nations) which was the basis of the old League." He continues: "After all, it is only the great powers which are able to act effectively against a big aggressor. Therefore, it automatically follows that the future world agency, if it is to avoid the failure of the League, must be based upon the firm active leadership of the great powers which have demonstrated their might in the present war."

"These powers which will form the directive organ of the new organization must assume responsibility for organizing resistance to any aggression, if necessary, by their own forces alone, irrespective of the position of the remaining members. The responsibility for guarding peace must not be divided among 60 or more states." The Russian writer then says that it is important that the great powers seal their obligations by entering into treaties."

Military alliances, spheres of influence and balances of power systems are anathema to the American people, as has been emphasized by Secretary Hull, Governor Dewey, and Wendell Willkie. The time to guard against them is now.

The Workingman: Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The Workingman: Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow," written by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] and published in the June-July issue of the Democratic Digest.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WORKINGMAN: YESTERDAY, TODAY, AND TOMORROW

(By Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS of Utah)

The war and post-war problems are of such vital interest to us all that we are prone to be thoughtless of the past. That is especially true for those of us who have steady jobs, good wages, and healthful working conditions. But, after all, the present and the future can be but a promise. It is from the past that we must get our assurances and from which we must plan our accomplishments. When people are thoughtless of the past and not worried about the future, they are generally content with the present. That contentment may cause us to forget. What I shall say, therefore, is said "lest we forget."

THE WORKINGMAN IN 1933

Contentment among workers was completely lacking in 1933. There was unemployment. There was the kick-back. There were long hours and low wages. Industry, agriculture, and mining were, in the sight of the law, of purely local concern, and the Federal Government seemed to have no interest in the problems of workers in any fields excepting those of foreign and interstate commerce.

A legalistic attitude had tied our minds to such an extent that we thought it more important to have respect for a legal fiction which had no basis in fact than to provide for the general welfare of the people. Then, with a change in our national leadership, there came, in rapid succession, a change in attitudes. The kick-back was prohibited. The National Labor Relations Act, which gave workers the right to bargain collectively, and the Wage and Hour Act, which put a floor under wages and a ceiling on hours, came into existence. Social-security laws were enacted. All were sustained by the Supreme Court. The theory, therefore, that something could be done to provide better attitudes, better wages and hours, better working conditions and security for collective bargaining became a reality. Sentiment was brought to focus against company-controlled unions and civil liberties were made a fact in our national life instead of an oft-forgotten theory. The worker was "freed," if I may use that expression, by having his labor and tools recognized as capital which should be protected.

It is a far cry back to the day when the 8-hour law for miners was contested on the score that not to allow a miner to work 12 or 15 hours a day, if he chose, was destructive of his liberties. Other persons' liberties were forgotten. Freedom for one is only proper and possible in society so long as such freedom does not interfere with the freedom of others. It is now recognized by the State and by society that a tired worker is a hazard to his fellow workers. Society believes, too, that it is well to measure labor by its results, production, and accomplishments.

LABOR AS A WAR ASSET

It is in the light of those accomplishments that I want to measure labor as an asset to our great country in this time of stress. Never has a country produced as America has done in getting ready for and in fighting this war. Never has a country responded as the 130,000,000 Americans have responded to a unified endeavor to destroy the wrongdoers among nations and the aggressive leaders in those nations. No one can, therefore, doubt the ultimate outcome of this great war.

When President Roosevelt called the industry-labor conference following Pearl Harbor and my motion in the conference that there should be no strikes or lockouts and that all disputes should be settled by peaceful means became the order of the day, a new type of unity came into our land—a unity which can only be recognized by a deep student of history who knows its great lack in times before the present, even during war times.

I can hear someone say, "But the promise not to strike has not prevented strikes." Of course it hasn't. There have been "quickies," there have been the equivalents of the sitdowns, and there have been some major strikes. Human nature, our economic life, the complexities of industrial labor relations and advantage taking among leaders can never be overcome by a promise. But certain ideals were set, and those ideals have been respected by the large majority of the workers.

The strikes that have occurred have made headlines, and some people in this country have tried to make political capital out of them.

Everyone agrees there should be no strikes in wartime. But when we consider strikes, let us consider them against the whole picture of labor's record in wartime. When we do that, we find that man-hours lost on account of strikes, taken all together, are a very small fraction of the total man-hours worked in war industries. We find that less than one-fourth of 1 percent of the manpower actually used in war production has been lost by strikes in this war. And at the same time we find that labor has increased its productive hours by more than 75 percent.

Few people realize how well the machinery for settling wartime labor disputes without strikes or lockouts has been working. The National War Labor Board, created by the President after the Pearl Harbor Industry-Labor Conference, and entrusted by Congress in the War Labor Disputes Act with the administration of the program for settling disagreements between labor and management, has quietly settled more than 6,700 dispute cases since it was established.

But these are not figures for headlines.

I think it can be said—and said unhesitatingly—that labor has made a tremendous contribution to the success of this war. To the workingman—together with the men of industry and of government—goes the credit for the magnificent number of planes and tanks and guns that are flowing out to all battlefronts to the soldiers of all of our allies as well as our own.

I think it can be said, too, that the Roosevelt administration helped unite the worker with his employer in this tremendously great war effort, and thus helped to make the production record possible.

LABOR'S RIGHTS ARE SECURE

Labor's problems no longer concern the gaining of certain rights. Those rights are with us in law, and now, thank goodness, in custom. It was interesting to note how a great gathering like the International Labor Conference at Philadelphia said so little about the problems of collective bargaining, and wages and hours, and the rights of labor; yet said so much, in contrast, about the welfare of the laborer, about his education, housing, social security, his leisure time and vocational guidance, health and general welfare.

The year 1944, when compared with 1933, viewed in the light of attitudes as far as the worker is concerned, is as different as day is from night. All of the problems are not settled, but the 50,000,000 American workers know what they did not know in 1933. They know that under the Roosevelt administration their rights have been made secure. They know that their welfare is of vital concern to their Government. They know, too, that the welfare of labor is a concern of most of the other governments of the world. And because of all this, they know that such an objective as full employment, for example, is no longer considered an idle dream; it is now in the definite realm of possibility for the future.

LABOR HAS COME THROUGH

When this war came on, labor, like every other group of patriotic Americans, put aside many of its peace-time standards. They have stayed long hours at jobs that have been hard, have been nerve-wracking, have been back-breaking. They've done it without complaining. And they've done it not without sacrifice.

Have you ever consulted anyone who knows about the hazards of industry under war pressure when untrained employees come into industrial life? If you have, I think you discovered that since the war began there have already been over 30,000 persons who have lost their lives in war industry and over 200,000 who have been permanently injured. Those persons represent quite a sacrifice in the war effort. Let us give credit where credit is due. Without those sacrifices the tremendous production which has assured victory for us could not have been accomplished.

We have used the term "total war," and every speaker who advocates the sale of War bonds points out to us, who are potential bond buyers, that our money is needed to support the boys at the front. Just how long would those boys at the front last if they didn't have the home support? What good is an army without its reserves? What good is a navy without its home-manufactured supplies?

Where can we draw the line between the person who is giving his all in the war effort and the person who is holding back? The line must be drawn between individuals. It is the only one that should separate a slacker from one who is willingly doing his duty.

WHAT OF TOMORROW?

There are going to be many problems for the worker to face after this war is over—big problems. The question, of course, which is uppermost in the minds of everyone who is now in a war plant is "what about my job when we stop making planes and tanks and guns?"

The administration has done a great deal of thinking and planning for the days after the war. The Baruch plan, for instance, draws up a full demobilization blueprint for the change-over of both men and machines from war to peace.

Any plan which provides for the speedy reconversion of industry from war to peacetime production provides for the speedy making of jobs.

As war plants shut down, of course, there are bound to be lags in employment as we tool up for peace. For this period there is already one big accomplished fact for the workers—unemployment insurance.

Under which philosophy of government do you think a working man and woman would be safer in post-war America—the philosophy of the Roosevelt administration which made possible the unemployment insurance which is going to tide him over the reconversion period ahead, or the philosophy of the Republican Party which demonstrated in 1931 and 1932 that its solution for a problem of this kind was to turn the worker over to community charity—to the breadlines and the soup kitchen?

In the last 12 years the people of America have gained back confidence in their Government. It has accomplished much for their welfare, and they have faith that it can accomplish more. Particularly does the working man have faith in his government today. He remembers that in 1933 the cries of the unemployed and distressed were not uttered in vain. He remembers that when they asked for bread they were not given a stone. He knows that under this administration the working man has gone forward to new horizons and to greater self-respect.

The Roosevelt administration has remained constant in its endeavor to expand the people's welfare. The people, I believe, will remain constant in support of that administration.

Strikes in War Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. LEE O'DANIEL

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Why They Struck," by Frank C. Waldrop, published in the Washington Times-Herald of August 23, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY THEY STRUCK

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

As peace with Germany approaches, prepare for something else on the labor front in America. Soon after our Normandy beachhead of June 6 showed itself secure, strikes began to pop in and around war industries in record fashion.

The various labor conciliation agencies in Washington, to which have come an average of one new strike each day since D-day, are now handling about 25 cases a day, a new high for this year, and expect the figures to keep climbing.

Tempers are short, the strain of war is hard on employers and employees alike, and union discipline is increasingly hard to maintain, they report.

By far the most serious strike this year was the August 1 walkout of 6,000 transit workers in Philadelphia because the streetcar company upgraded eight Negroes to the rank of trolley operators, on order of the War Manpower Commission.

That one was settled after 7 days of violence only when Mr. Roosevelt sent the Army in to suppress rioting. Various civilian officials of Philadelphia are still working on the cause and cure of the potential high explosive that bred the strike itself.

But by far the most of the strikes this year seem to generate from minor grievances that in other days would not have caused a good 2 hours' grumbling.

There has just come to hand a review of petty strikes in 1944 from January to date, as reported in the official complaints. A fair sampling of these tells its own story:

DETROIT, MICH., January 31.—The rolling mill at the Ford River Rouge plant was closed when 110 men walked out because they were docked 15 minutes' pay for allegedly quitting ahead of time.

DETROIT, February 15.—Thirty employees of the Chrysler tank arsenal went on a sitdown strike because they had to walk 25 feet to pick up coveralls.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., March 6.—A walkout of 1,000 employees in the Diesel equipment division of General Motors occurred because a woman worker was sent home when she refused to take off gloves worn in violation of safety regulations.

ALTOONA, PA., March 29.—Coal production slumped because 150 men refused to be paid by check any longer at one mine, 411 others walked out in protest against transfer of night mine motormen to the day shift.

PITTSBURGH, April 4.—Grease dripped on an American flag hanging under a crane runway, so the foreman ordered it taken down, whereupon 859 steelworkers walked out of the seamless tubing mills of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation.

BOSTON, MASS., April 8.—The Bethlehem Steel Co. changed the time of day for cashing checks, so 3,000 workers quit work for 2 hours.

DETROIT, April 21.—The tank assembly line at Chrysler shut down and 1,000 employees were idle, because of a dispute with the management concerning a shift of the lunch hour for 350 employees from 7: 15 p. m. to 8.

FLINT, MICH., May 15.—About 2,200 employees of the Clayton & Lambert Manufacturing Co. walked out because they were refused a 5-minute wash-up period on company time just before the end of the days' work.

ATLANTA, GA., May 21.—Between 200 and 300 employees of the National Traffic Guard Co., makers of ships' parts, walked out in support of a worker who objected to an order that he quit shoveling sand and start heaving iron scrap into a furnace.

PITTSBURGH, May 24.—Because the drinking water in the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. plant was too warm, 400 men and women walked out. The company said the water-cooling system had been undergoing repairs for a week.

PASSAIC, N. J., June 3 (D-day was June 6).—Deliveries of cloth for the Army and Navy stopped when 600 employees of the Botany Worsted Mills went on a sit-down strike (ending work for the plant's total of 5,000 employees) because the War Labor Board in Washington had failed to act on a petition by the company for approval of incentive bonuses.

After D-day, June seemed to become a month of heat lightning all along the labor front.

For instance, 117 tool grinders stopped work at the Dodge plant in Chicago where they were making parts for B-29 Superfortresses, because an apprentice demanded journeyman wages when he was fired. The Graham-Paige Motor Corporation at Detroit disciplined 6 material handlers for leaving their jobs before the end of their regular shifts without permission, and nearly 4,000 workmen on amphibious tanks threw down their tools.

The same things continued on through July—in Ashland, Ky., the American Rolling Mills suspended operations in a walk-out of galvanizing department workers because one man's hours were changed.

In Cleveland, 2 inspectors for the Ohio Crankshaft Co., producers of parts for military vehicles, refused to accept transfers to new jobs and were fired, so 1,500 other workers threw down their tools.

In Newark, N. J., 500 war production employees of the McKiernan-Terry Corporation went out on strike because the War Labor Board in Washington reclassified their jobs.

August opened with not only light strikes but heavy ones, such as the walk-out of "over the road" truck drivers at Omaha, closing 35 truck terminals, to force their employers to accept a W. L. B. wage increase order.

And in Detroit, August's biggest development so far was the 12-day upheaval at General Motors, involving 5 factories and 7,000 workers making gears and axles, because 6 employees were laid off who said they couldn't maintain the production schedule.

But all that, say the Government officials, is just preliminary.

Discharged War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Unwanted Battalion," dealing with discharged war veterans, published in the Los Angeles Examiner of December 1, 1943.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UNWANTED BATTALION

For 600,000 young Americans the post-war period has begun. They are the men already discharged by the armed forces. For 2,000 other young Americans the post-war period begins each week.

Every hour of the day 12 men are returned to civilian life.

Many of them find families, friends, and jobs awaiting them.

But many—far too many—enjoy no such good fortune.

There are the thousands discharged on psychoneurotic grounds.

There are the thousands discharged for physical unfitness.

There are the thousands discharged for incapability.

There are the thousands discharged for having lost legs, arms, eyes, and stamina.

Only a few months ago these hopeful young men were the flower of American youth.

Through exhaustive physical and mental examinations, which only the best could pass, they were selected for military duty.

Now they are the unwanted battalion.

They are shunted out of hospitals.

They are shunted back to their families.

The Congress says these men ought to have their jobs back in private industry.

Employers generally agree.

But rigid labor standards imposed by safety legislation, insurance regulations, and measures calculated to reduce industrial accidents are an insurmountable barrier to disabled men's reemployment.

Consequently the infirmities which remove soldiers from battle lines also remove them from production lines.

As days become weeks and weeks extend into months, the plight of these veterans is increasingly worse.

Under the Federal law they are entitled to disability compensation. But to get it they must go through voluminous and often costly red tape and then wait from 2 to 4 months for the first payment.

Moreover, military regulations compel discharged men to be out of uniform in 90 days.

Unlike even convicts freed from penitentiaries, the soldiers, sailors, and marines who served their country honorably and heroically at home and abroad are not given a suit of clothes at the expiration of their terms. They must obtain their own.

So deplorable is the condition of returning servicemen that patriotic voices everywhere are raised in righteous protest. In Massachusetts John J. Sawtelle, only Democratic member of the Governor's executive council and the father of a soldier, recently castigated the national Democratic administration for its mistreatment of Second World War veterans.

Mr. Sawtelle said:

"More than 1,500 Massachusetts boys have been discharged from the armed forces as insane and sent home to their families with no real provision having been made for their medical care.

"The national administration is doing nothing for these new war victims.

"I took up the matter of returning boys being discharged as insane with Congressman JOHN W. MCCORMACK, majority leader in the House of Representatives.

"Mr. MCCORMACK said he was shocked at the number. But he was not shocked into doing anything about it.

"Beyond promises and empty words, nothing has as yet been done for these unfortunate lads.

"It is about time the Government of the Nation stopped spending $15,000,000,000 on housing projects of questionable value and transformed those housing units into veterans' hospitals."

In Washington, speaking on an Armistice Day program, Representative WALTER C. PLOESER, of Missouri, said:

"The political record of the President of these United States in regard to the war veterans is a shame in the eyes of the Nation.

"The political record of the majority Members of Congress to provide aid and sustenance for the men and women returning from this bloody war is a shame.

"The procrastination of the Democratic leaders of the military affairs committee of the House of Representatives is a shame."

Then Mr. PLOESER cited a specific case.

He told of a young man who had lost his right leg in the battle of Tunisia. After a period of hospitalization in the Army's Walter Reed Hospital in Washington, D. C., this young man was discharged. For him the post-war period was grim indeed.

The young man lacked money for food and shelter. He lacked money for railroad fare to his home. He lacked money for the civilian clothes which military regulations forced him to obtain.

Before this young man went to war he had worked on a farm in Kentucky.

But now he could no longer walk behind a plow because he had lost a leg in the service of his country.

At various times, before his enlistment in the Army, he had worked for a building contractor.

But never again could he climb ladders or move about roofs. The young man was truly hapless and helpless.

Finally, a kind-hearted woman in Washington gave him a temporary place to stay in her home.

She took him to the Veterans' Bureau where he received assurance that his case would be adjudicated as rapidly as possible, which meant 60 days and perhaps 120 days.

The woman then took the disabled soldier to various Members of Congress and demanded action.

Not all the veterans of this war will find good Samaritans to mother them and sponsor their cases.

Veterans, and particularly disabled veterans, must have the protection and benefits of adequate laws passed by their Congress and approved by their President.

Promises will not rehabilitate veterans sick in body and mind or fill their empty stomach.

America, which does not hesitate to give billions to foreign governments, should not hesitate to give something to her own disabled sons.

Message of Governor Dempsey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of New Mexico. Mr. Speaker, the Governor of New Mexico, the Honorable John J. Dempsey, was my predecessor in this House and was for 6 years a Member of it. During that time he became an influential member of the important Committee on Rules as well as a member of the Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities.

For the past 2 years he has been Governor of the State of New Mexico and in that time important financial gains have been registered by the State. He recently called a special session of the legislature to pass a bill validating the use of Federal ballots for members of the armed forces in the coming elections. At that time he took occasion to review some of the legislation enacted during his administration and to analyze the financial condition of the State. His many friends in the House will be interested in that report of his stewardship and I therefore insert it in full at this point:

Mr. President and members of the sixteenth legislature, at the outset I want to express my sincere appreciation that so large a proportion of your membership has found it possible to accept the call for service in this special session of the legislature.

These are busy times and it is difficult to leave businesses and professions for even a few days.

That so many of you have been able to answer this call is recognition of your desire to be of additional service to our fighting men.

Only the extreme importance of the legislation needed has prompted me to call this special session. Under our present constitutional restrictions, as you well understand, we can extend the privilege of absentee voting to cover balloting for Presidential electors and Members of Congress only.

With our men in service risking their lives to preserve our right to select public officials by ballot, it is our sacred obligation to extend to these servicemen the fullest opportunity to participate in the elections, insofar as our Constitution will permit.

The legislation proposed here will grant to our men and women in service, the right to vote for Presidential electors and Members of Congress.

My only regret is that, under present Constitutional limitations, we cannot extend the voting privilege to cover all State and county candidates.

I have long advocated a practicable and workable absentee law. As the record will show, I favored the constitutional amendment submitted to the people at a special election held in 1937.

This amendment, if adopted, would have permitted the legislature to enact laws making it possible for residents, absent from the State, to vote by absentee ballot.

This year, with more than 40,000 citizens of our State absent in the armed forces, it is unfortunate that the proposed constitutional amendment was not passed by the required majority.

It has been many months since we have met together in this chamber. The measures which you passed at the regular session of the legislature last year have produced excellent results.

I would like to take this opportunity, therefore, to discuss the benefits which the people of the State have derived from some of those measures.

You will be interested to know that the fiscal year reports, now being completed, show that our State is in the best financial condition in its history. All departments have made excellent records. Economy has not been a catch phrase. It has been an actuality.

The result is that we have the largest cash balance on hand today that New Mexico has ever enjoyed.

A part of this balance was made possible by the law you passed at the regular session of the legislature, providing that savings in the administrative funds of various tax-collecting agencies may be transferred to the general fund at the close of the fiscal year.

This law has been a great inducement to reduce administrative costs, and to encourage savings wherever possible.

This is especially so because of the fact that all savings revert to the general fund to be used for projects which will provide employment for our boys returning from the armed services. The cooperation that has been given in this respect is a tribute to the patriotic spirit of the directors of State departments and their employees.

A post-war construction program is now being drafted, not only by the State planning board but by committees in every community in the State.

We are providing not only the blueprints for peacetime employment, immediately following the war, but we are making savings to put those blueprints into operation.

Only those projects of a permanent and beneficial nature will be undertaken. These are not made jobs, the results of which will cease when the job is finished. They are permanent and necessary projects which will be timed to give employment during that period following demobilization when employment is most needed.

You will recall that during the regular session in 1943, I requested a two and one-half million dollar issue of refunding debentures be authorized:

At that time I assured you that the debentures were being authorized solely as insurance against a possible decrease in revenues to the highway department, and in order to safeguard the State's credit.

I advised you that the debentures would not be used unless it became necessary to use proceeds of this issue to retire debentures already outstanding.

None of the authorized issues has been sold, and I can now assure you that none will be sold.

By reducing activities of the highway department to the minimium necessary to protect the investment in our highway system, and by curtailing expenditures wherever possible, we have been able to establish the highway department on a solid financial basis.

We have retired $2,250,000 of outstanding debentures from current income, and no new debentures have been issued. In addition, we have paid during this same period nearly $1,000,000 in interest.

Although the income to the highway department from the gasoline tax and motor vehicle license fees has been reduced more than $2,000,000 a year under normal times, the highway department today has a cash balance of nearly $3,000,000.

I would like to point out here that there has been some misunderstanding as to how savings have been made in the highway department.

Some newspapers have contended that since virtually no construction work is being carried on at the present time, savings would naturally result. This is far from true. The construction and maintenance funds are separate and distinct. The Federal Government participates in construction work. It does not participate in maintenance. The savings to which I refer have been made in the funds earmarked for maintenance and have no relation to construction.

We have cut the cost of maintenance in every possible way. To cite one example: During most of the year, maintenance is carried on at a normal level; but for 2 or 3 months of the year, maintenance work reaches a high peak which would require increasing the maintenance crew nearly 100 percent if the work were done, as in the past, by State highway forces. We have discontinued this practice.

We are now letting part of this peak load to contract by competitive bids. This method not only avoids doubling our maintenance force for a short time, but it results in the highway department needing from 40 to 50 percent less equipment—equipment which would be used only during the peak period and would deteriorate while idle. By avoiding this purchase of equipment, the highway department is able to reflect savings amounting to several hundred thousand dollars annually.

The cash balance in the highway department is sufficient to guarantee that the State of New Mexico can match any possible Federal-aid road program during at least the first year of the post-war period, without issuance of any new debentures.

This is an excellent condition. It enables us to continue our program of retiring debentures as they fall due. We are not only cutting down on the principal of outstanding debentures, but by reducing the principal, the interest payments will have been cut by $80,000 annually at the close of the present administration on December 31.

At the regular session of the legislature you passed a bill for the benefit of the needy aged of this State.

This bill was passed in the name of humanity, for a humanitarian purpose.

Developments since this measure took effect have proved conclusively that the bill was vitally necessary to prevent hunger and suffering among the fathers and mothers of this State. In most cases these men and women have grown old in the service of their communities. They were the ones who by their toil laid the foundation for the great State we have today.

The average monthly check for old-age assistance is now a little more than $32. If it had not been for the tobacco tax, which this legislature authorized, that average payment today would be only $14.64 per month, as reflected by the records in the office of the director of public welfare.

I want, therefore, to express again to your membership my sincere thanks for your foresightedness and your humanity which prompted an early solution to a serious problem.

Today, they are not erecting tombstones in New Mexico bearing the epitaph, "He Died of Hunger and Neglect."

This legislature passed a bill at the regular session authorizing the transfer of all funds derived from the mineral leasing act from the State general fund to the school equalization fund.

This was done in order to increase the revenue available to our public-school system. This one act took from the general fund this year some $306,000.

At the time, many people objected to this transfer on the grounds that it would deprive the general fund of revenues needed to meet the appropriations made by the legislature.

The point was well taken, since no new revenue was earmarked for the general fund to offset this loss.

I felt then that we would make sufficient savings in administrative costs of the various State departments to more than offset the amount we had previously received from the mineral leasing act.

When the books for the fiscal year just ended are finally closed, the record will prove that we were right.

We have made savings, not only sufficient to offset this loss of more than $300,000 to the general fund, but we have built up a balance sufficient to bring our total accumulated savings for the last 2 fiscal years to more than $1,250,000. Of this sum we have invested $1,200,000 in war bonds, which not only brings interest to the State, but also assists the Federal Government in financing the war effort.

This and other measures have enabled us to place our public-school system in a strong financial position.

For many years the salaries paid to the educators of this State have been so low as to constitute an actual disgrace.

Our educators have one of the greatest responsibilities of any profession, but their salaries were in no way in keeping with this responsibility.

I am happy to be able to report to you that the two school budgets which have been made under this administration have added 28 percent to the amount allocated for public-school maintenance.

Teachers' salaries have been greatly increased. Next year, for instance, the budget provides an increase of approximately $1,000,000 in the salary item alone.

We do not want to give only to take away. For that reason we have built up reserves in the school funds which are sufficient to protect the salary increases already made, even should we suffer a temporary decrease in revenues for school purposes in the immediate post-war period.

In order to further protect the gains made by our educational system legislation is being prepared which, if acted upon favorably by the legislature at the next regular session, will prevent diversion of school funds to any other purpose whatsoever.

The office of the State purchasing agent, which you created by legislative action, has been instrumental in effecting numerous savings and has operated efficiently and with benefit to all State departments.

There has been some confusion caused in the minds of many because of published reports that the purchasing department is costing some $18,000 annually. It is true that this figure is the approximate cost of operating the purchasing department.

But creation of this department has not added 1 cent to the appropriation account nor to the cost of government. The actual cost of operation is less than it was under the old system.

Previously, each large department incurred expense in making its own purchases. The highway department, as an example, spent some $11,500 annually for its purchasing division. Such expenses have been eliminated, and, in addition, departments and institutions have profited by quantity buying, discounts, and in other ways made possible by centralized purchasing.

We have made savings in numerous other ways. Travel by State-owned and private cars used for State business decreased more than 40 percent last year under the normal year of 1941.

The State has had many problems to overcome as a result of wartime conditions.

There has been increased activity in some departments, but these increased activities have been carried on with less manpower and with a reduction in the over-all cost of operation, even though it has been necessary to raise salaries in order to retain trained personnel.

Savings which this administration have made have not interfered with the effective functioning of the departments, nor with the high standard of service rendered the people.

In conclusion, in order to present a clear picture of the results obtained by our economy program during the past 18 months, I would like to make this brief review:

We now have a balance of more than $1,250,000 in the general fund. We have paid off the State's highway debenture debt in the amount of $2,250,000. We have in the highway department, in cash and bonds, $1,500,000 more than we had on December 31, 1942.

In other words, we are $5,000,000 better off financially than we were 18 months ago.

The legislation which you have under consideration is of the utmost importance. It is necessary that we certify to the United States War Ballot Commission before July 15 that use of the Federal ballot by service men and women is authorized by the laws of our State. I am sure that you are familiar with the urgency of the occasion.

If I can be of help to you in any way, during the period of your deliberations, you have only to call on me.

Thank you.

Cashing of War Bonds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SID SIMPSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I include the following editorial from the Jacksonville (Ill.) Journal-Courier:

WHY BUY THEM, ONLY TO CASH THEM?

Disclosure that bond redemptions almost equaled sales during the first 12 days of August will prove disquieting to thoughtful Americans. The duty of citizens is not limited to buying all of the bonds possible. There is the further obligation to hold on to bonds already purchased. If the purchaser intends to cash his bonds quickly, it would be better that he not purchase them at all.

Citizens who have the welfare of the Nation at heart will keep their bonds well into the post-war readjustment, not just for the duration. If the Treasury in addition to having to provide for post-war requirements must at the same time arrange for redemption of large quantities of bonds, the financial problem it will face will be aggravated and post-war inflation will be a possibility.

Buy bonds to the limit of your ability, but hold them to maturity. They are one of the best investments you can make. They are your protection against the proverbial "rainy day" as well as visible evidence of your support of the war effort.

Woe in Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Dayton News:

WOE IN CHICAGO

Colonel McCormick and his Tribune were in blue Monday mood this week as witness this comment on the Washington Conference:

"The conference to be held in Washington this week between Cordell Hull and John Foster Dulles presages nothing beneficial for America. Mr. Hull, according to the evidence he has adduced, represents the views of the British Foreign Office. Mr. Dulles is the impersonation of the big dough of Wall Street. We can expect to emerge from this conference some plan to perpetuate all the evils and brutalities of the British Empire with Wall Street getting a cut on the profits of imperialism and nothing to provide for the future security of America, as has been the case for the last 40 years. American interests will have to depend on the Senate."

At each past revolution of the Dewey mind on foreign policy, Colonel McCormick has been off and on. When Dewey, a year ago, came out for an alliance with Great Britain, the Colonel cast him to the dogs. By the June convention time Dewey had sufficiently convinced the Colonel that he hadn't meant it to gain the Tribune's support for President, though Governor Bricker was its outspoken isolationist preference. Now the Dewey course takes another twist. He has sent Mr. Dulles to Washington to plot with the enemy. McCormick is double-crossed, and what is he to do?

Note the final sentence of the Colonel's Monday morning blues: "American interests will have to depend on the Senate." One-third of the Senate plus one can block the plan for peace now as it did 25 years ago. The Colonel counts on the one-third rule to save his isolationism.

Senator Jim Watson said to Senator Henry Cabot Lodge: "Senator, I don't see how we are ever going to defeat this proposition (the League of Nations). It appears to me that 80 percent of the people are for it."

"Ah, my dear James," said Lodge, "I do not promise to try to beat it by direct frontal attack, but by the indirect method of reservations."

Just so the Senator did. He fomented grief about article 10, about Shantung, about Britain's six votes, and so the one-third rule prevailed; and so now we are in a war; and so still our plans to prevent more wars are met by plays of politics and plays upon the Senate, and the one-third rule.

Now, as Senator Jim Watson said to Henry Cabot Lodge, the people are for it. How can it be beaten? We hope it can't be; but look out for the Lodges with their indirect method, their reservations, their politics. The people, in 1920, with eyes wide open, had their pockets picked by indirect method, by reservations, by the one-third rule. It could happen again.

Kimmel Case Needs Hearing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SINCLAIR WEEKS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Kimmel Case Needs Hearing," by Bill Cunningham, published in the Boston Herald of August 22, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KIMMEL CASE NEEDS HEARING—"AMERICAN DREYFUS CASE" NOT THE DEMOCRATIC WAY

(By Bill Cunningham)

NANTUCKET, August 21.—Admiral Kimmel of Pearl Harbor evidently has a story to tell, and the American people should see that he gets the chance to tell it. The principal, and only important, reason is that, under the straight rules of American fair play, not to mention the provisions of the Constitution, a man has the right to try to clear his name. It's doubtful that the public, at this late date, would be interested in any political nuisances involved, but if any politician lacks the moral courage necessary to see the Admiral take the stand, tell his story and leave the decision to his fellow citizens, the public ought to know who that politician is.

To date, although writers and commentators tiptoe as delicately around the subject as if it were a nest of sleeping rattlesnakes, the issue is as obvious as a boil on a beauty's chin. Antiadministrationists have plumped for the courts martial of the disgraced admiral and general, believing undoubtedly, or perhaps hoping desperately, that a full revelation of the facts would condemn, not the officers, but the administration, and condemn it to such a shocking extent that it would be repudiated by the public at the next election.

PREFERS TO DO HIS THINKING ALONE

Just as stubbornly, and with full success to date, the proadministration forces have been able to block all proposals to hold the formal trials. They haven't been able to still the admiral's demand, and he's freshly in the news with what amounts to be a new one. Democratic Vice Presidential nominee Senator HARRY S. TRUMAN, not, until now, exactly an author of note, has a piece about the tragedy at Pearl Harbor in the current issue of one of the weekly magazines, and Admiral Kimmel has served a letter on the Senator, saying the article is unfair, much of it untrue, and requesting him in the interests of fair play and accuracy to leave the subject alone until a trial can be held.

The log of Kimmel's conduct, and an examination of his public statements since he was relieved of his command seem to paint him a man at ease with his conscience, and fearless of the future, if he can only get his chance to tell his story. People who know him say he has been deeply hurt. Neighbors in the New York City suburb where he resided, after accepting a post with a New York engineering firm, said they saw him leave his home frequently after dinner and take long walks alone. He looked neither bowed nor broken, they said, and he made no effort to conceal his identity, but he looked as if he had a lot of thinking to do, and that he preferred to do it alone, out under the stars.

The official reasons given for postponing the trials have been "security," and the fact that it would be dangerous, if not impossible, to withdraw from their war stations enough officers of sufficient rank to constitute the courts in courts martial. An officer must be tried by his equals or better. These trials would require a lot of gold braid and shining stars, and we've got other uses for such gentlemen at the moment. They're good excuses and hard to dissolve, but the "security" objection must be weaker than it was, for the Pearl Harbor of '41, even the Pacific of '41, and the same properties now must have about as much in common as a popgun and the battleship Idaho.

So far as massing the gold braid goes, why a trial, anyhow, before an indictment? Why not examine the evidence as a grand jury does, see who, if anybody, appears to be guilty under either the civil or the military codes and then proceed to prosecute before the proper authority? This would be a proper proceeding for a congressional committee. What the public would like to see is the testimony and that's what Admiral Kimmel evidently would like to give. General Short, last reported working for the Ford Motor Co. in Texas, has kept his opinion and his wishes to himself.

SHUTTING THE BOOK IS WHAT VETERAN WANTS

Those trying to press the trials hope to bag "somebody higher up" There weren't many of these. The full list would include a few over-all admirals and generals, the Secretaries of War and the Navy, possibly the State Department, and at the top the President. The President, of course, is really their target, although none has been quite bold enough to say so.

The charge against him, in rumor, is that he gave the Japs what amounted to an ultimatum in those tense and highly confidential days just before the attack, and that he forgot to, or somebody failed to, notify the Pearl Harbor commanders. Regardless of whether the Messrs. Kimmel and Short took tea or threw rocks at each other when they chanced to meet, say the nurturers of this particular legend, they would instantly have ordered "battle stations" for their men if they had known an ultimatum had been flung into Hirohito's buck teeth. That's simply elementary in the soldiering of a frontier post. But they didn't know, or at least this version says they didn't know. The Japs struck and the world knows the rest. Or maybe it doesn't. The stories differ there, too.

More powerful than vital statistics, however, is the natural psychology of a nation at war—and after war. With peace, the powerful impulse is to forget the whole business. As a veteran general expressed himself privately the other day, "War is like a drunken orgy in which an otherwise decent man forgets every decent thing he knows and wallows in filth like a pig. When it's over, what he wants to do is forget it, to forget that he could do the things he did, say the things he said, sink as low as he did. He wants a good bath, some clean clothes, and the book shut on the whole business."

POLITICS OR NO POLITICS, HEARING IS IN ORDER

Whether that tells it, the psychology undoubtedly will be to get on with new business, charge off the losses and mishaps as things that couldn't be avoided for one reason or another, to consider that we all make mistakes, that war isn't our principal business, and what the etc. of it, anyhow, since we won and that's principally what matters.

But that doesn't clear the name of a man who publicly charges he's been cruelly wronged, and who is consistently refused the right of his day in court. It gives us an American Dreyfus case. It muzzles a man, who on the record, dedicated his career to the service of his country, and lets any self-starting, and probably spook-riding, author such as Senator Truman earn a few hundred dollars by throwing mud into the closet at the uniform he once wore with dignity and honor.

With or without the reputed ultimatum, with or without Kimmel and Short, with or without politics, the tragedy of Pearl Harbor already stands, and always will stand, as a terrible charge against all those whose primary responsibility was the safety of the Nation at that particular hour. If the Admiral can place the blame more exactly, he should be given fair opportunity, not for the benefit of politics, but for the information of posterity. He should be given the chance to clear his name, that being every American's constitutional right, and until he is given that chance, his fellow-citizens should remain silent. That includes Senators writing for pay.

If they want to do something constructive and fair about the general subject, let them really go after it with a congressional investigation. If they lack that courage, let them leave it alone.

Address to the Republican Fourth District Convention at Greenwich, Conn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me on August 9, 1944:

Two years ago, when I decided to stand, as a Republican, for election to the House of Representatives from this Fourth District of Connecticut, I did so with some doubts. You will remember that I was frank with you about those doubts. I told you then in complete candor, that I was not as familiar with our purely district problems as I was with the problems which might arise in Congress out of the battle fronts. This was necessarily true, because much of my time in the previous 3 years had been spent reporting and studying events in the grim and troubled lands of those who had become our enemies and our allies. You listened, then you resolved the doubts in my favor. In the year 1942, Allied armies were still reeling under the blows of the Axis. You seemed to feel that was a year to choose a Representative who would understand and put battle-front needs above home-front needs, and certainly above party needs. You felt that a Representative who best served America at war, would best serve Fairfield County. And in the end, the people of this district felt as you did, because they elected me.

Today, my worst enemy could not charge that during these past 2 years, any vote of mine has denied to our fighting men, or our allies anything which they needed to conquer our enemies. I challenge my opponents to find in my record a single word or vote to which any returning G. I. Joe could point, saying, "That vote made it tougher for me to get out of my fox hole—that word denied me the tools of victory."

But this is not the year 1942. This is the year 1944. And while there is still a long and grim fight ahead in Asia and in Europe, victory is in sight. Already post-war problems begin to loom large for all Americans, and for the people of Fairfield County. In the early months of victory, only the rapid and orderly post-war conversion of our war factories to peacetime production will prevent this from becoming a severe depression area. We must insure jobs for our returning veterans. We must guarantee unemployment compensation and insurance, not only for them, but for our men and women veterans of the home front. If we fail in Washington, in the great task of human and economic demobilization, thousands upon thousands of people in this district will be trampled into impoverishment in the stampede for jobs. These and many other human problems which will arise out of re-conversion will require the services of a legislator who has a detailed knowledge of these matters, and some experience in the legislative processes by which we can achieve them.

In these past 2 years, I believe I have come to understand a good deal about those problems. And while I prefer to wait until later in the campaign to analyze them in detail, this is the time to make a general observation or two about our chances of solving them.

My first observation is that the present administration is just as incapable of preventing a new depression as it was incapable of curing the last one.

There is not a single thoughtful man in Washington today who does not tremble for the economic welfare of this country, if the present administration stays in power. For after 3 long years of war this administration still lacks an adequate program for demobilization. There are hard and tumultuous days ahead of us indeed, if, when peace comes, the demobilization of our home front is handled in the same "slapdash," off-the-cuff fashion that the mobilization of our home front was handled when war came.

Take our manpower problem. Is it any secret that the W. M. C. has fumbled and finagled it from the beginning? The only consistent features of Mr. McNutt's manpower policy were his consistent determination to stay in power, and his consistently contradictory orders. Did ever a bureaucrat give tongue to more confusing and confused fiats, ultimatums, directives, proscriptions, injunctions, ukases, and bulls—mostly bulls? And all these long and noisy decrees resulted in the hoarding of labor, colossal turn-over percentages and inflexibility in the matter of procurement. There was a pitiful want of imagination in the shifting of contracts to the places where workers were. Instead workers were shifted by the millions to already overcrowded war production centers. There bad housing, high rents, and lack of transportation facilities made life a cruel human strain. Within the past 2 weeks, there has come from the W. M. C. a new edict called the "Ceiling plan." Donald Nelson, head of the W. P. B. characterizes it as "practically a national service act." As the workers of America will soon learn to their sorrow it is an edict which will result in the erratic, severe, and often unjust regimentation of labor. It contains all the most evil features of a national service act, and none of the good ones.

What our manpower crisis always needed, and still needs, is a little judicious firing of surplus manpower in the most overcrowded war center on earth—bureaucratic Washington. This, the present administration was always too weak to do in the past. It will be just as weak in handling future manpower demobilization problems.

Or take our labor problems. Is it a secret that labor's relations with America at war have been handled abominably?

Our labor problems cannot be laid at the door of the patriotic, unorganized laboring man, or the decent and loyal union man and his leaders. They can be laid right smack bang on the doorstep of a weak administration. In 12 long years this administration has failed to appoint and vest with authority a competent Secretary of Labor. Both as a woman, and an American, I blush with shame when I read that the Washington press corps voted Madame Perkins, Secretary of Labor of the greatest industrial Nation on earth, the most useless person in Washington. Does anyone deny that this administration has made pets of certain labor leaders, to the exclusion of many patriotic labor leaders, in order to secure political control of their organizations? Individual labor organizations should not be used as political clubs over the electorate. Individual labor leaders should not be used as political agents to win an election. All labor unions, and all labor leaders should be used as economic allies, to win a war and a peace for all Americans. Our weak administration's confused labor policy was further confused by Mr. Roosevelt's amazing notion that he could personally settle all strikes by last-minute bluffs and bargains. Does anyone deny that this has been an invitation to strikes? As you all know, I voted against the Smith-Connally Act, because it was plain to me from the beginning that this act would promote the very thing it was framed to prevent—more strikes in wartime. But that jaundiced act was the natural spawn of Mr. Roosevelt's febrile and bilious labor policy.

I pledge myself, insofar as this pledge can be carried out in Congress, to work for a clear-cut, definite labor policy. That means a policy which will not change with every labor incident on the home front, and will not force labor leaders, on pain of liquidation, to compete with one another as vote getters. To be sure, I see no real hope of any policy that will guarantee harmonious labor relations among unions, and between unions and the American people, until Mr. Roosevelt leaves office. But I have great hopes of achieving such a policy because I have great hopes that Mr. Roosevelt will leave office after November. Such a policy we will achieve under a Republican President. Mr. Dewey has no vested political interests in old labor feuds and disputes, or in creating new ones.

I have mentioned the administration's feeble and spiteful labor policy at some length tonight because the strikes engendered by it have been the one thing on the home front which our fighting men could least understand or forgive and which therefore have most seriously affected their morale.

But there are many other problems besides those of manpower and labor relations which were badly bungled in the mobilization of our home front between the years 1939 and 1941. The mistakes and delays made in mobilizing the home front before Pearl Harbor were paid for in the blood of our allies. After Pearl Harbor, they began to be paid for in American blood.

Does anyone deny that a real war cabinet would have helped to achieve victory faster? Yet we have never had a real war cabinet. In charge of agriculture, war production, and labor, we have had instead a vast collection of diffuse and overlapping agencies and authorities. The administration created agencies which became bodies without heads, and appointed agents who became heads without bodies.

When the war is over, the mistakes made in Washington will be paid for in the lowering of the American living standards, and in widespread unemployment.

Mr. Churchill once said: "I was not appointed to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire." There are some who say that this position is not consistent with the provisions of the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms." But none can fail to applaud Churchill for his honest and bold statement concerning his stewardship. Many Americans have wondered if there is any American equivalent of such a statement which will not be in conflict with either the Atlantic Charter or the "four freedoms." I believe there is. The next President of the United States must be able to say: "I was not elected to preside over the liquidation of the American standard of living." On the record, Mr. Roosevelt is not the man who will ever be able to say that, and make it stick.

The American standard of living must be maintained and raised in the post-war years, for all sections of our population, for the farmer, and commuter, the small-business man and the workingman, for the professional man and woman in every field, and for our vast Negro population. Only then can we hope to stay a strong power, capable of cooperating with other nations to keep the peace of the world, and bring back prosperity. It is my most ardent belief that our best hope of maintaining and raising living standards for all Americans lies in the hands of a Republican President and Congress.

And now I come to the most important thing I have to say to you tonight. I want to tell you, why at this hour of the world's history, I am glad to be called a Republican. It is because I believe that the Republican Party is the true party of liberal progressivism in this country. The Democratic Party has slowly become, in its 12 turbulent and frenzied years, the party of revolutionary reaction. Behind the New Deal mask of political humanitarianism there skulk most of the potential mass regimenters, mass slave drivers, mass demagogues, the race haters, and the class haters in our Nation. Their lust for power over other men welds them together. Their technique is to corrupt the people at the polls with vast, vague unrealizable hopes: Shangri-la is just around the corner. But each and every hope is held forth on condition that the people will vote away a few more of their individual liberties. I am not talking of the ramsquaddled do-gooding New Deal bureaucrats, nor of the bumbling BARKLEYS of the party, nor of the high New Deal officials whose hearts bleed publicly for everyone in the world—except of course everyone who wants their jobs. They are just the front men—often innocent ones. I am talking of the men who manipulate them behind the Washington scenes, the icy-minded men who are bent on Balkanizing America politically, in order to convert it piecemeal to European totalitarian ideologies. In the very name of a war against dictatorship and totalitarianism, these flinty minded men have made much progress in preparing the American political soil for the growth of a dictatorship.

Now, I do not for a moment believe that Mr. Roosevelt is a real dictator. Rather, he is a sort of "super-duper," highly cultured political boss. There is nothing more typical of American politics than the shrewd, smiling, open-handed, warm-hearted, and flexible big-boss type. Mr. Roosevelt is, perhaps, just what Mayor Hague or Ed Kelly might have been if they had been born with money and had the benefits of travel abroad and a Groton education. I hope the Democrats will not feel that Mr. Roosevelt has been insulted by being compared with two of his most trusted and favored lieutenants. After all, there is no one more welcome at the White House than these two loyal and successful Americans. But the fact remains that political bosses, even the most patriotic ones, are primarily interested in wielding personal power. Mr. Roosevelt, in view of his fourth term desires, seems no exception. And power corrupts not only the man who acquires a gnawing hunger for it but in the end it corrupts all those who feed his appetite. In this corruption, which never fails to spread to the electorate which tolerates it, evil alien forces soon breed, like maggots.

The very bloodstream of this power-sick administration has been infected and has caused the whole body politic to be infected by the germs of philosophies totally alien to a healthy republic. If Mr. Roosevelt is reelected, they will thrive and grow. And when Mr. Roosevelt's tired hands relinquish office 4 years hence it may well be snatched by some budding dictator nurtured in his own corrupted party.

What was the danger that brought this war upon us? The danger we faced as a nation from Europe and Asia? It was twofold. First, it was physical. The German and Japanese nations were seeking militarily and economically to dominate the Pacific and Atlantic. Until they were totally crushed, there was always a physical danger to America, to its soil and its wealth. We have met that danger, and we will triumph over it.

The second danger we faced, and which our Christian civilization faced, was a spiritual danger. This was the danger to us of totalitarian philosophy which long before the war broke in Europe, had begun to spread over the world. Today, we see quite clearly that Nazi Germany is a criminal state, because Fascism is a criminal philosophy of government. It violated not only all principles of morality between nations, but all the principles of morality between men.

Nevertheless, in their early days, the German and Italian National Socialists made many noises that sounded suspiciously like "new dealism." In the trips I took to Germany and Italy long before the war, the people of those countries were infatuated with the benefits that were accruing to them in matters of housing and wages, and social insurance and all sorts of economic equalities which seemed then to be the direct result of their willingness to abandon democratic procedures. What a happy and prosperous thing said the majority of Germans and Italians, was a one-party state, and a one-man government. How content they seemed with their Duce principle and their Fuehrer principle—the principle of the leader, who was indispensable, who could do no wrong, who was always to be trusted and obeyed, because he was so utterly dedicated to the "social welfare of the people." We have seen how this principle that one man and one party knows what is best for millions of people has led Germany to defeat and despair and to ruin. In this belief, lies the withering away of parliaments and the death of human liberties.

Do not think I do not hear the question you are silently asking me. And what about communism? Is that not also a danger to us?

Let me answer that as honestly as I know how. I said the danger to us from abroad was twofold. Physical and spiritual. The Communist state is certainly not a physical danger to our Nation. On the contrary the Communist state has been our great ally in this war, on a physical level. It has played a major military part in beating our European enemies. At a physical and material level, we can feel, and the nations of Europe can feel, nothing but deep gratitude to the Communists. Nor do I see that tomorrow Soviet Russia will present any physical or material threat to our Nation. In helping to keep the peace in Europe and in helping to restore world trade, Russia can continue to be a most valuable physical ally.

The threat of communism to us, as to all civilized nations on earth today, lies at a spiritual level. The danger is not that the Communist state will seek physically to spread upon Europe and Asia, but that the Communist state of mind will spread over the whole world including America.

And now I shall say to you what has been said in other days by Churchill, and many other European statesmen, and all the world's greatest philosophers, educators, ministers and students of history, though unhappily our President has not dared to say it since the war broke. Next to fascism, communism is the most deadly blight that has ever hit the spirit of man. For, there has never been a period in all the history of civilized nations, when their peoples and their rulers have not admitted that their rights and their powers derived from a higher being or beings. I challenge anyone to tell me the name of one great nation since the dawn of history, whose peoples and rulers have not worshipped at some divine altar. The Communists alone have sunk so low that they think there is nothing higher than man. For a nation and its rulers to embrace this belief, is in the end to make of man himself an idol. And that is to renounce religion forever. It were far better that man should worship a golden calf than that he should worship the flesh-and-blood ass he has too often proven himself to be in history.

Over a hundred years ago, that great historian, De Tocqueville wrote of our western civilization: "Christianity has been the companion of liberty in all its conflicts, the cradle of its infancy, and the divine source of all its claims." Where the people lose God, be it in Germany or Russia, there all individual liberties must at last perish. And there will follow, as night follows sunset, espionage, concentration camps, defamations, frauds, brutalities, trials without jury, secret imprisonments, secret deaths, and the creation of a ruling caste of phony supermen. I say phony supermen because on the record they can keep power only by conspiracy, and stabilize order only by blood purges. Let me make myself quite plain. I do not deny for a moment that if communism came to America, its ruthless regimentation could quite possibly put a refrigerator in every man's home, and a car in every man's garage, be he black or white. Yet I say, in the end it would destroy our liberties and deny to us all self-expression, self-growth, and self-realization.

Come, you say, the American Communists have now officially disbanded as a political party. That is true. Since Mr. Roosevelt's fourth-term announcement, 50,000 of them, the zealots and fanatics have gone underground. Underground into the Democratic Party. Mr. Roosevelt knows this quite as well as you and I do. And yet, he seems content to accept their services whether they manifest themselves secretly, in the Political Action Committee, in branches of his Government, or at the polls.

The time has come for the American people to warn Mr. Roosevelt most earnestly that in doing so he may seriously compromise his place in history. It will not be enough to have it said of him that as Commander in Chief he saved the body of the Nation, if it is also said of him that as President of the United States he stood by while its spirit began to perish. It is because I see a distinct trend toward communistic subhuman standardization in certain sections of the Democratic Party, it is because I see that all—all the strong and fanatical Communists and fellow travelers in America have rooted themselves firmly in the weak and vacillating body of the Democratic Party today, and are working in it, and with it, and on it—it is because I see this, that win or lose in November, I am glad to be a Republican.

You have asked me to go back to Congress for another 2 years. I accept the honor and the responsibility you have placed upon me gladly and proudly. No vote of mine will deny the masses of the people of this country a richer share in their country's wealth or a larger stake in its noble future. There is nothing of my own I seek to protect there, except the right to speak up in behalf of our liberties.

I thank you all for the help you have given me in the past 2 years, and for the trust you place in me again tonight. With you, I face the coming elections with confidence that we shall win, and that in winning here in Connecticut, and in the Nation, our victory will awaken again the true image of America in the hearts of Americans. That victory, in constellation with our victory on the battle fronts, would be a happy augury, not only for our own people, but for all the peoples of the world, who still believe in the American dream, which is that man can both prosper in body and be free in spirit.

Editorial Comment on the Proposed Missouri Valley Authority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY
OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, at the request of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], who recently introduced a bill to create the Missouri Valley Authority, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials commenting upon the proposed M. V. A., one from the Chicago Sun of August 21, and the other from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 11, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Sun of August 21, 1944]

TOWARD AN M. V. A.

Senator MURRAY'S bill to set up a Missouri Valley Authority offers the only real solution to the problems of that valley. Most people in the region agree today that the river should be controlled. But irrigation interests in the West want to control it for their purposes, navigation interests for theirs, flood control and power interests for theirs. To complicate the situation, some strong agencies have their own purely negative fish to fry—the railroads don't want improved navigation, and private utilities don't want public development of water power.

A regional authority, created necessarily by the Federal Government but operating under decentralized management, is the best way to get unified control of the river for all purposes. The same structures can control floods, irrigate arid soil, generate power, and provide a water highway for heavy freight—and to neglect any one of these functions would constitute a gross waste of natural resources. The T. V. A. has shown the way for an M. V. A.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 11, 1944]

THE URGENCY OF M. V. A.

It is with an informed sense of urgency that Senator MURRAY, of Montana, discusses his bill for the creation of a Missouri Valley Authority.

There are good reasons why the development is urgent. In the long run it is essential for what it will do for this region and for the enrichment and strengthening of the Nation. In the short run, in the immediate future, it is essential for the contribution it can make to averting ruinous post-war unemployment.

The M. V. A. project will require the services of many thousands of workers and will, therefore, perform a direct service to the cause of full employment after the war. It will, what is more, create new opportunities for self-support which will contribute to employment even better and more lastingly.

Among these will be the opportunities for returning servicemen to settle on farms in the irrigable upper plains and to obtain irrigation through M. V. A. Many veterans turned to farming on irrigated land in the Missouri Valley after the First World War; many more are writing home these days saying that they are interested in building the same sort of future for themselves when they come marching home.

"Time," says Senator MURRAY, "is of the essence. * * * The fight for what is now still a mere dream—the creation of the M. V. A.—is just commencing. Much educational work will have to be done. Sectionalism will have to be overcome; selfish interests must be exposed and combated."

When the war is over, and when public works must be set in motion at once to take up the slack in private employment, the Missouri Valley needs to be ready with a plan—at that very moment. The fact that the Army Engineers have a plan and the Reclamation Bureau has a plan may mislead some of our people into thinking that the Missouri Valley is so ready. It is not.

The extremity of our unreadiness may be glimpsed in, for example, the status of a program of soil-erosion control, which will be one of the most important parts of any comprehensive plan for the development of the Missouri Valley. The Department of Agriculture has reported that it still does not have the appropriation to make the survey to find out what should be done.

M. V. A. is essential. It is urgent. For the future of this great valley, there is no time to be lost.

President Roosevelt's Address at Opening of Dumbarton Oaks Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GRANT FURLONG
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. FURLONG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of informal remarks of President Roosevelt on receiving the delegates to the Dumbarton Oaks Conference:

Gentlemen, this is an informal occasion. I have not prepared any speech. This is merely a feeling on my part that I would like to shake hands with you. I should like to be able to go out to Dumbarton Oaks, to take a part in your discussions.

A conference of this kind always reminds me of an old saying of a gentleman called Alfred E. Smith, who used to be Governor of New York. He was very, very successful in settling any problem between capital and labor, or anything that had to do with the State government in which there was a controversy.

He said if you can get the parties into one room with a big table and make them take their coats off and put their feet up on the table, and give each one of them a good cigar you can always make them agree. Well, there was something in the idea.

You have a great responsibility. In a way, it is a preliminary responsibility. But, after all, we learn from experience, and what I hope is that in planning for the peace that is to come we will arrive at the same good cooperation and unity of action as we have in the carrying on of the war. It is a very remarkable fact that we have carried on this war with such great unanimity.

DID NOT KNOW CHURCHILL WELL

I think that often it comes down to personalities. When, back in 1941, at the time of the Atlantic Charter, just for example, I did not know Mr. Churchill at all well. I had met him once or twice very informally during the First World War. I did not know Mr. Eden. But up there in the North Atlantic—3 or 4 days together, with our two ships lying close together—we got awfully fond of each other. I got to know him, and he got to know me. In other words, we met, and you cannot hate a man that you know well.

Later on Mr. Molotoff came here, and we had a grand time together. Then during the following year, at Teheran, the Marshal (Stalin) and I got to know each other. We got on beautifully. We cracked the ice, if there ever was any ice; and since then there has been no ice. And that's the spirit in which I know you are going about your work.

I was just talking with the Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson. He was saying that one of the tasks we face is making this conference of ours—and the successor conferences—something that will last a long time. He said that, unfortunately, in Germany the young people, the young Nazis, favor an idea which will be dangerous to the peace of the world, just as long as they have anything to say about it.

The prisoners of 17, 18, 20 that we are capturing now—both on the French front and Soviet front—these German prisoners of that age, are even worse in their nazi-ism than the prisoners of 40 or 45. And, therefore, as long as these young men have anything to say about it, the peril of nazi-ism will always be before us.

CALLS FOR PEACE THAT WILL LAST

And we have got to make, not merely a peace but a peace that will last, and a peace in which the larger nations will work absolutely in unison in preventing war by force. But the four of us have to be friends, conferring all the time—the basis of getting to know each other—"putting their feet on the table."

And so I am very hopeful that it can be done, because of the spirit that has been shown in the past in getting together for the winning of the war. But that is the spirit that we have learned so well in the last few years. It is something new, this close relationship, between the British Empire and the United States. This great friendship between the Russian people and the American people—that is new. Let's hang on to both friendships, and by spreading that spirit around the world, we may have a peaceful period for our grandchildren to grow up in.

All I can do is to wish you every possible success in this great task that you have undertaken. It will not be a final task, but at least it gives us something to build on, so that we can accomplish the one thing that humanity has been looking forward to for a great many hundreds of years.

It is good to see you. Good luck.

H. R. 5227

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES M. LaFOLLETTE
OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent to include a letter from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, in support of H. R. 5227 and an analysis of the provisions of that bill made by that organization:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., August 23, 1944.

Hon. CHARLES LaFOLLETTE,
House of Representatives,
United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I transmit herewith an analysis of H. R. 5227.

This bill was introduced by Mr. DINGELL at the request of the American Federation of Labor and has the full support of the railroad brotherhoods.

It embodies the amendments to the George bill, S. 2051, which I suggested to members of the Ways and Means Committee on August 17, 1944. The American Federation of Labor urges adoption of the bill in order to provide the consumers' buying power necessary for industries which will be reconverting during a period of increasing unemployment. The change-over of thirty millions of income-earning persons will lead to a serious depression unless emergency compensation payments are increased by the adoption of the A. F. of L. bill, which in conjunction with the efforts of industry should lead to real recovery.

The Congress of the United States cannot afford to leave any effort untried to escape a depression worse than that which followed the last war.

The American Federation of Labor bill provides the machinery necessary to lead us into a recovery and make possible full employment—the only goal that can compensate workers and soldiers for the war we are now waging.

Your careful consideration and support is earnestly requested.

Sincerely,

WM. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

[Enclosure.]

SUMMARY OF H. R. 5227

Section 101 declares the objectives of the act.

Section 102 establishes the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion, to be headed by a director at a salary of $15,000 a year. Included in the office would be the Office of Contract Settlement, the Surplus War Property Administration, and the Retraining and Reemployment Administration.

The Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion is authorized to formulate such plans as are necessary to meet the problems arising out of the transition from war to peace; to issue directives to other agencies; to make appropriate studies, reports, and recommendations to Congress; to consult and cooperate with governmental and private groups; and to employ personnel to carry out these activities. Reports are to be submitted to Congress quarterly, summarizing the work of the office and appraising the activities of the various executive agencies in the field of demobilization and post-war adjustment.

Section 103 creates an advisory board, appointed by the President, subject to Senate confirmation, consisting of three representatives of industry, three representatives of labor, three representatives of agriculture, and one public representative who is to be chairman. The board is to advise with the Director with respect to war mobilization and reconversion and make recommendations to him relating to legislation, policies, and procedures.

Section 104 establishes a special joint committee of the Senate and House on post-war adjustment. It is to be composed of four Members from each House, not more than two from each House being members of the majority party. The committee is to make a full and complete study with regard to legislation, demobilization, and post-war adjustment, consult with the President, the Director, and appropriate standing congressional committees, and study and review the report submitted by the Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion.

Section 201 directs Government contracting agencies to terminate prime contracts for war production whenever performance under such contracts will not be needed for the prosecution of the war. Such contracts are not to be continued merely for the purpose of providing business and employment unless continuance in whole or in part is necessary to avoid substantial injury to a plant or property.

Section 202 provides that curtailment of war production or termination of war contracts are to be managed so as to be integrated and synchronized with the expansion or resumption of other war or nonwar production. In order to effectuate this policy, Government contracting agencies are to report current and anticipated changes in requirements to the Chairman of the War Production Board. Government control agencies are to permit the expansion, resumption, or initiation of nonwar production whenever the war effort is not adversely affected; and the Chairman of the War Production Board is authorized to establish policies to be followed by Government contracting agencies in selecting individual contracts, or classes of contracts, for curtailment, nonrenewal, or termination.

Section 203 creates in the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion a Board of Appeals, to consist of three members to be appointed by the President, subject to Senate confirmation, each of whom is to receive $8,000 annually and serve 2 years. Persons aggrieved by the action of a Government control agency in allocating available materials may apply for a hearing before the Board of Appeals. If the Board of Appeals is satisfied that the action of the Government control agency substantially interferes with, or curtails the operations of, the appellant and that, as a result, serious unemployment of the appellant's employees will come about, or that the interests of the consumers of the appellant's products will be substantially impaired, the Board of Appeals will so report to the Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion, who will thereupon allocate sufficient of the short material to the appellant as will be necessary to prevent hardship to the appellant's employees, or to the consumers of his product.

Section 204 instructs the Attorney General to make surveys to determine whether any factor exists which may tend to eliminate competition, create a strengthened monopoly, injure small business, and otherwise promote undue concentration of economic power, either during the war or in the period of post-war transition. The Attorney General is to report to Congress on the results of his suveys and recommend such legislation as he deems desirable.

Section 301 sets out the objectives of title III, which are, basically, to facilitate the maximum utilization of the national manpower, both during the war and during the transition from war to peacetime production.

Section 302 creates a retraining and reemployment administration, to be headed by an administrator appointed by the President for 2 years, subject to Senate confirmation, who is to receive $12,000 annually. The administrator, under the direction of the director, is to establish a unified reemployment program, to maintain full information on declining and increasing employment opportunities, provide for placement of workers in employment and to oversee the financing of workers during such times as employment is not available. The issuance of regulations by the administrator to govern the activities of Federal agencies in these fields is authorized.

Section 303 creates an advisory committee for retraining and re-employment, consisting of representatives from 10 Government agencies mentioned by name, and such others as the administrator may designate.

Section 304 directs the War Production Board and other agencies in possession of such data to furnish to the administrator full information on current and projected schedules of production. The War and Navy Departments are instructed, insofar as military security permits, to keep the administrator informed on current and projected rates of discharge of servicemen. The policy is enunciated that the armed forces are to discharge servicemen as rapidly as war and defense needs permit. The retention of personnel in the armed forces merely for the purpose of preventing unemployment or awaiting opportunities for employment is prohibited.

Section 305 instructs the administrator to perform his duties through the facilities and personnel of other Government agencies and through appropriate State agencies.

Section 306 authorizes the Administrator to facilitate recruitment, transfer, and placement of workers by payment of transportation expenses to new jobs, or to bona fide residences (within the United States), or to both. The traveling allowance is limited to the amount provided by the Federal Government for its employees. The United States Employment Service will be continued as a nationally operated Service for a period of 2 years after the termination of hostilities.

Section 307 gives the Administrator general supervision and direction of the activities of Government agencies relating to the training and retraining of personnel released from war work. In consultation with appropriate Government agencies, he is to develop plans relating to training and retraining.

Section 308 provides that there is to be no amendment or modifications of powers now vested in the Veterans' Administration, or the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

Section 401 (a) and (b) fix the principle that a person for whom suitable employment cannot be secured is to be entitled, within the limits hereafter set forth, to interim placement benefits. Beginning with the fourth month after the enactment of the act, benefits would be paid to unemployed qualified employees in the amount of 75 percent of weekly wages, but such benefits are not to be less than $8 per week nor more than $20 per week for a single person, or $25 per week for a person with dependents. Benefits would be limited to 52 weeks in any 2 consecutive years.

Section 401 (c) provides that a person is not unemployed if he does not maintain an active application for employment at a public employment office; a man is not counted as being unemployed on Sunday unless it is in a continuous period of unemployment. Persons receiving annuities or pensions, unemployment allowances, vocational educational allowances, or similar benefits are not counted as unemployed, but if the interim placement benefit exceeds such other benefits, the amount of the excess may be paid to the individual.

Section 401 (d) provides that the employee is to be disqualified for the receipt of benefits if he fails without good cause to accept suitable work, or to report for work if he is so directed; if he is discharged or suspended for misconduct related to his employment; if he left work voluntarily without good cause; if his unemployment was due to stoppage of work because of a labor dispute other than lockout; or if he made or helped to make any false or fraudulent statement in order to cause benefits to be paid. The labor dispute disqualification does not apply if the employee who is unemployed is not directly interested in the dispute which causes the stoppage.

Section 401 (f) and (g) sets forth the standards of suitable employment in terms copied from the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Section 401 (h) provides that a person may not be compelled to apply for or accept transportation away from his present location, as provided in section 306.

Section 401 (i) provides penalties for making or causing to be made, or aiding in making false or fraudulent statements.

Section 402 (a) provides that a qualified employee is to be one who in the calendar year next preceding the beginning of the benefit year earned $150 or more in wages. This provision is identical with that of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Section 402 (b) requires the administrator to offer to each State unemployment compensation agency opportunity to participate in the administration of interim placement benefits. The administrator must permit such participation if the State agrees to receive claims for benefits, to adjudicate and pay them or forward them to the Treasury for payment and to furnish funds to the extent that benefits would be payable under the State law. The administrator may terminate on agreement with a State upon a finding by the Social Security Board, affirmed, if the State requests, by a court, that the State is failing substantially to comply with the agreement.

Section 402 (c) provides that the Railroad Retirement Board and the Unemployment Compensation Board of the District of Columbia are to participate in the administration of interim placement benefits.

Section 402 (d) authorizes the Administrator to use Federal agencies in the administration of interim placement benefits to whatever extent is necessary after the services of the State agencies and the Railroad Retirement Board have been used to the maximum practicable extent.

Section 402 (e) gives the claimants for benefits the right to be heard before a State appellate tribunal, where a State administers the benefits, or before a tribunal of a Federal agency, in cases where the Railroad Retirement Board or some other Federal agency administers the benefits.

Section 402 (f) authorizes Federal court review decisions of the agencies administering interim placement benefits.

Section 402 (g) limits review to the procedure prescribed in the bill.

Section 402 (h) provides for court review of a finding by the Social Security Board that the State is not complying with the terms of its agreement with the Administrator.

Section 402 (i) provides for the determination of the respective obligations of the Federal Government and the State agencies. The Federal Government is to pay for the cost of the benefits over and above the amounts payable under the State laws.

Section 402 (j) provides for the determination of the respective obligations of the District of Columbia, the Railroad Retirement Board, and the Federal Government.

Section 402 (k) provides for the payment by the Administrator of the extra expenses of the Railroad Retirement Board incurred by reason of its participation in the administration of interim placement benefits.

Section 403 authorizes the Administrator to delegate his authority to appropriate persons or agencies. So long as an agreement with a State agency is in effect, delegation of such authority to such agency may not be revoked or modified.

Section 404 confers general administrative powers on the Administrator, authorizes employment of personnel, authorizes securing of necessary information, and provides procedures if necessary information is refused by the persons having possession of it.

Section 405 amends the G. I. bill of rights by adding to the readjustment allowance under title V, an additional weekly allowance of $5 for each of not more than three dependents. Thus, the maximum weekly amount payable under Title V of the G. I. bill of rights would be $35. Dependents would include unmarried children under 18 or children of any age if because of mental defects they are incapable of self-support, wives, and parents incapable of self-support and dependent on the veteran. The limitation on readjustment allowances of 52 weeks is changed to an amount, in any 2 consecutive years, equal to 52 times the weekly benefit.

Section 501 authorizes the Federal Works Administrator to make, from funds appropriated for that purpose, loans or advances to the States and their subdivisions, to aid in the making of investigations and studies, surveys, designs, plans, specifications, or the like preliminary to the construction of public works funds appropriated for this purpose are to be allotted, 90 percent in the proportion which the population of each State bears to the total population of all the States, and 10 percent in accordance with the discretion of the Federal Works Administrator, except that no State may be allotted less than one-half of 1 percent of the total available funds. Advances are to be repaid if and when the construction of the public works so planned is undertaken.

Section 601 contains definitions. Most of these are routine. The following are important:

A week of unemployment is any 7 consecutive calendar days in which a person has remuneration of less than $3.

Dependents include unmarried children under 18 dependent on an individual, the wife of an individual dependent on him, and dependent parents incapable of self-support.

Employment means any service performed as a civilian after December 31, 1940, by an employee for his employer and includes civilian service outside of the United States for a United States war contractor by a person who was on September 16 a citizen of or resident in the United States. Governmental service and maritime service is also included. Excluded is service for a foreign government, domestic service, or service for a member of the person's family.

Weekly wages are defined as one-thirteenth of the wages in that quarter of the calendar year preceding the beginning of the benefit year in which wages were highest. This is the usual wage base under State compensation laws.

Section 602 authorizes the necessary appropriations.

Section 603 provides that the act except as otherwise specified becomes effective immediately and terminates 24 months after the termination of hostilities. Termination of hostilities means termination of hostilities of the wars in which the United States is now engaged as declared by a Presidential proclamation or concurrent resolution of the Congress.

Section 604 specifies that if any provision of the act is held invalid the remainder of the act is not to be affected.

Section 605 terminates the present Office of War Mobilization when the Director created by the act takes office, and transfers the records, property, and unexpended appropriations from the present Office of War Mobilization to the new Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion.

Section 606 continues the orders, policies, procedures, and directives prescribed by the present Director of War Mobilization until superseded by the new Director.

Section 607 specifies that no alien shall be employed in any capacity in the administration of this act unless he has served honorably in the armed forces of the United States.

Section 608 titles the act as the War Mobilization and Reconversion Act of 1944.

Recognition of Italy as a Full and Equal Ally

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VITO MARCANTONIO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a statement by Mr. Joseph Salerno, New England regional director of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, in support of the recognition of Italy as a full and equal ally:

The working people of Italian descent in America urge our country's recognition of Italy as a full and equal ally among the United Nations for total victory against the evil forces of Hitler and Mussolini.

Full recognition would inspire and encourage millions of Italians to take their proper place among the foes of nazi-ism, fascism, and reaction. The present policy of hit-and-miss support has caused disillusionment and humiliation, which hamper the destruction of fascism, and give comfort and aid to our common enemy.

We believe that Italy's status should be made clear by the United Nations, so there can be a real start toward reconstruction. Are we or are we not friends of the Italian people? For 2 years they have shown their friendship for us.

We suggested that Mussolini should be kicked out. He was kicked out. We advised breaking relations with the Nazis. Relations were broken. We hoped Italian troops would fight with our troops against the Axis.

Not only the troops, but the Italian people at home have been fighting on our side. Long before our troops arrived, the anti-Fascists of Milan, Turin, Bari, Genoa and other industrial cities in the north of Italy were fighting in the streets against the Nazis and Fascists. They are our real friends. What are we waiting for?

The Italians have been in a no-man's land—not knowing whether they were considered friends or enemies by our country. First, the rate of exchange for the Italian lire has been set at 100 to the $1. That makes the lire almost valueless. In contrast, the French franc was set at 50 francs to the $1. Why this difference in treatment?

The low rate of exchange for Italy has resulted in skyrocketing prices, which the workers have to pay for food and other necessities of life. Inflation has brought on black markets, which are forcing the cost of food even higher. Food is a weapon during the period of reconstruction to wipe out the last vestiges of fascism.

Recognition will help the Italian people to do their full share in the war of liberation to free the soil of Italy from Nazi tyranny. It will be a source of inspiration and encouragement for the Italian people to fight harder against the common enemy, and thereby spare the lives of thousands of United Nations soldiers who are now fighting on Italian soil.

A resolution introduced to Congress by Congressman VITO MARCANTONIO is now before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, requesting the President to establish friendly diplomatic relations with Italy.

In his resolution Congressman MARCANTONIO points out that the President has pledged the Italian people the right to a free and democratic government of their own choosing. The present Bonomi Government is composed of anti-Fascist and democratic forces, reflecting the will of the majority of the American people.

The resolution requests our President to recognize the present Italian Government and make Italy a full and equal ally, entitled to lend-lease and a proper role among the United Nations, as the means of releasing untold energies of both liberated and occupied areas of Italy, to give their fullest support to crushing the Axis.

Action is imperative. Delay works in favor of the enemies of democracy.

Congressional Review of Regulations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert an editorial from the trans-Atlantic edition of the London Daily Mail, of August 9, 1944, apropos a subject which we debated in the House on August 17:

THE NEGATION OF DEMOCRACY

Somebody forgot to lay three groups of regulations relating to the N. F. S. before Parliament. So they were printed, issued, and brought into force.

As Mr. Herbert Morrison explained, it was all a mistake, and, of course, it is accepted as such. It may well be that no individual has suffered and no harm been done.

But here is a first-class illustration of the dangers of delegated legislation.

It shows how easy it is for the people to be shackled by new laws without anybody being the wiser.

In such conditions the civil servant becomes the lawmaker and the lawgiver, and there is no check upon him. This is the negation of democracy.

Delegated legislation is defended on the score that the minister may always be called to account. What does that amount to?

In this case Mr. Morrison takes nominal responsibility but it is passed to the department, which has had a shake-up.

Tacoma and the Power Fight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY M. JACKSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, the following article by Senator HOMER T. BONE is an excellent history of the public power fight in the State of Washington. Senator BONE points out the invaluable aid rendered by my colleague, Congressman MAGNUSON, in this long struggle:

TACOMA AND THE POWER FIGHT
(By Senator HOMER T. BONE)

Up to 1908 Tacoma had for many years—in fact, practically from the beginning—in 1889 owned the city distribution system. It did not produce its own power, but bought power from the Baker outfit which had built and owned the Snoqualmie Falls hydro development. Subsequently the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. bought out the Baker-Snoqualmie plant. For several years prior to 1908 there had been agitation in Tacoma for the city to build its own generating plant. Stone and Webster interests fought this proposal bitterly, and the two leading papers in the city of Tacoma, the News and the Ledger, owned by Sam Perkins, were the most bitter enemies of this proposal. George Wright had been mayor of Tacoma about this time and was very active in promoting the building of a municipal generating plant on the Nisqually River, about 35 miles east of Tacoma. Many prominent citizens joined with Mayor Wright in urging this. Some of these men were prominent in the Tacoma Chamber of Commerce, which was badly split on the issue. Tacoma had never given Stone and Webster interests a franchise to serve domestic customers in Tacoma, and the city at all times maintained a monopoly of the domestic and commercial power load, the latter covering store lighting and the like. The private company, however, did have a franchise to serve industrial customers within the city limits.

In 1926 a charter revision commission was elected by the people of Tacoma for the purpose of revising the city charter. I was elected to that commission, receiving many thousands more votes than anyone else who had been a candidate, and without objection was made chairman of the charter revision commission. Naturally, I made every effort to see that the revised (and present) city charter which was the outgrowth of the work of this commission, contained suitable provisions respecting franchises for private utilities. I wrote, and had incorporated into the new charter, a provision authorizing a referendum on any franchise which might be granted a private utility. Shortly after the adoption of this charter, by vote of the people, the franchise of Stone and Webster to serve industrial customers expired and the city council refused to renew it. At that time the private company was only serving something like 30 customers in the city, and it surrendered these to the city. I recall that one big mill, which had a 10-year power contract with the private company, cut over to the city lines about this time, and saved $1,200 a month on its power bill, or $14,400 per year. One of the officers of the company told me this was more than the taxes they paid on their big plant. So much for that angle.

Proponents of the idea of the city generating its own power were successful in having the issue presented to the people in the November election in 1908. When this issue was squarely presented to the people of Tacoma for their vote, the News and the Ledger opened fire on the proposal, which was supported by the Tacoma Times (Scripps). As a youngster, I participated in this fight, making many speeches which, fortunately, have not been preserved, since they were examples of immaturity which would not have been of much use to students of oratory. What they lacked in polish and persuasiveness, they probably made up in vigor. At that time I saved every statement appearing in the Tacoma papers, and I have enshrined these in huge scrap books.

One of the arguments was that if the city built the Nisqually, 32,000-horsepower plant, it would prove to be a white elephant and the city would be glad to sell it for 50 cents on the dollar in a few years. Every friend of the Nisqually project was assailed in the papers as an enemy of decency and good government, and it was the bitterness of the attack, and the unfairness of the arguments, that there and then tied me to the power fight. Many of the articles opposing the project assailed the patriotism of those promoting it. A great number of the men who were fighting for this little Nisqually plant were sons of Union veterans, who had offered their lives in the struggle to preserve the Union, and it seemed to me a lousy and vicious argument to assail men of this type, especially since the arguments were in behalf of a private company whose only concern was to gouge all the profit it could out of the people. As a side light—and I would not care to be quoted on it, although you can make such use of it as you desire—you are free to call attention to the fact that I probably would never have been in the power fight if it had not been for these bitter and nasty arguments directed against the patriotism, honor, and decency of men who merely wanted to have Tacoma own its own generating system.

Tacoma built the little Nisqually plant and it was finished by 1912. Its transmission lines ran through the intervening countryside, which was dotted with many farms. These farmers figured they should have some of this cheap power that Tacoma was going to enjoy, so they came to the city council and said they wanted to form some farmer mutual power companies and build their own baby transmission lines to serve themselves, and asked for permission to put transformers on this high-tension line and to step down the current so it could be used on their farm systems. In 1911, 1 year before the Nisqually plant was finished, some of us went to the legislature of that year and secured the introduction of a bill which authorized cities owning their own power plants to sell surplus power outside their corporate limits. In the meantime, two or three communities of farmers south and east of Tacoma had organized cooperative mutual power companies, and they stood ready to buy power off the Tacoma heavy transmission lines. The Stone and Webster outfit, keenly aware of what this might mean, tried to block this bill in the legislature, but it passed.

The next session of the legislature, in 1913, witnessed a piece of manipulation which really started the State-wide power fight. A member of the house of representatives by the name of Heinly, a Tacoma lawyer, introduced a bill dealing with irrigation, and tucked away in this bill was a provision consisting of two lines which repealed a section of law, which happened to be the law allowing cities to sell surplus power outside. I talked with many members of the legislature subsequently to the passage of this irrigation act and found that all of them thought this repealer sentence had to do with irrigation law.

In the meantime, the former companies had organized, and were ready to do business, but when the Nisqually plant was finished, they found the right of Tacoma to sell off its transmission lines had been denied by repeal of the authorizing statute. Now the reason for this situation, in a legal sense, arose out of the fact that cities operate under express grants of law, and may not exercise any power unless it is specifically granted. In the absence of a specific grant of power to sell outside, the city attorney of Tacoma and the city council believed they could not lawfully put transformers on this Nisqually heavy-duty line and sell power off the line outside the corporate limits of Tacoma. So the farmer companies were compelled to bring their baby lines to the edge of the city limits under great expense and buy power within the corporate limits of Tacoma. It is interesting to note that at this time the private company was not serving this area at all, and would only agree to serve it in case the farmers were willing to pay up to 20 cents per kilowatt hour for current—an outrageous figure. The city of Tacoma was generous, and allowed at least one of these companies to put cross arms on the heavy transmission poles and string its wires underneath the heavy transmission cables to the city, so that it would bring its wires into the city limits. The city, which bought material at wholesale, was willing to sell these farmer companies wire and hardware at wholesale to help them get started. Within a few years, 7 or 8 of these farmer mutual companies were organized and doing business within Pierce County, a record not duplicated anywhere in the United States. The latest of these companies, and probably the largest of them, was the Peninsula Light Co., operating on the Gig Harbor Peninsula. I organized this company and represented it for a number of years before coming to the Senate. It started business in 1925. The rates of these farm companies were fixed by mutual members at prices as low, and sometimes lower, than those prevailing in the city of Tacoma. Tacoma was proving herself to be a good neighbor to the farmers who were purchasing a lot of stuff in Tacoma.

The Stone & Webster outfit threatened to enjoin the city against selling to the Peninsula Light Co. at Gig Harbor for the reasons I have noted. I assured the representatives of the private company that I would welcome a suit of that kind, and that if they brought such a suit I intended to organize all the farmers in Pierce County and march them to Olympia in a great demonstration, to inquire of the State authorities as to who owned the State of Washington—its people, or a Boston corporation. The private company refrained from filing an injunction suit, and the city of Tacoma put in a transformer at Springfield and proceeded to sell to the Peninsula Light Co.

As I recall it, the first of the bills to again reinstate the provision of the 1911 act authorizing the sales outside was introduced in the legislature about 1915. It failed. Such a proposal again failed in 1917, in 1919, and in 1921. In 1923 I determined to make one real fight of it in the legislature, and so I filed for the legislature in what was known as the "silk stocking" district of Tacoma, and was elected by an enormous majority to the house. In the session of 1923, I introduced what was known as the "Bone bill," which authorized cities to sell surplus power outside their corporate limits. By this time, and after many speeches by me and others on the question of power, the public power forces were pretty well organized. J. D. Ross, Kenneth Harlan, a relative of the late Justice Harlan of the Supreme Court; J. C. Unger, Charles Heighton, Fred Chamberlain, and others too numerous to mention, all banded together to force the issue. The bill was whipped in the legislature. Dissatisfied with this, I rewrote the provisions of the bill and prepared an initiative measure (No. 52) on which we secured, as I recall, around 80,000 signatures. It went on the ballot and was the subject of a bitter political fight in the general election of 1924. The power companies, according to most careful observations, spent an estimated $1,000,000 in the State fighting that bill.

In our State that became the era of the "canned editorial." All the power companies combined to fight the bill, and set up a propaganda bureau and prepared these canned editorials for the editors of weekly newspapers who were each given a full-page ad, which they could run at political rates, if they ran the editorial and the cartoon which accompanied it. I used a clipping service then, as I do now, and I recall clipping 100 editorials appearing on the same day in weekly newspapers, which were identical. Many editors told me personally that they had to eat regularly, and these full-page ads at political rates helped provide sustenance for the family of the editor and keep his youngsters in school.

The Bone bill was defeated by a 75,000 majority. In that campaign Charles Heighton accompanied me in a State-wide speaking tour with some very colorful experiences, which I have described to you in my looser moments. Arthur Cross, prominent lawyer of Aberdeen, joined in the fight, and many more prominent Grangers in the State took part. It was this fight which lined up the Grange solidly behind public power—a position from which it has never retreated.

It is interesting to go back to the prophecy made about Tacoma's Nisqually plant. From 1914 on, Tacoma provided the cheapest light and power rates in the United States as a result of its venture into the generating business. Today it stands No. 1 in the Union.

Seattle faced this problem in the step-by-step building of the great Skagit enterprise. When that great development is finished, it will be one of the outstanding producers of the country. When these plants are paid off, they will be an enormous asset of incalculable value to the cities owning them. Tacoma has long since paid off all the bonds of the Nisqually plant, and it has been an enormous producer of revenue. It laid the financial foundation for the great Cushman development and the later development of the Nisqually River which will raise the capacity of that river to 90,000 kilowatts.

After the defeat in 1924, the public power forces did not abandon the fight, but continued it. My own personal contribution was to leave my law business in Tacoma in 1925–26 and in subsequent years, and go about the State at frequent intervals, making speeches on the power question in order to solidify public power sentiment. In 1932, when the Democrats carried the State, I decided the time had come to settle this issue, and so I rewrote the old Bone bill, and took it down to Olympia, in December of 1932. This time, and in light of the New Deal victory, I decided we should abandon the stupid subterfuge raised in the proposal to allow the sale of surplus power, and make sales of power outside a public use. Cities engaged in the power business are regarded by repeated decisions of our Supreme Court as enterprisers engaged in a private business. Since the legislature can give cities such powers as it pleases, it was my view that the legislature could authorize cities to engage in public business outside their corporate limits. This meant that if a city was exhausting its potential power, it could condemn other power sites on the basis that they were for a public use. Otherwise, they would sometime have had to cut off outside users who were merely getting surplus power.

This principle of law is well understood by any lawyer familiar with municipal corporation law. The fight in the legislature was handled by a few stanch friends of public power—in the house, largely by WARREN MAGNUSON, a young lawyer who later became prosecuting attorney of King County, and subsequently a Member of the Congress of the United States, now candidate for the post of United States Senator.

Nearly every friend of public power went to Olympia to support the then Bone bill in its new dress. With the aid of the friends of public power, this bill passed, and the power companies promptly got out a referendum on it and held up its execution until 1934, when the people adopted it by a large majority.

In the meantime, and in 1929, the Washington State Grange officials came to me and asked me to prepare a power bill which would authorize farm communities to go into the power business. Three lawyers joined in this effort, i. e., Jim Bradford, former corporation counsel of Seattle, a very brilliant and able lawyer, and a judge who subsequently became a member of the State public service commission. The three of us prepared this bill, now known as the Grange Power Law. It was submitted to the legislature in the 1929 session by an initiative to the legislature. The terms of this bill are too well known to require comment. The legislature refused to pass it, and it went on the ballot in the general election of 1930 and was adopted and is now a law of the State. It was this bill which was amended by Paul Coughlin, Jack Cluck, Ed Henry, and others, into the form of a legal proposal now known as Referendum No. 25. Referendum No. 25 simply allows all utility districts to unite under certain conditions and acquire an entire power system.

In these early fights the Grange played a prominent part. Such old war horses as Fred Chamberlain, and the Nelson brothers, J. C. Unger, Kenneth Harlan, Arthur Cross, J. D. Ross, and many others participated. Senator Dill took part in the fight for the Bone bill in 1924, the Grange power fight of 1930, and the Bone bill fight of 1934. Senator Dill never backed away from any of these fights, but went headlong into them and the people of the State owe a debt of gratitude to him.

There was an organized body, small and determined, in Spokane, Walla Walla, and Yakima. "The Lady from Yakima"—Ina Williams, served in the legislature and poured her energies into these power fights up to the time of her unfortunate death. Ned Blythe, now postmaster at Vancouver, was another soldier. Cotterill of Kent led the fight in his section. The forces of public power were scattered, but determined. After 1932, the fight was out in the open, and many new faces and new forces have come into the picture. Public utility districts became a great factor and sent representatives to Washington to aid in securing passage of a northwest power bill, creating a new Columbia River Authority. You are familiar with the names of these enegetic workers.

This, in brief, is a sketchy outline of the long power fight in the State of Washington. All the pioneers in this fight cannot be mentioned for lack of space and lapse of memory.

I helped to frame the first direct primary law of our State back in 1907. I also participated in drafting the initiative and referendum laws of the State, and in these operations Fred Chamberlain took an active part. In 1919 the progressives of the State organized what was known as the Triple Alliance, made up of railway brotherhoods, American Federation of Labor and the Grange. Lucy Case and others were very active. These pioneers laid the foundation of the democratic system of our State. Some day someone will write a history of this period. The Triple Alliance was created to bring organized political support to progressive candidates on all tickets. It was not a political party.

No Alien Patents Sold

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, during the discussion of the surplus property bill, the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] offered an amendment concerning patents.

In the colloquy that followed I stated the Alien Property Custodian had already disposed of some of the patents and Mr. VOORHIS agreed he had. This morning I received a letter from the Chief of the Patents Division of the Office of the Alien Property Custodian. It shows both Mr. VOORHIS and myself were wrong when we agreed some patents had been sold. The letter as well as part of the report referred to follows:

OFFICE OF ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN,
Washington, August 23, 1944.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I noticed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 22, 1944, on pages 7201 and 7202, a discussion between you and Mr. VOORHIS concerning disposition of patents by the Alien Property Custodian. I was particularly interested in your statement, with which Mr. VOORHIS agreed, that the Alien Property Custodian has "already sold a lot of patents."

I am enclosing a copy of the annual report of this Office for the period from March 11, 1942, to June 30, 1943. I call your attention particularly to the discussion of the disposition of patents beginning at the bottom of page 73 of this report and to the statement on page 74 that "no patents are sold." This was a statement of the policy of the Office of Alien Property Custodian at the time of the annual report, and it continues to be the policy of this Office. The present policy for administration of patents on a basis of licensing rather than sale by this Office was outlined in general terms shortly after the appointment of Leo T. Crowley as Custodian. On April 27, 1942, Mr. Crowley testified before the Senate Committee on Patents:

"In order to secure the maximum utilization of patents which may come into our possession, we propose to make them freely available to American industry. We cannot, at this time, state exactly the terms under which they will be available. * * * In general, however, no patents will be sold at this time." (Hearings before the Committee on Patents, U. S. Senate, 77th Cong., 2d sess., on S. 2303 and S. 2491.)

We have followed a policy of issuing nonexclusive licenses to American citizens under seized enemy patents, and have now licensed more than 8,000 patents for use by American industry. In every case, title to the patent is retained by the Custodian.

Up to this time, except in rare instances, the Custodian has not even sold the stock of corporations which hold patents. One corporation which we sold has a few patents. Another American company, of which we sold 50 percent of the stock, owned certain patents, which, however, were already exclusively licensed to the American owner of the other 50 percent of the stock. The only disposition of patents actually vested by the Alien Property Custodian has been the transfer to an American individual of certain patents formerly owned by French nationals which he had a valid and outstanding option to buy, and the purchase price of which he paid to the Custodian.

I am sure that your statement in the RECORD was based on a misunderstanding of the facts, and I wish to give you a correct statement.

Sincerely yours,

HOWLAND H. SARGEANT,
Chief, Division of Patent Administration.

The treatment of patents by the Custodian differs markedly from the policies adopted with respect to other types of vested properties. The objectives to be accomplished, however, are the same. In the case of patents, as with other productive resources, the program adopted is designed to make the most effective utilization of these resources during the period of war and in the postwar economy within our system of private enterprise. The program is designed to bring into industrial use as quickly as possible those inventions and processes covered by vested patents and patent applications which will promote the prosecution of the war or contribute to the maintenance of our essential civilian economy, and to assure the widest possible use of the inventions and processes in the post-war economy. For reasons outlined below, it has been determined that these objectives can best be achieved by retaining title to all vested patents at least for the duration of the war. Hence, no patents are sold.

Patent rights unlike most other properties vested by the Custodian confer certain monopoly privileges on their owners. Moreover, in a great many instances the vested patents relate to basic techniques which have an important bearing on the current efficiency of production of a wide range of industries and a significant influence on the future development of new inventions. The widest possible use of inventions and processes covered by vested patents can be obtained by making them generally available to all American producers without charge. Exceptions are necessary in those instances in which existing rights of American citizens must be recognized and to protect the interest of nationals of enemy-occupied countries. Unrestricted use of patented processes by all who may wish to employ them does not create the problem of allocation which would arise if physical properties were to be made freely available.

Mission to China Is Getting Routine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that President Roosevelt is not interested in any legislative plan of reconversion that does not provide explicitly for the retention by him, through his bureaucratic agencies, of all the war powers heretofore delegated to him by the Congress.

What the President is now seeking is amendments to existing laws that will be susceptible of a statutory construction that will enable the President to exercise powers at variance with the purposes of the original legislation.

Whenever any official of the Government evolves a plan of reconversion that does not insure the perpetration of executive power over business, large and small, through his bureaucratic agencies, that official is shipped abroad or politically decapitated.

Under leave to extend, I include as a part of my remarks an editorial from the Courier-Journal, Louisville, Ky., under date of August 22, 1944:

MISSION TO CHINA IS GETTING ROUTINE

The President's action in uprooting Donald Nelson from his climactic labors of planning for reconversion and dispatching him to the limbo of China with what amounts to sealed orders stands today as one of the most baffling and disturbing of many recent baffling manifestations of administration policy. We are reminded inevitably that it was a vaguely grandiose mission to China to which HENRY WALLACE also was assigned just before the dubious activities that ended with his elimination at the Chicago convention, and we are led perforce to inquire whether China has not become a kind of handy cooling chamber for hot potatoes.

The fact remains that Mr. Nelson had become a hot number, standing as he did—and standing all but alone—for a program of reconversion that looked to systematic anticipation of cut-backs in war orders and gradual resumption of civilian production, beginning now. He set upon this, rather than to await the sudden sharp and dislocating wrench of change from war to peace and the unemployment and economic havoc that would result, even though more or less temporarily, from lack of preparation.

Opposed by procurement chiefs of Army and Navy and the War Manpower Commission, opposed within his own W. P. B. family by Vice Chairman Charles E. WHson, Mr. Nelson had just succeeded in establishing a series of orders which would permit use of surplus materials for manufacture of peacetime goods. The advantage which this plan would give to small operators, who as fabricators of parts and supplies for the large primary war contractors would be the first to be hit by sudden cut-backs, was obvious. Mr. Nelson had at least expressed a policy, enunciated a principle in which little business had begun to take hope for survival against post-war competition from the well heeled.

All at once with the ink hardly dry on the last of his orders Mr. Nelson is directed to go to China with Gen. Patrick J. Hurley to discuss "for several months" military and economic problems with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. Significantly the control of W. P. B. policy and action passes into the hands of Vice Chairman Wilson who had sided all along with the Army, Navy, and W. M. C. in the controversy; and we read that emerging from a White House conference Mr. Wilson let it be known that the President instructed him to bring "certain programs" up to schedule and to have no let-downs anywhere in war production.

The natural question arises whether the President has not once again undertaken to resolve a controversy by shifting the central figure of debate to another theater and thus to seek appeasement with fair words all around.

It is noteworthy that Democratic leaders in Congress generally so far have maintained a sort of bewildered silence, while on the other hand Republican Senators have moved in alertly to ask whether the shift will not cripple reconversion plans. With only half an eye it is easy to see the political implications of the affair and the likelihood that a campaign talking point has become available, which may be more than a minor one.

To be sure, we may hear the explanation that the President has been looking ahead to several things: (1) to impress upon the public the necessity of keeping its nose to the grindstone of war production; (2) to suggest the global implications of reconversion, something which Congress with its eye on mechanical details of the job has not considered; (3) to dally with prospects that an office of demobilization will be created, which will take over the entire job from W. P. B., anyhow; and perhaps (4) to strike the attitude that this is a matter of policy and method for congressional determination, which may have certain advantages in an hour when bureaucracy is a campaign battle cry.

We shall have to wait and listen for the answers, if any. However, the surface facts are unmistakable. For more than 2 years Mr. Nelson competently and effectively has marshalled and organized the Nation's materials for war production; and it seems that for the logical next step of reversing the process, there is nobody else quite so well fitted by experience, temperament, and a feeling for all the factors and interests involved. His job seems to lie here, not in China.

The New Civil Aeronautics Administrator

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, on August 22, 1944, the President concurrently announced the resignation of Charles I. Stanton as Civil Aeronautics Administrator and the appointment of Theodore P. Wright to succeed Mr. Stanton. It has also been announced that Mr. Stanton will remain with the Civil Aeronautics Administration as Chief Deputy Administrator and that he will devote the chief amount of his time to technical and operational problems, a field in which he already has extensive familiarity. Mr. Stanton is a career man. He has served the Civil Aeronautics Administration and preceding agencies with great distinction for 20 years. It is gratifying to all interested in aviation matters that Mr. Stanton will remain with the Civil Aeronautics Administration for they have an especial appreciation of and respect for his competence.

Mr. Theodore P. Wright, up to the time of his new appointment, was Director of the Aircraft Resources Control Office. I have received some inquiries concerning the experience and qualifications of the new administrator. I am not acquainted with him, personally, yet I know that he is a leading figure in American civil aviation and that he has had a broad experience in the international aspects of aviation.

As one member of the committee that handles appropriations for the Department of Commerce and its several agencies including the Civil Aeronautics Administration, I wish to acknowledge approval of the selection of Mr. Wright. I believe that it will contribute much of value to the critical future of aviation.

For the information of Members, I include in my remarks a brief biography of Theodore P. Wright, the new Administrator of Civil Aeronautics:

THEODORE PAUL WRIGHT

Theodore Paul Wright, born at Galesburg, Ill., May 25, 1895. Bachelor of science degree from Lombard College, Galesburg, Ill., 1915. Bachelor of science degree in architectural engineering from Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1918. Honorary doctor of science degree from Knox College, Galesburg, Ill., in recognition of his "distinguished services to aeronautics."

He was commissioned as ensign in the United States Naval Reserve Flying Corps in 1918, being promoted to lieutenant (junior grade) in 1919, and lieutenant in 1920. He was later appointed as an inspector of naval aircraft, and during his last year of service in 1921 was appointed superintendent of construction of naval aircraft for the New York district.

After leaving the Navy Mr. Wright entered the organization known at that time as the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Co., Inc., as executive engineer. He progressively held the positions of assistant factory manager, assistant chief engineer, and in 1925 was made chief engineer of the airplane division of the company. Under his supervision as chief engineer many famous designs were turned out. Among them were the prize-winning Pulitzer and Snyder cup racers and such famous military aircraft as the Hawk, Falcon, Helldiver, Shrike, and Condor; also such commercial types as the Robin, Fledgling, Kingbird, and Commercial Condor. These were followed by the sensational Tanager airplane, which won the Guggenheim safe aircraft competition for the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Co. Mr. Wright's paper, The Tanager—A Safe Airplane, won for him the Society of Automotive Engineers' coveted Wright Bros. medal.

During this time he inaugurated the "project engineer" system of aircraft design, development, and manufacture which has since become standard practice among practically all major aircraft manufacturers.

In 1931, after the merger which created the Curtiss-Wright Corporation, the Curtiss-Wright Corporation and the Curtiss experimental manufacturing and research activities at Garden City were consolidated with production plant at Buffalo. Mr. Wright was placed in charge of the combined operations as vice president and general manager. In 1937 he was elected a vice president of the parent Curtiss-Wright Corporation, to fill that post in addition to his duties as director of engineering.

In June 1940 Mr. Wright was called to Washington to serve with the Advisory Committee for the Council of National Defense in laying out a program which had in view the acceleration of the American aircraft industry. After some 6 months he returned to his duties with Curtiss-Wright. However, in February 1941 he was recalled at the request of Mr. Knudsen, now Lieutenant General Knudsen, to act as Assistant Chief of the Aircraft Branch of the Office of Production Management, later W. P. B. In March 1943 the former Aircraft Branch of the W. P. B. was reorganized and became the Aircraft Resources Control Office of the Aircraft Production Board, with Mr. Wright as Director.

AIRCRAFT RESOURCES CONTROL OFFICE

On December 9, 1942, the Aircraft Production Board was established within the War Production Board by order of Donald M. Nelson, Chairman, W. P. B. This Board consists of the Executive Vice Chairman of the War Production Board, who acts as Chairman of the Aircraft Production Board, the lieutenant general in charge of War Department production, the Assistant Chief of Air Staff for Matériel and Services, the Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, Navy Department, and the recorder of the Board. The Chairman, with the advice and assistance of the Board, is responsible for the central direction of aircraft production.

By order of the Aircraft Production Board, which order was signed by C. E. Wilson, Lt. Gen. William S. Knudsen, Maj. Gen. O. P. Echols, Rear Admiral Ralph E. Davison, and T. P. Wright, the Aircraft Resources Control Office (A. R. C. O.) was established on March 3, 1943. The functions of A. R. C. O. as listed in this order are: (a) to serve as executive agency of the Aircraft Production Board on all matters pertaining to manpower, materials, and machine tools for aircraft; (b) coordinate and publish joint schedules for the production of air frames, aircraft engines, and propellers; (c) prepare manpower, materials, and machine tools requirements for the aircraft program and serve as claimant agency under the controlled materials plan; (d) direct and supervise activities of the Aircraft Scheduling Unit, Dayton, Ohio, in the scheduling and allocating of materials, machine tools, and components; (e) coordinate aircraft materials conservation activities of A. A. F., Navy, and W. P. B.; (f) direct coordination of standardization; (g) prepare and furnish all statistics on the aircraft program.

Mr. Wright was appointed as Director of A. R. C. O. and recorder of the Aircraft Production Board and as such has responsibility for the direction of the entire United States aircraft production program. This job was referred to in an editorial in the Washington Times-Herald of April 6, 1942, as follows: "The most difficult and intricate job of procurement in all our war program is the airplane one. No group of men in human history ever had a greater responsibility than those who have undertaken it. They have the confidence of the aviation industry and of the soldiers and sailors who use the planes." This is the group which in 1941 was called on by the President to direct the procurement of 50,000 planes per year, a figure which many people referred to as a pipe dream or wishful thinking. Under Mr. Wright's direction this wishful thinking not only became a reality, but the original figure has now been far exceeded, in fact doubled.

Today the offices of A. R. C. O. are located in the Pentagon Building. There are approximately 75 civilian employees equally divided between the A. A. F. and Navy Bureau of Aeronautics. Mr. Wright's name appears on the A. A. F. organization chart as one of its two civilian division directors. He, however, is employed by the Navy Department. To complicate matters further, his orders are received from the Aircraft Production Board which is organizationally located in the War Production Board. It is particularly to his credit that Mr. Wright has made this arrangement work and has the confidence of all organizations involved, i. e., the A. A. F., Navy BuAer, and W. P. B.

As recorder of the Aircraft Production Board Mr. Wright also has supervision over the Aircraft Production Board staff which consists of some 20 W. P. B. employees and which will administer any new orders that may be issued to permit construction of civil aircraft.

Mr. Wright has contributed widely to the literature of aircraft manufacturing, engineering and design, including:

Factors Affecting the Cost of Airplanes, published in February 1936 in the Journal of the Aeronautical Sciences, in which the famous "80 percent production curve" principle was first expounded.

Speed—and Airplane Possibilities, a paper presented at the Aeronautical Meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science and published in the Journal of the Aeronautical Sciences in January 1937.

American Methods of Aircraft Production, a lecture delivered before the Royal Aeronautical Society in London during November 1938 and subsequently printed in the Journal of the Royal Aeronautical Society.

America's Answer—Gearing Our Aviation Industry to National Defense, published in Aviation magazine for June 1939.

Air Power, published in Aero Digest for December 1939.

Wings for Transportation, a lecture presented at the Franklin Institute in December 1939 and subsequently printed in its Journal and reprinted for the Archives of the Smithsonian Institute.

Winged Victory, published in Aviation magazine for April 1940.

The Truth About the National Defense Program, published in Aviation magazine for January 1941.

It should be noted that Mr. Wright's article, "The Truth About the National Defense Program" published in the January 1941 issue of "Aviation" won for that magazine the Industrial Marketing Award of Merit for the best article or editorial published in a business publication during the period of August 1, 1940, to July 31, 1941.

In addition to his writing he has earned high praise for his lectures, one of which was read before the Royal Aeronautical Society of London, and received this comment from the British press: "Is one of the most outstanding contributions the society has ever had the privilege of placing before its members."

In 1942, and again in 1943, Mr. Wright headed important missions to England in connection with aircraft affairs. Each trip to and from England was made by air. On both occasions he was received by King George, who, according to Mr. Wright, expressed keen interest in United States aircraft production, a subject upon which he was extremely well informed.

A partial list of organizations to which Mr. Wright belongs includes:

Member of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

Founder and charter member of the Institute of Aeronautical Sciences, serving as president in 1936.

Honorary fellow of the Royal Aeronautical Society of England.

Member of the Society of Automotive Engineers.

Member of the United States National Commission of the Permanent American Aeronautical Commission. (CAPA).

Member of the National Research Council.

Member of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Past president and chairman of the board of awards of the Guggenheim Medal Fund, Inc.

Treasury Department States Why It Is Opposed to Freezing Money Collected From Sale of Surplus Property

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the surplus property bill the House adopted an amendment submitted by Mr. HERTER, of Massachusetts, which provided all money received from the sale of surplus property should be used only to reduce the national debt. I discussed the amendment and agreed if that could be done it would be fine but warned it would be a mistake to place such a provision in the bill.

I learned the Treasury Department had written a letter on this subject to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Under the permission granted me I include the letter written by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

It follows:

AUGUST 9, 1944.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Further reference is made to your letter of May 25, 1944, requesting the views of the Treasury Department concerning H. R. 4822, a bill "to provide that all sums received by the United States from the liquidation of Government property be applied to the reduction of the public debt."

The proposed legislation would require that all sums received from the liquidation of Government property by any department, agency, or independent establishment in the executive branch of the Government or by any corporation owned or controlled by the United States "shall be covered and deposited in the Treasury to the credit of a special fund which shall be used exclusively for the reduction of the public debt and which shall not be considered in any manner as current income of the Government."

The Treasury Department recommends that the bill be not enacted.

The fundamental objection to the bill is that it would not and could not accomplish its apparent objective, i. e., to reduce the public debt below what it would be in the absence of its enactment. Except for variations in the amount of the balance in the general fund (which, in any event, is kept as low as is consistent with prudent finance), the public debt of the United States can be increased only by an excess of expenditures over receipts, and decreased only by an excess of receipts over expenditures. Receipts and expenditures, in turn, are determined by congressional legislation, including appropriation legislation, and (in the case of receipts) by economic conditions. Any action designed to reduce the amount of the public debt must, therefore, operate upon these fundamental factors.

Without such earmarking as the proposed legislation would require, the proceeds from the sale of surplus property will be covered into the Treasury, and will, therefore, result in a lesser increase in, or a greater reduction of, the public debt than would have occurred in their absence. During a period of debt reduction, therefore, the proposed legislation would not change the amount of reduction which would have occurred in any event, but would merely result in earmarking a portion of it—perhaps more than the whole amount—as arising from the disposition of surplus property. During a period of debt increase, on the other hand, the amount of any reduction in the debt effected by the fund would have to be reborrowed, in addition to borrowing a sufficient amount to finance the current deficit. Such a procedure would complicate and render more expensive the borrowing operations of the Treasury and might result in unnecessary disturbance to the money market.

The present accounting system of the United States is adequate to render such reports as Congress may desire with respect to the proceeds from the sale of surplus property and, consequently, of the debt reduction effected—or increase averted—by such means. The proposed legislation, therefore, would add nothing to the information now available with respect to the proceeds from surplus property sales, but would merely require an earmarking operation which would complicate, rather than simplify, the financial operations of the Government.

It should also be noted that the Treasury has extensive authority under existing provisions of law to enable it to make reductions in the public debt to the extent that funds are available for such purpose. Under the act of March 3, 1881, the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds. Under the provisions of the Victory Liberty Loan Act, as amended, and as supplemented by the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932 and the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, there was established a cumulative sinking fund for the retirement of the public debt issued under the First Liberty Bond Act and subsequent legislation. There is authorized to be appropriated each fiscal year out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the purpose of the cumulative sinking fund an amount equal to the sum (1) of 2½ percent of the aggregate amount of bonds and notes outstanding on July 1, 1920, less an amount equal to the par amount of any obligations of foreign governments held by the United States on July 1, 1920, and (2) the interest which would have been payable during the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made on the bonds and notes purchased, redeemed, or paid out of the sinking fund during such year or any previous years. These amounts are supplemented by certain additional amounts appropriated under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932 and the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933.

The annual appropriation now amounts to about $600,000,000 and the unexpended balance of appropriations now available in the cumulative sinking fund is nearly $5,000,000,000. In addition, funds received from repayments of loans made by the Public Works Administrator under the National Industrial Recovery Act, repayments on account of obligations of foreign governments held on July 1, 1920, and franchise taxes paid to the United States by Federal intermediate credit banks are available for the reduction of outstanding indebtedness. During the fiscal years 1920 to 1930, inclusive, the gross public debt was reduced from its peak of $26,597,000,000 on August 31, 1919, following the First World War, to $16,026,000,000 on December 31, 1930, under these provisions of the sinking fund and from amounts received from the other sources mentioned above.

In light of the growth in the amount of the outstanding public debt during recent years, especially the growth as a result of our current war activities, the Treasury anticipates that it will be desirable after the termination of the war to adopt an over-all policy with respect to debt reduction.

It is recommended, therefore, that no special legislation, such as that embodied in H. R. 4822, be enacted at this time and that consideration of plans for debt reduction be postponed for the time being. Later the Treasury will be prepared to recommend to the Congress general legislation with respect to this subject.

The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report to your committee.

Very truly yours,

D. W. BELL,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Treatment of Italian Military Prisoners

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent I extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

There has been much criticism lately of the manner in which the War Department is handling Italian military prisoners who have been formed into Italian service units. The Department has been criticized for "coddling" these units and accused of treating their members better than our own servicemen. I hold in my hand an editorial appearing in the Daily Press of Newport News, Va., concerning an investigation undertaken by the Braxton-Perkins Post of the American Legion. Not satisfied to seize upon idle gossip and rumor, this American Legion Post performed a commendable civic service in visiting the Italian service units in the Hampton Roads port of embarkation to determine the facts for themselves. Their findings, as outlined in the editorial, show these criticisms to be without foundation.

I am assured by the War Department that this is not an exceptional case but typical of conditions to be found in similiar units throughout the country.

ON CODDLING AND FACTS

The report of a committee from the Braxton-Perkins Post, American Legion, declaring without foundation reports that Italians held in this vicinity as prisoners of war have been coddled, should ease the public mind. The report is worthy of consideration as being the more conclusive because as a veterans' organization dedicated to the preservation of the national dignity, the American Legion might have been assumed, with good logic but with no reflection on its character, to have held some comprehensible bias.

The report was compiled after an investigation of Italian service units in the Hampton Roads port of embarkation. The fullest cooperation was accorded by the port of embarkation command. It reveals the Italian service unit members as volunteer workers in the American war effort. It found that some even sought to fight under the American flag, but that this is banned by international pacts so long as peace has not been concluded with Italy. And port of embarkation officers commented that since this area is in a group 1 manpower shortage status, the Italians are performing a real service to the American war effort by expediting the shipment of supplies to the combat zone.

The committee found that no special entertainment has been given these prisoners, and added that certain minor liberties contributed to their morale.

Insofar as the local sector is concerned, therefore, rumors of superlative or luxurious treatment for men who may have killed Americans in the fighting before Italy's surrender would seem to be fully rebutted by the Legion's investigation. It is laudable that the Legion was not content to take rumor at face value, but demanded the facts before acting. The fact that the Army command cooperated fully is indicative that the Army has nothing to conceal.

This, too, is another example of what may happen if one goes off half cocked regarding matters of policy. One or more organizations of good standing in this community openly condemned the alleged coddling of the Italian prisoners, but did so, apparently, without knowledge of all the facts. Criticism has been leveled also in other parts of the country. It is not unlikely an honest investigation there also would allay some groundless apprehensions. At all events, it is a wise policy to collect—and collate—evidence before sweeping charges are preferred.

The Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. President, the recent Democratic National Convention

at Chicago presents an interesting study in American politics. Mr. J. R. Bahne, of Eldora, Iowa, a life-long Democrat in Iowa and honored by his party by election as an alternate delegate at large from the State, viewed the convention from a ring-side seat and took part in the deliberations. Upon his return home he published his impressions and reviewed the proceedings. His analysis is crystal clear and highly interesting and entertaining to members of both parties.

Under leave to extend my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I include Mr. Bahne's entire story as it appeared in the Eldora (Iowa) Herald-Ledger of July 27, 1944:

COUNTRY EDITOR AT POLITICAL CONVENTION TELLS OF BOSS RULE

Just a few hodge-podge observations on the Democratic National Convention as observed by the publisher:

The Chicago Democratic Convention last week which resulted in the crucifixion of HENRY A. WALLACE on the altar of political expediency was definitely a boss-ruled proposition from the very first—but the bosses came very nearly being defeated in their determination to shelve WALLACE and nominate TRUMAN. Thursday evening, Chairman Hannegan and Boss Flynn were really scared and both of 'em looked the part. They looked like two whipped school kids—but it didn't take them long to recover.

The convention was adjourned that night against the vote of the delegates—those who were on the radio could clearly tell that, and someone didn't get much sleep that night, for on Friday the deal was settled.

NO FAVORS FOR IOWA

The Iowa delegation had a hard time getting enough tickets from the national committee to even have guest tickets for the few Iowans who wanted to attend. On Thursday the bosses were a little more secure in their position and gave out a few more tickets, but not until Friday could the Iowa managers get all the tickets they wanted.

An attempt to get music for the WALLACE demonstration Thursday evening was not granted for many minutes and then only because delegates from all parts of the floor demanded it. Yes, it was boss ruled, and WALLACE was clearly not supposed to get any of the breaks—and didn't.

It has been reported that the South was opposed to WALLACE, but many southern delegates would have been delighted with the chance to support him at even the slightest hint of a swing to his direction. Jim Farley could have turned the trick, but he did not seem inclined to do it.

DEMONSTRATION A FLOP

Mayor Kelly's demonstration for LUCAS on Friday morning was about the silliest procedure one could imagine. It was clearly staged, with all bands blaring out even before the demonstration got a start. Then came the parade of ward heelers—all entering through the back door—none of them delegates. They got as far as the speaker's rostrum and evidently got their signals mixed and the demonstration bogged down.

BOSSES' SMOOTH WORK

It was a smooth piece of boss strategy to have 13 candidates nominated for Vice President. Many of them had never been heard of outside their home States, and a large majority of the rest were not candidates. It was a move to keep WALLACE from getting the popular vote on the first ballot, and give the bosses time to get the thing fixed. Before the first ballot was finished this delegate got the word that if the swing to TRUMAN didn't get started before the second ballot was over, it was slated to come on the third.

It would appear certain that the President gave the bosses the go-ahead sign for TRUMAN, for the bosses moved ahead with a positiveness that bespoke Presidential approval.

COURAGEOUS SPEECH

The Vice President possibly didn't help his cause any in his seconding speech of Roosevelt, when he said, "the poll tax must go," but he made friends by his courageous expression. C. I. O. Labor Leader Hillman was not too popular a speaker before the convention. Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, threw the accusation of boss rule into the teeth of the leaders in his seconding speech for WALLACE and the delegates shouted their approval. Senator PEPPER spoke from the convention floor.

IOWA DELEGATION LOYAL

Justice Richard Mitchell, of Fort Dodge, nominated Mr. WALLACE in one of his finest and most eloquent speeches. Jake More did a good job as WALLACE's manager but from the first the cards were stacked against him. The Iowa delegation vote remained 20 for WALLACE. The Iowa delegation moved that the rules be suspended and the nomination be declared unanimous, but that motion was ruled out of order by Chairman Jackson. Chairman Jackson made an excellent chairman and kept things running in accordance with orders received. His job was to run the convention according to orders and from that angle he was a good boy.

WON FRIENDS

The consensus of opinion as expressed by commentators is that WALLACE came out of the convention a greater liberal and a more popular figure than when he entered the fight. One Ohio delegate told the writer that Iowans had little face to ask support for WALLACE when his own State failed to vote for him in 1940. What could be said except that he had done more for agriculture than any other living American?

Of course most conventions are boss ruled. Republicans need not take this admission of boss control as indicating that the Democratic Party is smeared by it. We can recall of but one Republican convention that was not boss run and that was in 1940 when Willkie defeated the bosses. That was what this writer hoped, and thought could be done, Thursday evening—but the hope died aborning.

WILL SUPPORT TICKET

Sure, we're supporting the Roosevelt-Truman ticket. Possibly it's a stronger ticket politically than had WALLACE been nominated; but we are still the kind of Democrat who believes that honest, faithful service deserves more than a kick in the pants.

TEXAS AIRED FIGHT

Two Texas delegations were seated by the convention with half the vote of the State, each. The anti-Roosevelt group had gained control of the State convention and had named an anti delegation. The pro-Roosevelt group held a rump State convention and named delegates to the national convention. Both delegations were in attendance and were heard by the credentials and resolutions committees before the fight was brought to the convention floor.

The antis demanded that a certain racial plank be inserted or they would bolt; the pros said they were going home to carry the State for the ticket no matter what happened to them. They accused the anti group of trying to wreck the party in Texas. When the pro group was seated, by voting down amendments to both the credential and resolutions committee reports by the convention, the antis bolted—for a day—and nothing was heard of them until the balloting for Vice President. The Texas delegation split its vote between TRUMAN and WALLACE.

Communist Drive in Democratic Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank R. Kent, from the Washington Star of August 23, 1944:

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS—KENT URGES INDEPENDENT VOTER TO STUDY COMMUNIST DRIVE IN DEMOCRATIC PARTY

(By Frank R. Kent)

One extraordinary phase of the fourth-term campaign is the intense solidity and earnestness of the Communist Party—or rather, what used to be the Communist Party.

It ought to concern American citizens generally to know the facts behind this earnestness. Because, as a result, already the complexion of one of the great parties of the country, the Democratic, has begun to change. The purpose is to make the change complete.

It will be recalled that, a good many months back, the Communist Party, as a party, deliberately went underground. Shaking off its party label, it emerged as the Communist Association, professing devotion to the American way of life.

That, of course, changed really nothing. It was so obvious a maneuver as to make the pretense absurd. It changed neither its leaders nor its line, its purposes nor its basic plans. It retained all these and, in addition, its party organ, the Daily Worker, through which party doctrine is channeled to the members.

COMMUNIST SENSE

No real secret of the reasons for the change was made. The Communist leaders in Moscow and in the United States very simply believe that Communist goals can be best promoted through the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt, and that Communists can promote his reelection better by working inside the so-called Democratic Party than outside as a separate party.

This is good sense from the Communist standpoint. Already, they control the American Labor Party in New York. The Communist leaders are in closest alliance with the Russian-born Sidney Hillman, who heads the powerful C. I. O. Political Action Committee, and Communists hold key positions on the executive committee of the C. I. O. which is closely linked with the White House and the most conspicuous sponsor and supporter of the fourth term.

Under the circumstances, abandonment of the separate Communist Party and wholesale Communist infiltration into the Democratic Party, from the Communist angle, is logical, desirable, and effective. For if their side wins in this election so entrenched will they have become that the Communists and the communistic C. I. O. not only will have acquired a real dominance in the Democratic Party but will have achieved a very great influence in the Government of the United States.

That such is the prospect will be strongly denied because frank acknowledgment would sit very badly, indeed, upon the collective stomach of the American people. Yet the Communists, the C. I. O. leaders and the administration strategists, individually and collectively, know these assertions to be true. Nor will they be doubted by anyone who does not deliberately shove realities aside.

Today the cold truth is that there is not a Communist in the country who is not lined up behind Mr. Roosevelt. But that is not the whole story. The Communists, en masse, have calculatingly moved into the Democratic Party with the purpose of taking it over. No one who reads current Communist literature in this country can possibly deny the truth of this statement.

Inside the Democratic Party, into which they have moved, these Communists do not operate as Democrats but as Communists. They maintain inside the Democratic camp their communistic solidarity, discipline, spirit, and purpose. They take ther gospel and their instructions, not from the Democratic National Committee, but from the Daily Worker, the Communist organ.

In brief, though, for campaign purposes this year, they now call themselves Democrats, for their own purposes they remain Communists as always.

This is made crystal clear in the "special election supplement" of the Daily Worker, issued about a month ago and now in the hands of every Communist in the country. This supplement is worth the perusal of every American citizen. Though nowhere in this remarkable document is the word Communist used; it establishes fully the truth of the charge that the Communists have gone into the Democratic Party with the idea of taking it over.

INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN

Detailed instructions are given to the members as to their conduct during the campaign. "The Democratic Party," they are told, "is not yet, as a whole, a people's party. It is a bourgeois party—albeit a liberal bourgeois party."

The clear inference is, that given time, this "liberal-bourgeois party will become wholly a party of the proletarians," and there follow minute instructions to the Communist members, now enrolled and registered as Democrats, as to how to bring this about.

They are told of the great desirability of becoming precinct captains within the Democratic organization; of the importance of capturing the "shop stewards" for practical political purposes; of the necessity for registration; of how to organize the women in trade-union circles into Democratic circles; and, particularly, of the necessity of nurturing the Negro vote, which, it is declared, easily may be decisive in Middle Western and Eastern States and which is now somewhat disaffected because of the Democratic platform.

Two things are heavily emphasized in this "special election supplement." One is that everything about the Republican Party is reactionary and wicked, but its particular wickedness is that it is not in accord with the Teheran agreement. The other is that the Teheran agreement is vitally connected with the Roosevelt reelection.

Though the Teheran agreement is mentioned a dozen times in this document, nowhere is there any elucidation as to what the Teheran agreement really is.

One cannot help but gather from the constant reiteration that, beyond any agreement made public after the conference, there was some "Teheran agreement" between the Messrs. Stalin and Roosevelt, with Mr. Churchill unenthusiastically acquiescing, that makes the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt, from the Stalin angle—and thus for the American Communists, now turned Democrats—very important indeed. And that the Republicans are not in accord with this Teheran agreement.

None of this makes Mr. Roosevelt exactly a Communist, but the facts ought to be interesting reading for independent voters, if any, nevertheless.

Congressman D. Lane Powers, of New Jersey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of an editorial which appeared in the Army and Navy Journal concerning the splendid record on military appropriations earned by my good friend, the able Representative from New Jersey, Mr. POWERS.

Those of us in the House who have long recognized the excellent work on the Appropriations Committee which LANE POWERS did in preparing for the prosecution of the war, are delighted to see that recognition has been given Mr. POWERS by the official magazine of the armed services. The editorial which appeared in the August 12 issue of the Army and Navy Journal follows:

If the Republicans elect a majority in the House of Representatives in the general elections this November, Representative D. LANE POWERS, Fourth District, New Jersey, will be chairman of the Subcommittee on War Department Appropriations. In the person of Congressman POWERS the Army has one of its best friends on Capitol Hill. A former World War No. 1 officer who came up from the ranks, Mr. POWERS understands thoroughly the Army and the Army's needs. He graduated from Pennsylvania Military College back in 1915 and because of his efforts for modernization of the Army during his period of service in Congress, Mr. POWERS was awarded, by his alma mater, the degree of Doctor of Military Science. When Mr. POWERS was elected to the House in 1932 he was appointed immediately, after Congress convened, to a post on the War Department Appropriations Committee. During the years served on the committee Mr. POWERS has fought consistently for modernization of the Army. In 1933–34 when Hitler's forces first started concentrating on mobility and fire-power, Mr. POWERS pioneered for the same concentration on behalf of the United States armed forces. The New Jerseyman's district includes Burlington County, in which Fort Dix is located. When Mr. POWERS first took office Dix was a practically abandoned World War No. 1 camp. Mr. POWERS recognized the strategic advantage of Dix for reception and staging work in event of an emergency. Due to his efforts with the Appropriations Committee, Dix was enlarged into a fort and was prepared for the important part it is now playing in the war effort. Many high ranking Army officers have publicly expressed their appreciation of the Representative's service to the Army through his work on the Appropriations Committee. He is known in Washington as a leading civilian expert on Army requirements and is called, by some of his colleagues, "the sponsor of our modern Army." Mr. POWERS' efforts in national defense have been recognized by Republicans and Democrats alike. They consider him so valuable that everyone is anxious for his continuance in office, irrespective of politics. As chairman of the War Department Appropriations Subcommittee, Mr. POWERS would bring to the office a wealth of knowledge and experience in military appropriations matters that is surpassed by no one in either civilian or military service in the entire county. His constituents should reelect him.

Reconversion and Employment in the Post-war Period

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, at the request of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] I ask that an editorial and an article published in the August 19, 1944, issue of America be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO PEA SHOOTER WANTED

What kind of reconversion bill will eventually come from the Senate, we do not venture to predict. As we go to press, the parliamentary position of the original George and Kilgore-Truman-Murray bills has become so tangled that many of the Senators are probably as confused as the newspaper-reading public and the reporters covering the debate. As America's Washington correspondent, Charles Lucey, reports elsewhere in this issue, the liberal approach sponsored by Senators MURRAY and KILGORE seems to be losing ground to the conservative approach advanced by Senator GEORGE and favored by a Republican-Southern Democrat coalition. Probably a compromise will be effected.

On the surface, the issue seems very simple; it boils down to a fundamental difference of opinion over the merits of a State unemployment-insurance system to handle industrial demobilization following the war as opposed to a combined Federal-State set-up. Senator GEORGE proposes to deal with the situation by adding two amendments to the Social Security Act. The first would provide for dismissed Federal civilian workers by granting them coverage under the present State unemployment systems, the cost to be borne by the Federal Government. The second would establish a Federal fund from which the States might borrow when their unemployment reserves prove inadequate for the post-war job.

The Kilgore-Truman-Murray bill advocates an entirely new program which establishes uniform standards of unemployment-insurance benefits for the whole country and a special retraining program for demobilized workers and soldiers. Under the provisions of the bill, unemployment benefits would range from $20 a week to a maximum of $35, depending on the worker's pay in a base year and the number of his dependents. The difference between the State rates and the uniform Federal rates would come from the Federal Treasury. The States, however, would administer the program with their existing machinery.

While some of the Senators opposing this plan in the names of States' rights are undoubtedly sincere, the suspicion exists, and is well founded, that the States' rights issue has been raised to cloak political and economic objections to the Murray-Kilgore approach to the post-war problem. On the political side, uniform unemployment benefits might seriously disturb a social order which most southern Senators are sworn to uphold. As for the Republicans, they now control 26 States and stand to gain politically if recipients of unemployment insurance are beholden solely to them and not to the Federal Government as well.

The economic issue is also uppermost in their minds. The southern Democrat-Republican coalition works under the assumption that the best way to solve the post-war employment problem is to give private enterprise a free hand. Senators KILGORE and MURRAY, on the other hand, accept the thesis that the crisis will be of such magnitude that it cannot be handled without special emergency assistance from the Government. This difference in aproach is evident from the language of the bills themselves. The announced purpose of the George bill is simply "to amend the Social Security Act." The objective of the Kilgore-Truman-Murray bill is, among other things, "to insure the fullest possible employment in private industry during the period of transition to civilian production after the cessation of hostilities and thereafter." Hence the relative high unemployment benefits, which are designed not merely to provide something more than bare subsistence to the industrially demobilized and their families, but to sustain purchasing power and provide a market which will be an incentive to private industry to produce at capacity and as soon as possible.

No doubt some of the provisions of the Kilgore-Truman-Murray bill need to be carefully scrutinized and perhaps rewritten. In the main, however, the bill is sound and realistic. In comparison, the George bill is an attempt to stop a panzer attack with a pea shooter.

FULL EMPLOYMENT: THE POST-WAR SCENE

(By Joseph P. McMurray)

We have seen that by harnessing the power of our growing labor force and utilizing the technical advances that are being made, we can easily produce a national income in 1950 of $125,000,000,000, measured in 1939 prices; or, if measured in 1943 prices, a national income surpassing the phenomenal production record of last year by approximately $9,000,000,000. This offers a basis for both optimism and pessimist. The optimists see in it an opportunity finally to achieve freedom from want without in any way interfering with, or diminishing, the income of the more prosperous sections of our population. The pessimists, realizing that much higher levels of production can be achieved after the war with the same number or fewer workers than before the war, fear lest the increased supply of workers will be added to those formerly unemployed, creating a volume of unemployment far beyond that we eve experienced.

Because our democratic society cannot survive another period of deep depression, and because high production and full employment offer opportunity for the fuller development of the human personality, we must not look backward longingly to what we believed were the golden days of the twenties, or with fear to the depression days of the thirties. Instead we must look forward with determination and become pioneers—this time to open the new economic frontier of full employment.

But a real national income of $125,000,000,000 (in 1939 prices) must not be thought of as a ceiling to income, nor is 1950 presumed to be a peak year in our post-war economy. In a dynamic economy such as ours, national output must rise several billions each year to provide continued full employment.

ROLES OF GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS

Full employment is not maintained except by constant vigilance on the part of government. Private enterprise, no matter how virile, cannot by itself maintain the rather sensitive balance between savings and investment by which full employment without speculative excess is maintained. For this is not a function of business. Business enterprise serves the high function of bringing the productive resources of the country into coordinated activity to meet demand for goods and services.

In the process, business firms expend their own and borrowed funds for new plant and equipment in ever-varying amounts. One new product or one new method may require a large volume of new construction; another may actually decrease the existing volume by replacing a unit which wears out—or becomes obsolete—with a more efficient but simpler one. The development of a network of railroads, or of a spiderweb of roads dotted with filling stations and tourist camps, may bring a swell of construction activity lasting for a decade or for a generation, but between such spurts there may be quiescent periods when technical progress goes steadily on without great increase in the volume of material equipment.

Private enterprise must construct new equipment when and as it is needed to improve the processes of production and to meet demand. If the businessman has organized production efficiently to meet demand as it faces him, and if he has refrained from monopolistic practices which would give him an undue return for that production, he has done his part.

Certainly, if our enterprise system is to continue to exist, investment by private business must furnish, year by year, decade by decade, a large volume of expenditures, thereby putting savings to use and maintaining the level of employment. That this investment shall of itself be just large enough at all times but never too large to maintain full employment is too much to hope for or to demand. In any given year, or even throughout any given decade, the flow of private investment may be too large or too small in relation to savings. To maintain full employment, public policy must act as a compensating factor.

In the past, governments have neglected this function. In the same year that every farmer was building a new barn, when private residential and commercial construction was straining our productive capacities—at just these times of high demand, our Federal, State, and local governments instituted their own public-works programs. They were optimistic when the public was optimistic, and pessimistic when business was at a standstill. In the long run, by influencing the volume of savings of individuals and of businesses, by providing conditions which will stimulate business expansion, by furnishing public outlets for idle private funds, government may help to be a stabilizer. Business, even though it performs efficiently its own productive function, must cooperate with government to preserve the balance which assures business prosperity.

TECHNOLOGY NOT ENOUGH

Technological progress alone will not guarantee prosperity. Inventions have made possible the ever-increasing potential of our national output, but neither in the short run nor in the long run do they guarantee that this potential will be realized. A new invention may make whole industries obsolete and render useless the skills of 100,000 laborers, while the new method itself may employ only a fraction of this number. Or—like the automobile industry, which displaced the carriage and harness industries—it may give rise both directly and indirectly to employment many times these previous levels.

Theorists of an older generation believed that purchasing power destroyed in one sector by technological change sprang up inevitably in another and thus preserved the level of employment. We know now that new processes may have the net effect of increasing or of decreasing employment. There is no single force guaranteeing that an invention will create a demand for labor equal to that which it destroys. The Government must assume the responsibility of seeing to it that productive employment is made available to all displaced workers. Only then will the technological advance have its fruition in an increased output of goods and services, matched by increased purchasing power.

But it cannot be assumed that higher public expenditures alone will eliminate unemployment. Those expenditures must, for example, be applied so as to complement and not curtail private investment; and public policy must insure that added demand, as it is created, will swell employment. Unless an effective antimonopoly policy is pursued, added demand may be absorbed by higher prices and by higher income for small groups in especially advantageous positions, and unemployment may continue.

Even the maintenance of full employment does not assure attainment of the level of living which we might achieve. For full employment is not identical with fullest use of our productive energies. Even though we maintain what we call full employment, real national income in 1950 will be the smaller by some $4,000,000,000 because of time lost through accidents, illness, strikes, transitional unemployment, and the like. Much of this loss could be prevented by wise social policy. Every year we waste productive ability through "under employment"—the use of only part of a man's abilities, because he cannot find the more productive job for which he is trained. Perhaps he cannot risk moving to search for it, or is kept from it by discriminatory hiring practices whch have nothing to do with ability.

An even more important source of loss is our failure to develop the potential abilities of some of the Nation's present and future workers. On our small farms live perhaps 2,000,000 persons, working with inadequate information and equipment, who could produce more effectively if the excellent work of the Farm Security Administration could be expanded so as to give these underprivileged farmers the same chance to rise from poverty by production as it has to others. Negroes suffer from underemployment and lack of opportunity for training. When a person who might be a salesman works as a messenger, or when a man whose capacities would fit him to be an accountant or a lawyer works as a clerk, not only is his income held down, but society at large suffers the loss of a valuable human resource.

In other ways, too, we bar ourselves from higher levels of living. By restricting our imports, we prevent other countries from buying the products of our special industrial talents and thereby lessen the output of our most efficient industries, which pay the highest incomes.

SOCIAL WELFARE FACTORS

Maintaining full and efficient employment solves many problems, but by itself it does not solve all social problems. It does not, for example, lead automatically to conservation of our natural resources, and to their development for the benefit of future generations. It will not in itself chasten monopoly. It will not bring education or medical care within the grasp of all people, or provide security for the aged or the unfortunate. Because the training and development which make for economic success are not equally available to all, it will not result in the most desirable distribution among the population of the material comforts of life.

We are often reminded: "Ye have the poor always with you." Perhaps we must always have the poor in the sense that some of the population—cripples, orphans, the [illegible]nd—will have to be supported; but this does not mean we must always have poverty, want, and destitution. Poor health, low productive ability, and poverty are all part of the same vicious circle. A glance at the history of the last three centuries tells us that this circle can be broken.

In a full-employment post-war economy, the national income will be great enough so that without unduly burdening anyone a share may be diverted to enlarged social-welfare services—including public expenditures for needed medical services, improved housing, and extended education. The cost to society of any program attacking the problem of poverty at its roots will be more than offset by the eventual increase in productivity on the part of those aided, not to mention the savings in dollars and tears which will accrue to society from a reduction in the evils created by poverty.

Promoting a more equal distribution of welfare does not mean destroying a system which encourages initiative and enterprise by a system of rewards. Quite the opposite. The provision of health and education does not check initiative, nor induce satisfaction with minimum levels. Nor need the provision of a system of social security for all dull incentive, if properly administered. It is not the person with health and education who lacks ambition. Rather it is the man without training and physical well being who lives without hope and ambition.

Measures of social welfare would serve the dual purpose of increasing our future productivity and bolstering employment when private investment is inadequate.

CONCLUSIONS

Attaining the high income for which we have the manpower, the resources, and the skills will not solve these social problems, but it will facilitate their solution. Prosperity in itself lessens the problems of poverty and of social insecurity. It provides a high national income out of which a share may be devoted to caring for the unfortunate, and to conserving and developing our natural resources, reconstructing our transportation system and rebuilding our cities. High demand for labor draws individuals from unproductive occupations to others which use their capacities to a fuller extent. When income is high and employment is secure, there is less temptation for one State to erect barriers against the trade of another, for labor organizations to adopt restrictive practices. There is less pressure for the Nation to adopt trade barriers which, by reducing our imports, curtail our exports and lower our level of living. Moreover, a prosperous America buys from the rest of the world large quantities of goods supplementary to those she produces. Prosperity in the United States, therefore, will stimulate prosperity elsewhere and make easier the task of world reconstruction. We need not choose between our responsibilities to the world and to ourselves. International and domestic reconstruction go hand in hand, each bolstering the other.

Achieving and maintaining full employment and high production is not merely an economic problem. It has become largely a political one of altering our institutional machinery in such a way as not to hinder, but to facilitate, high production and consumption without sacrificing our freedoms in the process. Ability to establish full employment may well be the final test for democracy.

The Victory Ship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein an article on the Victory ship from the American Marine News of August 17, 1944, No. 13, entitled "Victory Ship Wins High Praise After 26,000-Mile Trip."

This ship has been built with an eye directed to post-war competitive commerce in the post-war world, and was subjected to thorough inspection and given high praise by Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger and his staff when the vessel reached Hollandia.

The article is as follows:

VICTORY SHIP WINS HIGH PRAISE AFTER 26,000 MILE TRIP—GENERAL LAUDS VESSEL AT NEW GUINEA CALL; SHIP EXCEEDS PLANS

Voyage reports from the first Victory ship to complete a lengthy trip show conclusively that this new class of fast wartime cargo vessels built with an eye for post-war competitive commerce will live up to and surpass highest expectations, according to the American Merchant Marine Institute.

The Poland Victory recently completed a 26,000-mile odyssey. She was the first Victory ship to pass through the Panama Canal and first to reach the Atlantic seaboard.

Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger, in command of United States troops in the New Guinea sector, boarded the vessel with his staff when she reached Hollandia. He made a thorough inspection and was high in his praise for the vessel's design and accomplishments. The Poland Victory took 3½ months for her voyage which was equivalent to encircling the globe.

Capt. Leonard Duks, the Poland Victory's master, echoed General Eichelberger's praise for the new ship. Captain Duks, of San Francisco, is a veteran of 28 years at sea, having sailed on every type of vessel, including square-riggers. Of his new command's performance, he said:

"The Poland Victory fulfills every promise that was made for this type of ship even when it was in the blueprint state. If ever a ship was suitable for post-war cargo-carrying operations that is equal to this one, which is second to none and equal to the finest, I have yet to hear of or see it.

"This vessel is not only speedy but economical of operation. Even now I can see how satisfying it will be in post-war days to be able to guarantee quick delivery of our bills of lading. If this Victory ship is a forerunner of what is to come there never need be any cause for worry about the future of the American merchant marine."

To date 520 Victory ships have been contracted for in comparison to the 2,680 Liberty ships scheduled to be built. In order to have greater speed and still transport the same cargo tonnage as the older Liberty, the new Victory was given more than twice the horsepower as well as slightly greater beam and length. The Victory ship's increased speed makes for a vessel of much superior quality for both wartime service and post-war operations.

Captain Duks' praise was seconded by members of the engine room and by deck officers on the Poland Victory. Although the vessel encountered bad storms and heavy weather in the wake of a hurricane, her flared hull knifed through the waves and let only spray come aboard. She pitched considerably, they reported, but vibration and rolling were negligible.

The first 33 Victory ships have been named after the various United Nations. The next 100 bear the names of representative American communities.

The Truth About the Political Action Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VITO MARCANTONIO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a signed article by Mr. Sidney Hillman on the Political Action Committee which appeared in the New Republic of August 21, 1944:

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE

So many statements concerning the C. I. O. political action committee and the National Citizens' political action committee have recently appeared in print—some correct and some incorrect, some friendly and some hostile—that it may not be amiss to set down some of the fundamental facts about these two organizations.

The C. I. O.-P. A. C. was organized in July 1943 by the Congress of Industrial Organizations for the primary purpose of arousing the working men and women of America to a sense of their own responsibility as citizens of this Nation and, in a broader sense, as citizens of a free world. What really started the C. I. O.-P. A. C. happened the year before the organization came into being. The congressional elections held in November 1942 gave clear evidence that a powerful reactionary trend had set in, which, if it continued through 1944 might well reverse all the progress of recent years and render this Nation incapable of making its indispensable contribution toward the eventual establishment of lasting peace. One could not help but recall the congressional elections of 1918, in which Woodrow Wilson lost control of both Houses of Congress, and with it a large measure of his prestige. One could not help but remember the dire consequences both at home and abroad.

Whereas Woodrow Wilson actually lost majority control to the Republican opposition in 1918, the 1942 elections left President Roosevelt with a reduced but still substantial Democratic majority in the Senate and a bare majority in the House. But this distinction was illusory. Actually, through the unholy alliance of obstructionist Republicans and reactionary Democrats, a coalition had come into power which was determined not merely to block any further progressive legislation, but to undermine where possible the whole structure of New Deal reform.

Did this mean that the American people had changed its mind? Did the dramatic change in Congress reflect a conservative trend on the part of a majority of the population? We thought not. We thought not, because an analysis of the vote cast in the 1942 election clearly showed what had happened.

Only a little more than 28,000,000 American citizens had cast their ballots in these elections, as against 49,800,000 in 1940. Almost 22,000,000 Americans who had voted in the Presidential year had failed to go to the polls 2 years later. The percentage of those who failed to vote was highest among the normally progressive groups of the population and lowest among those population groups which are normally conservative. The inference was clear. The forces of reaction were organized for political action; the progressive forces were not organized.

That is why the C. I. O.-P. A. C. was born 1 year later.

The funds for the C. I. O.-P. A. C. were supplied by the C. I. O. and a number of its major affiliated unions. To be exact, the sum of $669,764.11 was contributed. Of this amount approximately $400,000 was spent up to the time of the Democratic National Convention. No disbursements have been made from these funds since the Democratic convention, except in local primary elections, and none will be made until after the election. This decision was reached in order to eliminate any possible question of violating the Smith-Connally Act.

What did the C. I. O.-P. A. C. do up to the time of the Democratic convention, and what will it do during and after the campaign?

First of all, the C. I. O.-P. A. C. put on a Nation-wide drive to register the vote; it embarked upon an educational campaign among the workers to show them why they had a duty as citizens to exercise their franchise; why this year it was more than ever important for them to do so; and how they could help to organize themselves and other progressives outside of the labor movement for effective political action. This campaign was carried on in the labor press, by means of pamphlets distributed in large quantities, and—when it was possible to obtain time—over the radio.

Second, the C. I. O.-P. A. C. endeavored to mobilize the progressive vote in certain important primary elections throughout the Nation, in order to help unseat outstanding reactionary incumbents seeking renomination and to assist outstanding progressive candidates to obtain their party's nomination. Such activity is permissible under the law, since the Smith-Connally Act does not apply to primary contests. The C. I. O.-P. A. C. was active in the primary contests for nomination in both parties. It does not claim to have brought about the nomination or the defeat of a single candidate. It does claim to have contributed important support to the already existinging progressive forces in many States—perhaps decisive support in a few instances. By and large, these efforts were more successful in the Democratic primaries than in those of the Republican Party. This is undoubtedly due to the fact that in the Democratic primaries the C. I. O.-P. A. C. was working with the prevailing trend, which has already taken a considerable toll of outstanding reactionaries and isolationists, whereas in the Republican primaries it was working against the pronounced nationalist and reactionary trend which fully manifested itself in the repudiation of Willkie and in the recapture of the Republican leadership by Herbert Hoover and the Old Guard.

Actual money contributions played but a small part in this undertaking. Under the Hatch Act, $5,000 is the maximum amount which any individual or group may contribute to any one candidate's campaign. There were not many instances where even that amount was contributed. But there were many instances where the voluntary organized efforts of P. A. C. workers were able to accomplish wonders in bringing out the vote. In most parts of the country that is all we have to do in order to insure a progressive victory. The majority of American citizens—and certainly the vast majority of industrial workers—are progressive voters by nature. They do not as a rule need to be told to vote for progressive candidates; they do need to be provided with the facts and the records of the candidates; and they do need to be provided with channels of organization by means of which to make their opinions effective. They need also to be reassured that it actually lies within their power to elect the cindidates whom they prefer, and that it is their own responsibility to see that the latent progressive majority becomes an articulate majority.

That is the job the C. I. O.-P. A. C. set out to do among the industrial workers; and that is the job which the N. C.-P. A. C. has now undertaken to do among the population as a whole.

Since the decision was reached not to use union funds in the electoral campaign itself, once the party candidates were nominated, the C. I. O.-P. A. C. is now putting on a drive for voluntary contributions from individual members of labor organizations throughout the country. Similarly, the N. C.-P. A. C. is putting on a drive for voluntary contributions from individuals in every rank of life and in every section of the country. These funds will be used to carry on the effort to bring out the vote, to reelect President Roosevelt and to elect a progressive Congress.

It is too early to say what measure of success will attend these two fund-raising campaigns. But it is not too early to say that a great deal of nonsense has been written about the "gigantic slush funds" which are said to be at the disposal of these two organizations. Quite frequently a figure of $6,000,000 has been mentioned. The only element of reality about this figure is that the law would not permit the two organizations to spend more than $3,000,000 each or $6,000,000 together. Our goal is not nearly so ambitious as that. We hope the N. C. P. A. C. will raise $1,500,000. I wish I could say that the drive had already produced half that amount. Actually, the effort has only just begun.

We shall undoubtedly fall far short of raising the amount of money which will be spent by the organized forces of reaction. There is no doubt that they have the dollars, but I believe that events will prove that we have the votes. In 1940, $16,000,000 of Republican money was not enough to elect a moderately progressive Republican candidate, because the people instinctively recognized that, in spite of Wendell Willkie, the reactionary "old guard" still controlled the party. In 1944 no instinctual intelligence is required; normal eyesight is all anyone needs to recognize the starched Hoover collar on the Republican candidate.

The response we have had so far to the membership drive in the National Citizens' Political Action Committee is most encouraging. Already it is clear that, so far at least as this election is concerned, farmers, publishers, educators, writers, and progressives from every part of the country and from every occupation are ready and eager to unite with the industrial workers in order to reelect the President and to elect a Congress which will responsibly and loyally support progressive policies at home and abroad.

The N. C.-P. A. C. is committed to Roosevelt and Truman against Dewey and Bricker. Beyond that it has no partisan commitments whatsoever. It will support for election to Congress those men and women who, irrespective of party affiliation, seem best qualified to represent this Nation in the critical times which lie ahead. It will support those candidates who have shown that they believe in the principles set forth in President Roosevelt's economic bill of rights, who have shown that they understand that our domestic problems and our foreign problems are opposite sides of the same coin, and that neither can be solved at the expense of the other. It will support those candidates who, in the words of Thomas Jefferson, "have confidence in the people, cherish them and consider them the wise repository of the public interest." It will oppose those candidates who openly repudiate these ideals, or who render lip service to them in order to conceal their opposition.

At first some of the conservative newspapers made fun of us. It was alleged that our support actually hurt the candidates whom we were endeavoring to help. Then suddenly it was claimed that we were the dominant influence in the Democratic Party. And after HENRY WALLACE was defeated for renomination it was said that we were finished. Two weeks later we were again supposed to be very much alive and to have been responsible for the defeat of an outstanding isolationist. We are supposed to be at the same time trying to capture the Democratic Party and starting a third party. We are described as the President's greatest asset one day, and as his greatest liability the next. Most of all, the ultraconservative commentators have worried about what they call the P. A. C. ideology.

This ideology is neither a mystery nor a closely guarded secret. It is clearly stated in the P. A. C. program, which was adopted last May and which was officially presented to the resolutions committees of both the Republican and Democratic Parties. This program is both a statement of principles and a concrete plan of action. It rests upon the belief that we can and must find a way so to utilize the vast spiritual and material resources of this Nation that every American who is reasonably industrious and prudent may enjoy at least the minimum elements of a good life—that is, adequate housing, food, clothing, medical care, education, recreation, and an opportunity for advancement. It rests upon the belief that too many Americans have died and are dying in foreign lands in defense of democracy for us any longer to permit democracy to be betrayed here at home by social or economic barriers erected against anyone by reason of his race, religion, or national origin.

There are people—and they are by no means all Republicans—who do not agree with these principles, and who do not wish to see the progressive forces unite for the purpose of putting them into effect. Some of them have told us that we are unwise to organize for political action, because by doing so we might stimulate the forces of reaction to take similar action. The forces of reaction have taken this action long ago. They are entrenched and fortified on every rise of ground on the economic contour map of the world. They are fighting grimly behind their Maginot lines to perpetuate their privileged position.

But the united progressive forces of the world are on the march and will not be denied. They are fighting not for special privilege, but for equality of opportunity for all men everywhere, of every race, of every nationality, and of every religious faith.

The fight for human dignity and freedom will not end when we shall have achieved victory at the polls on November 7, any more than it will end when we shall have achieved military victory over Germany and Japan. All that we shall have gained by these victories is survival, survival to fight for freedom, to vote for freedom and to work for freedom, until finally freedom shall have been gained for all men who inhabit this earth.

SIDNEY HILLMAN.

Information for Servicemen, Veterans, and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY M. JACKSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, this Nation owes a debt to the veterans of this war. It is not possible for this obligation to be measured in dollars and cents but the duty to evidence the Nation's grateful appreciation to the 11,000,000 men and women of the armed forces still exists.

After the last war proper provision was not made for the veterans and their dependents. But this time the story will be different. This time the returning veteran will not have to stand in bread lines nor ask for a dole, nor stand on the street corner with a tin cup.

The Congress of the United States, fully aware of its obligations and responsibilities, has enacted the G. I. bill of rights and I am glad to have had a part in its passage. One can see at a glance that the Government of the United States is liberal with those who are wearing and have worn the uniform of their country; our servicemen are the best paid and the best equipped in the world; our veterans and their dependents receive more adequate care than any others in the world. Because of the different kind of warfare which has developed, the needs will change and many future requirements will have to be met, but our immediate duty is to help them readjust their lives to the new conditions that have been imposed upon them.

READJUSTMENT TO CIVIL LIFE—EDUCATION

One of the provisions of the so-called G. I. bill of rights offers an education to any man who served for a period of 90 days, on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice up to $500 per year for tuition and books, and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if without dependents and $75 if he has dependents. In no event shall the total period of education exceed 4 years. There is also a provision for part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

A veteran also has the right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities, extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

Application for education and training should be made to the Director, Servicemen's Education and Training, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

HOSPITALIZATION AND PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES

Adequate hospital facilities are provided for the care and treatment of veterans for nonservice disabilities or diseases as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in service.

The veteran has the right to adequate prosthetic appliances and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefits in the use of such appliances.

RIGHT OF MEDICAL REVIEW OF IRREGULAR DISCHARGE OR RELEASE FROM ACTIVE SERVICE

A veteran has the right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service, (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether the person at time of committing the offense was insane, in event of which determination benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited; (b) except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal; (c) any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

Under both (b) and (c) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever be the later.

LOANS FOR THE PURCHASE OR CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTY

Loans provided for the above-mentioned purposes or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, the total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding an aggregate of $2,000. Loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions. The interest rate must not exceed 4 percent. The loan must be practicable and suitable to veterans' circumstances. The loan must be repaid in 20 years. Application must be made to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS

A veteran of any war, honorably discharged from any one of the services, has the right to register for employment and for placement in employment by the Veterans' Employment Service. He should contact his local United States employment office in his home town or county.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

There is also a provision for unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed. To be eligible, the person must reside in the United States, be completely unemployed, or, if partially unemployed, at wages less than $23 per week, be registered with and report to a public employment office, be able to work, and available for suitable work.

Any person will be disqualified if he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; if he, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work offered; if he fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course; if he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage.

BENEFITS FOR DEPENDENTS AS A RESULT OF LOSS OF SON, DAUGHTER, HUSBAND, OR FATHER

There are four money benefits provided for the dependents of a deceased veteran: 6 months' gratuity payment, monthly insurance payments—if the serviceman applied for insurance—monthly pension, and back pay.

GRATUITY

The gratuity is a lump-sum payment equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received at the date of death. In addition, the dependents of any private or seaman who dies in foreign service receive 20 percent of his base pay, and the dependents of any officer who dies in foreign service receive 10 percent of his base pay. If the serviceman was in either the flying service or submarine service, his dependents receive, in addition, 50 percent of his base pay. There is also a longevity provision in addition to the above amounts.

The gratuity is automatically paid to a wife of a deceased veteran, or if there is no wife, it is automatically paid to the surviving child or children. It is not automatically paid to parents or brothers or sisters of an unmarried serviceman. The serviceman should designate someone of this latter class to receive it; however, if he does not, they may apply for it. If two parents survive, the amount is divided between them. A grandparent must show an insurable interest in order to receive it.

Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to Gratuity Pay Branch, Finance Office, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington, D. C., by the surviving relative of a seaman to Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

MONTHLY INSURANCE PAYMENTS

This insurance is not paid in a lump sum; it is paid on a monthly basis, depending on the age of the beneficiary—the older the beneficiary, the higher is each monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy, if the beneficiary to whom payment is first made is under 30 years of age at the date of death of the insured, payments shall be made in 240 equal monthly installments, at the rate of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance. If the beneficiary to whom payment is first made is 30 or more years of age at the date of death of the insured payment shall be made in equal monthly installments for 120 months certain, with such payment in installments continuing during the remaining lifetime of such beneficiary. For instance, under a $10,000 policy, a 50-year-old beneficiary will get $53.90 monthly. Under the same policy a 70-year-old beneficiary will get $85.10 monthly, and so forth.

It would be well to have parents and next of kin check with the men and women in service to see that all insurance policies are in order and in the hands of the beneficiaries. An insurance policy taken out by men and women in service can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brother, or sister, including those of half blood. There is nothing to prevent a parent or brother or sister from being the beneficiary of more than one serviceman.

All dependents and next of kin ought to check their insurance policy now. See that everything is in order now. It might save a lot of grief in the future. Negligence has caused many a beneficiary to lose out. A little care can avoid a lot of trouble should anything happen. I would suggest that you send your serviceman this pamphlet so that he may check all matters pertaining to his beneficiaries.

MONTHLY PENSION

This pension is paid automatically to a wife and children. All children under 18 are eligible. Children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school up to that time. If a child marries before 18 or 21, they are not eligible for this pension. Parents who have been dependent upon the deceased man or woman in service are also entitled to a pension. Parents who have been dependent upon a deceased serviceman can get a pension at the same time his wife and children are getting a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are as follows:

One parent, $45 a month. Two parents, $25 each. Widow but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child. No widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38; no widow but two children, $38 equally divided, with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100.

The fact that a widow, a child, or parents gets the insurance does not prevent them from getting a pension also. They can collect both insurance and a pension.

BACK PAY DUE THE SERVICEMAN

When a casualty occurs, that service man or woman who has become a casualty may have back pay coming. All this back pay is paid to the nearest heir. Application should be made by the surviving relative to a soldier to—Finance Officer, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

HEADSTONE FOR GRAVE

Any person may make application for a headstone for the grave of any veteran of any one of the Army or Navy services whose service was honorable, to the Quartermaster General, War Department, Washington 25, D. C.

BURIAL ALLOWANCE FOR ANY WAR VETERAN

After honorable service, reimbursement for burial may be allowed, not exceeding $100, on burial, funeral, and transportation expenses. Application should be made to Director, Dependent Claims Service, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C.

Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, his minor children or adult unmarried daughters.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES FOR DEPENDENTS

Dependents of all grades of enlisted men and aviation cadets of the Army and Navy are eligible to receive a dependent's allowance from the Government in addition to the serviceman's allotment. Those men and women serving as officers come under another system. The allowances provided by the Government are as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife and one child, $72, and $20 for each additional child. Note: If the divorce or separation order of the court does not call for alimony or separate maintenance, the wife will not receive any allotment, and in case of a court order providing alimony or separate maintenance, she will get no more than the amount fixed by the court.

Class B dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is substantially but not completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37.

Class B–1 dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $50 plus $11 for each brother or sister; two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $68 plus $11 for each brother or sister; a brother or sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parents, $11.

It is important that men and women with dependents make application through their commanding officers for allotment and allowance, as these benefits will begin the date application is filed. Allotments are compulsory only for class A dependents. If the service man or woman for some reason or other fails to make application or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. The Army requires their regular application blank to be filled out; the Navy requires merely a letter giving the name of applicant's wife and children and dates of birth. In case a man is reported missing in action, the allotment and allowance continue to be paid for a period of a year, unless in the meantime his status is definitely determined.

Parents and brothers and sisters who can prove dependency can receive an allowance at the same time as wife and children. Parents can get an allowance from more than one son or daughter in the service. For instance, if two parents are greatly dependent upon a son or daughter in the service, they get $68 per month. Now, if another son or daughter in the service helped support these same parents, they can get another $37 from the second son or daughter.

The agency for the Navy having jurisdiction over allotments and allowances is: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.; the agency for the Army is: Office of Dependency Benefits, War Department, 213 Washington Street, Newark, N. J. If you experience any difficulty contact your Congressman.

TEMPORARY AID FOR DEPENDENTS OF SERVICEMEN

Sometimes cases of extreme hardship arise involving dependents of servicemen. Many dependents, and even members of the armed forces themselves, are not fully acquainted with the two emergency agencies set up for the express purpose of helping such persons in need. These two agencies have branches all over the country. They are the Army Emergency Relief Fund, whose functions have recently been assigned to the Red Cross, and the Navy Relief Society, which also can be reached through the Red Cross.

ARMY RELIEF FUND

Any member of the armed forces in the Army can appeal to the Army Relief Fund, represented in all camps, or through the Red Cross if the soldier is not at camp, for needed immediate financial assistance. He will receive courteous and willing assistance at all times. The fund is also open to all dependents of men and women in the Army, and anyone needing relief should get in touch at once with this fund through the local Red Cross.

NAVY RELIEF SOCIETY

Any serviceman or servicewoman in our naval forces or his dependents can appeal to this agency for urgent financial assistance. To get immediate action, it is advisable to take the case up through the Red Cross.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

This benefit is payable to all honorably discharged personnel of our services whose rank is below captain in the Army, and lieutenant senior grade in the Navy. Payments are made in the following sums: Personnel with less than 60 days' active service, $100; personnel with 60 days' or more active service, none of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $200; personnel with 60 days' or more active service, any part of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $300. Whenever mustering-out payments amount to more than $100, payments are made in monthly intervals of $100 each. Servicemen who are discharged at their own request are not entitled to mustering-out pay.

FREE MEDICAL AND NURSING CARE FOR WIVES AND INFANTS OF MEN IN ARMED FORCES

In most States through cooperation with the Federal Government, a wife of any man in service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided, including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

The wife should see a doctor at the first sign of pregnancy. She should then ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this free service if it is provided in that State. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2. In the case of emergency, be sure that the doctor makes application for you within 48 hours after service is rendered. If the application is not made within 48 hours, no bills for medical or hospital service will be paid. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse; no money is given to the wife. This service is extended to wives and infants of servicemen in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska, but not to any other foreign country.

SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY PENSIONS

Our honorably discharged veterans of all wars are entitled to a pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by their service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10-percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as a hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month.

The disability claim is filed by the veteran for benefits payable to him as the result of injury or disease resulting from military service. The award of compensation is based on the degree of disability which is determined according to the Veterans' Administration schedule provisions. Any disability, except misconduct, is compensable if it is as much as 10-percent disabling. This application is known as Form 526. It is simple to execute and seldom does one have any trouble answering the questions. Additional evidence is seldom required. This is particularly true on the adjudication of the initial claim. No subsequent formal claim need be filed. If the veteran is dissatisfied with his present rating, he can submit medical evidence to this effect.

However, it should be borne in mind that the doctor's statement must state not only his diagnosis but sufficient findings to warrant it. It is essential that this evidence show, or at least indicate, a higher degree of disability than the present evaluation. Upon receipt of competent medical evidence, the Veterans' Claim Service will authorize an official physical examination for rating purposes, thereby reopening the case for further consideration.

Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred from one Veterans' Administration facility to another, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for settlement, veterans should file claim on proper form which will be supplied them by any Veterans' Administration facility, or the local representative of the American Red Cross. If the disabled person is insane or incompetent, the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will file all necessary claims for him.

WRITE FOR OTHER INFORMATION

It is practically impossible to cover briefly all the details of benefits available to veterans of this and previous wars. I have tried to outline the benefits relating primarily to World War No. 2 veterans, as many pamphlets are available covering the provisions for veterans of other wars. I offer this digest mainly as a helpful guide to servicemen and their dependents. If anyone has special questions or individual problems not covered in this summary, I shall be glad for you to write to me personally at the following address: Congressman HENRY M. JACKSON, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Sam Gompers Versus Sidney Hillman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, Robert J. Watt, international representative of the A. F. of L., does not believe a labor organization should become "the tail to any political party kite." He says:

The primary function of a labor union is to act as the collective bargaining agency for the American wage earners in their economic relationships with their employers.

Watt then says that if a labor union hitches itself to one political party, it must rise and fall with that party. He urges the A. F. of L. to continue to follow the advice of Samuel Gompers—keep the trade union movement a labor movement of, by, and for the working people. This is sound advice but directly contrary to the attitude, the activities, and the advice of Sidney Hillman and Philip Murray. Whose advice will the American wage earner follow in the coming weeks, Sam Gompers' or Sidney Hillman's? Will the independent-minded American worker take orders from leaders like Hillman?

Following up this line of thought I include in my remarks an editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune of Wednesday, August 23, 1944, entitled, "Sidney Hillman's Program."

SIDNEY HILLMAN'S PROGRAM

A local of C. I. O. steel workers in Gary has rebelled against the operations of the C. I. O.'s Political Action Committee, headed by Sidney Hillman. The members tabled a motion to assess themselves a dollar each for the slush fund that Hillman is dispensing to promote the fourth term.

It is certain that a good many of the 1,500 members of this local had voted for Roosevelt in the past and may vote for him again, yet the action to table the slush fund resolution is reported to have been unanimous. The reason why it was was explained by Chester F. Midgett, a member of the union.

"We decided to keep politics out of the local," he said. "We decided that we are running a union local, not a political party. It is a man's own business how he votes, not the business of the union."

The Gary action follows that of two C. I. O. locals in Utah, who quit the P. A. C. when they discovered that they were supposed to back Democratic candidates without listening to the pleas for support by Republican candidates. The Utah unionists, who are smelter workers, said that they didnt believe in being told how to vote by anyone.

Their stand, and that of the C. I. O. members in Gary, runs exactly counter to the philosophy on which Hillman is basing the P. A. C. Under his plan of operation political policies are to be "democratically" determined by the representatives of the unions participating in the organization, based upon their per capita tax (slush fund) payments.

This isn't a new policy. It is the policy of the Communists, with whose aid Hillman took over the American Labor Party in New York. The slush fund payments, thanks to maintenance of membership and the check-off, which Roosevelt's War Labor Board has assisted the C. I. O. in fastening on hundreds of thousands of war workers, will present few difficulties. Delivering the votes is a trifle more difficult. By Hillman's theory, a union member is bound to vote as his union decides he should vote. At least two C. I. O. leaders in Chicago have hinted to the members of their union that it will be too bad for them if they don't.

A member of the C. I. O. newspaper guild in Boston, analyzing this process in the current Reader's Digest, points out that it requires union members, as a duty to their union, to vote for candidates on the basis of issues which have not the slightest relation to the welfare of their union. In Massachusetts, this writer says, one of the tests by which C. I. O. members are bidden to judge State candidates is whether the candidate in question favors amendment of the law which at present makes the death sentence mandatory upon conviction of first degree murder. As he says, the amendment may be desirable, but it is certainly not one on which a voter's opinion should be formed on the basis of his union membership. The writer objects that instead of the members of the C. I. O. determining whom they shall support, they are being told from above whom they must support.

Mr. Hillman cannot quarrel with this. It is the basis of the Communist Party discipline which he is attempting to enforce on the C. I. O. unions. It is not for the Communist to reason why. He gets his orders, and if he does not execute them he is expelled from the party. If Hillman puts over his plan, the C. I. O. unionist who fails to carry out his orders from on high will be expelled from the union. He will be denied the right to earn a living if he asserts his political independence.

Allied Advances in France

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, the liberation of Paris and the fall of Marseille was brought about through the wholehearted collaboration of the French patriots. The French Forces of the Interior are hitting telling blows against the enemy, in cooperation with the advancing Allies. German morale has reached a new low because in France victory is in the air.

Typical of the support given the Allies by the French patriots was their action in delaying for some 20 days the German armored division, Das Reich, from reaching the fighting front at the time of the Allied landings in Normandy. In Brittany French patriots, organized and equipped in units by French paratroopers, fought successfully against superior numbers of German troops.

Action of the patriots in liberating the capital of France from 4 years of bondage will spur the forces of liberation everywhere. And President Roosevelt's words of encouragement on France's freedom day have more meaning now than ever:

With full confidence—

The President said—

I look forward that the French people on July 14, 1945, will celebrate their great national fete on French soil, liberated alike from the invader and from the puppets of Vichy.

Polish Boundary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARLE D. WILLEY

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. Speaker, winning the war and a permanent peace are the desires of the Allied Nations at this time. The peoples of the world are hoping for the success of negotiations arranged to bring about and secure such a peace. Representatives of the three great Allied Nations are meeting in the Capital to begin these negotiations. These representatives in their introductory remarks spoke of the desire for a permanent peace and of justice to all nations, large and small. They expressed confidence of success.

However, to make peace a reality, many of the causes which have developed distrust and a sense of injustice among nations must be removed. There must be confidence that agreements and treaties have meaning. Whatever comes from the conversations of the Allied Powers and in whatever form their agreements are expressed, the world will not accept the published statements unless in some manner there is established a confidence that the terms agreed upon will be scrupulously kept.

The proposal to transfer Polish territory to our Russian ally is not based upon agreements made between these two countries respecting their eastern boundary. It is contrary to agreements they have made. The proposal will not allay distrust. It will create doubt and suspicion.

For almost 5 years now Poland has felt the weight of the aggressors. First to resist, her people have continued the struggle. They have been on all the European fronts. They always acquit themselves well. They ask that the lofty principles that have been proclaimed apply to them as well as to all nations. They will be content with no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. This and other principles have been endorsed by the Allied Nations as has the principle of a just and enduring peace. But unfolding events are causing concern not only in Poland itself but among Polish kinsmen overseas, as evidenced by resolutions adopted by assembled delegates from societies, clubs, and veterans' posts making up the council of the Polish societies and clubs in the State of Delaware, as follows:

We, Americans of Polish descent, assembled at the Polish National Hall, at Wilmington, Del., on Friday evening, July 28, 1944, at a quarterly meeting of the Council of the Polish Societies and Clubs in the State of Delaware. After dispensing with our regular business we took up the question of Soviet Russia's announcement of incorporating the eastern part of Poland into the Soviet Union and creating a Polish Committee of National Liberation as the sole civil authority in territory west of the Bug River.

Further, we as Americans of Polish descent with over twelve hundred sons in this war for democracy, are greatly distressed to see them shed blood for this cause and to have Soviet Russia disregard completely the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms."

Whereas Poland, the first and most sacrificing ally in this struggle with Hitler, is now being partitioned by one of the United Nations, the Soviet Russia. Its only legal government in London is being bypassed for a group of so-called Polish patriots, a creation of Soviet Russia to govern the Polish Nation. This group of so-called Polish patriots are unknown to the Polish Nation and represent only a small group of Communists who do not have any influence on the Polish Nation.

Whereas the world knows that the present leaders of Soviet Russia have entered into an agreement with the Polish government in London in December 1941, repudiating its treaty of 1939 with Hitler concerning territorial changes in Poland. In 1943 they broke this agreement, proving to the world that treaties, agreements, declarations, the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms" are nothing more than scraps of paper, same as such meant to Hitler.

Whereas our President of the United States announced many times to the world that this war is being fought for the purpose of establishing fundamental freedoms in all parts of the world—the freedom of worship, the freedom of expression, the freedom from want and the freedom from fear. For the establishment of these freedoms, our sons are dying. We gave materials and food valued at billions of dollars to Soviet Russia who would still be fighting for bare existence without this aid.

Whereas if the aggressive plans of Soviet Russia toward Poland and other nations in Europe are realized, it would not only constitute a dangerous situation toward the security of our United States of America, but it would also create a situation that would not necessitate a post-war peace conference. If the United States would agree to such a situation then such a post-war peace conference would be a mockery for any future lasting peace, since millions of people and their nations would be ruled by Soviet Russia totalitarianism.

Whereas the endorsement of the Soviet Russia actions toward Poland and other occupied nations in Europe would mean the endorsement of Soviet Russia and German treaties of 1939 with territorial changes in Poland. This would be a betrayal of everything that was declared to the world as a reason to fight this war. It would mean that this war in Europe is being waged in vain, the outcome of which will be Soviet Russia totalitarianism for all nations in Europe. Distrust and condemnation from all people loving freedom, liberty, and independence would be fostered.

We, the patriotic Americans of Polish descent, appeal to you, Mr. President—in consideration of the high ideals of the Atlantic Charter and the Four Freedoms for which our sons and brothers are fighting and giving their lives on all battlefields—in consideration of the future security of our beloved United States of America—in consideration of the future of Poland with its constitutional and legal government in London—in consideration of the future of other occupied small nations in Europe, to use all your great authority and influence to defend the most sacred ideals of justice, liberty, and freedom toward Poland, whose ultimate fate will either prove to be glorious victory for freedom and lasting peace or a complete defeat of those guaranteed by our American principles and your declarations made to the world.

Furthermore, we here assembled declare that endorsement of the present criminal actions of the predatory powers of more than a century ago in this fifth partitioning of Poland, renewing the slavery of the peace-loving Polish Nation, will endanger victory and be ignoble, dishonorable, and contrary to right and justice.

VINCENT J. KOWALEWSKI,
President,

ADAM J. ROSIAK,
Secretary.

Is It Planned to Make Sidney Hillman the Fourth Term's New Secretary of Labor?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, an article by Frank Waldrop, in the Washington Times-Herald, provides some interesting information relative to Sidney Hillman in the August 24 issue of that newspaper. Under leave granted me by the House, I am including Mr. Waldrop's article as a part of these remarks.

Inasmuch as some of the usually well-informed insiders in New Deal circles are now giving the impression that if President Roosevelt is elected to a fourth term, Sidney Hillman is to replace Frances Perkins as Secretary of Labor, the American public has a rightful interest in Mr. Hillman and some of his associates and ambitions. Mr. Waldrop's article sheds some light on these subjects.

Citizens both in and out of the ranks of labor who desire to make a more thorough and detailed study of Mr. Hillman's record will find it in House Report No. 1311, recently issued by the Dies committee. This report deals with the subversive background of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee and in it Mr. Hillman is referred to on 27 different occasions. Chapter 21 of that report is devoted exclusively to the same Sidney Hillman who is being groomed for Secretary of Labor and whose blatant support of the fourth-term drive is even more vigorous and better financed than that of the chairman of the Democratic National Committee. In fact it appears that Hillman is about to replace Hannegan as the actual—if not the titular—head of the fourth-term strategists, just as the city machines have replaced the Old South as the controlling influence in the Democratic Party.

It is worth noting here, Mr. Speaker, that while House Report No. 1311 of the Dies committee levels one of the most devastating attacks against subversive activities ever prepared by our committee, it is nevertheless one of the few Dies committee reports which presents evidence so conclusive and so completely damning that nobody on the committee prepared or signed a minority report. It is also significant that the House had to order over 50,000 additional copies of this report to satisfy even partially the widespread demand for them.

Every leader of public opinion in America regardless of party affiliation should read this report because any effort by a so-called nonpolitical group to take over the reins of government and dominate the national political picture without assuming the responsibilities of management transcends all party lines in its significance. If it succeeds, it will plague and confound the Democrats of Dixie fully as much or more than it will agonize the Republicans of the Middle West and New England.

In fact, in view of the approach suggested by the Hillman group to the Negro question, it will very likely do much more to dismantle and disrupt social and economic standards in Democratic Dixie than it will in any other section of this Republic. Southerners who vote for the Hillman-Hannegan-Hopkins political axis, however, have no one to blame but themselves if they find themselves caught in the toils of big-city political machines, subversive organizations, and selfish C. I. O. labor racketeers seeking personal aggrandizement and political power.

SIDNEY HILLMAN, THE RASPUTIN OF AMERICAN LABOR

Every man in America who labors, whether he works as a member of a union or as an unorganized laborer, might well pause to ponder why it was that a spokesman for the great American Federation of Labor only yesterday denounced Sidney Hillman and his Political Action Committee in terms even more harsh and far more devastating than those used by either Mr. Waldrop or by the Dies committee. Any daily paper for August 23, carrying Associated Press dispatches, will report the denunciation which the American Federation of Labor leveled against the political manipulations of Sidney Hillman, who now strides the American scene as the Rasputin of organized labor and who boasts about the political scalps which his tribe has already taken in Alabama, in Texas, in Missouri, in California, and elsewhere. Should his crowd succeed in making him Secretary of Labor—and this would be little enough reward to him for the millions of dollars and the myriads of words he is devoting to the support of Mr. Roosevelt's bid for further power—it will be a sorry day for this Republic and an even sadder occasion for members of the railroad brotherhoods, the American Federation of Labor, and all other workers who do not fawn before the political power of Sidney Hillman.

The Congressman from your own district can supply you with a copy of House Report 1311 and all who will can read the following article by Mr. Waldrop which sketches in a few brief details of the ambitions, associations, and activities of the man who will do much to determine the labor policies of this Republic if the New Deal is projected to its sixteenth year, and who in all probability will either become the new Secretary of Labor or dominate the decisions of the Labor Department should the fourth-term drive succeed.

Sidney Hillman, the new American political boss, has just come up with a statement that he is not a Communist, never has been a Communist, and so forth. Here are the quotes:

"I have consistently fought the Communists, in and out of season, and I have said consistently that the Communists should not interfere with us, nor we with them.

"It isn't a matter of guess work, either; it is a matter of record. I have always opposed totalitarian politics, and the record does not show that a single officer of the Amalgamated (Hillman's union, the C. I. O. Amalgamated Clothing Workers) has ever been accused of being a Communist."

Well, friends, it may be so, but that ain't the way we heard it, so just for fun we'll set forth here a few facts about Sidney's past and see what he does to deny them.

First, this handsome gent was born at Zagare, Lithuania (then, as now, a part of Russia), on March 23, 1887. In 1905, there was a Communist-inspired revolution in that part of Russia and two Communist writers, Bruce Minton and John Stuart, have hosannaed Sidney in their writings as "one of the workers who seized Zagare in the name of the people and was a member of the proletarian committee that governed the town."

On the other hand, Benjamin Stolberg, a famous labor historian who looks on Sidney as a trimmer without the nerve to be a card-carrying Communist, ridicules this picture of the young hero as a tale made up by the local Commies to glorify Sidney among their rank and file during one of his numerous little "footie-footie" games with them in New York politics—of which more later.

However that may be, the 1905 Russian revolution was a flop, and as many of its sympathizers as could caught the fast mail away from there. Young Hillman arrived in the United States of America on August 10, 1907.

Right away he went into the needle trades in New York, and in a few years had his union, the aforementioned Amalgamated. Then came the first World War and the successful Communist seizure of power in Russia. So Sidney turned up with a book, The Reconstruction of Russia and the Task of Labor, and then beat it for Moscow.

He went there to tie up a deal with Nicolai Lenin, then commanding the Communist works, for the formation of a Russian-American Industrial Corporation which was to monopolize the Russian textile business.

In the United States of America this outfit started attempts to float $1,000,000 worth of stock sales, and, to boost interest, Hillman cabled back the big news that he "had long conferences with Lenin, who guaranteed Soviet support."

And when the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America (S. Hillman, president) met in Chicago in May 1922, there was read to them a message from Moscow by William Z. Foster, for many years the head of the Communists in America and their perennial candidate for United States President:

"The defeat of the employers is the natural result of the splendid spirit of the Amalgamated. Many times in my recent speaking tour, speaking to your unions, I marveled at this glowing spirit.

"But since coming to this country (Russia) I marvel no longer. It is the spirit of the Russian revolution, the spirit that will lead the workers to emancipation."

For the record, let it be noted that the $1,000,000 Russian-American Industrial Corporation stock flotation flopped, and so did the trading plan itself, even though Hillman gave $3,000 to help start a Communist paper in New York.

So Sidney's next step was to get onto the self-perpetuating board of directors of the American Fund for Public Service, set up by one Charles Garland, a parlor pink from Harvard, with money he had inherited from his father.

It has been used to finance the New York Daily Worker, official Communist trade paper, the New Masses, official Communist weekly trade journal, and such like things with Anti-Communist Sidney Hillman a happy member of the board of directors.

But after the flop of the Industrial Corporation above mentioned, Hillman fell out with the Commies—wonder why?—and had several bad public rows with them. In brief, he switched.

Then in 1937, he switched again when the Commies moved in on the C. I. O., of which Hillman was John L. Lewis' chief of staff at that time.

Such firm friends of the Red Society as Harry Bridges, Ben Gold, Joseph Curran, Michael Quill, Abraham Flaxer, and Morris Muster, were Anti-Communist Hillman's friends, too.

The time came when John L. Lewis was not so popular with the Communists as he had been. So Hillman pulled out on him, and in a while switched on the Communists, again, too, until he found out how things were going after the German invasion of Russia—which brought the Reds back into popularity with the New Dealers.

Eventually, in hot collaboration with New Dealers and/or Communists, Hillman last year put together the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. When the P. A. C. held its national conference in New York City on January 14, 1944, the American Labor Party bought space in the newspapers to say that Hillman had made a "complete surrender to the Communists."

But in spite of the public record from which all this comes, Sidney is no Communist. He says so.

Apparently, to be a real anti-Communist you have to hang out with Commies, trade and play with them for 20 years. Anyhow, that's how Sidney has worked it. He says.

Alaska and the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, as time passes, we are learning more of the great contribution Alaska has made and is making toward the winning of the war.

For military reasons it has not been permissible to disclose the activities of this strategic area as a part of our military operations. However, we now know that the great airway over the roof of the world connecting continental United States with Asia and European war zones was a most important factor in the progress toward victory we have made.

While in Alaska last year in connection with my services on the House Committee on Territories, I had occasion to meet Capt. Richard L. Neuberger, who at that time was aide-de-camp to General O'Connor, in charge of the Northwest Command.

Captain Neuberger has recently returned from the northland and wrote a most interesting article which appeared in the Washington Post on August 17, under the caption "The Federal Diary." Under leave heretofore granted, I include this article as a part of my remarks, as it contains much factual and interesting information with reference to Alaska. The article follows:

THE FEDERAL DIARY

(Jerry Kluttz is vacationing. The Federal Diary today is written by Capt. Richard L. Neuberger, of the U. S. Army.)

As a recent arrival from the Arctic, after 20 months of military service in Alaska and the Canadian Northwest, I think I can truthfully say that I have experienced nearly the ultimate in contrasts.

Ours was the coldest post at which American soldiers were stationed. The thermometer slid to 68° below zero. For 3 weeks in a row it never rose above 50 below. Washington—well, Washington is about 145° warmer than the Yukon Valley. I told my friend, Constable Bolger, of the Royal Mounted, at Caribou Crossing, that in Washington on a summer's day you could lie under a tree and sweat enough moisture to float an Eskimo kayak. He still thinks I am a liar.

When Jack London was in the Klondike almost half a century ago, he deplored the dearth of white women. We shared his distress. Without going into details, it can be said that no such shortage is evident in our Nation's Capital.

Last June, in the tiny settlement of Whitehorse, on the upper reaches of the Yukon, I spent $11.30 during the entire month. My principal expenditure was a new toothbrush; price, 35 cents, at the Army post exchange. You can get rid of $11.30 in Washington between sundown and bedtime any evening and still not be close enough to the heavy spenders to communicate with them by smoke signals.

Tanana Crossing is Alaska's coldest spot. In 1913 the temperature there dropped to 76 below zero. We saw it touch nearly 70 below. That was cold enough for Scotch whisky to turn to slush. Shaving lotion froze solid. So did the antifreeze solution for bulldozer and truck radiators. The manufacturers of the antifreeze wouldn't credit this at first. They sent up a technical expert. He came to scoff but remained to believe—and freeze.

Whenever you feel like complaining about Washington's heat, remember that at the winter camps along Alaska Highway the food in an America soldier's mess kit will freeze while he is carrying it from the mess hall to his hut.

When it is 70 below zero, you wear fur mittens and you wear them on a lanyard. If you have to take off your mittens to strike a match for a fire, you don't dare lay them down. When 100° of frost prevail, fingers stiffen into immobility in less than 2 minutes. Many a cheechako (which is Thlingit Indian for newcomer) has lost his hands or died on the trail because he couldn't get back into his mittens.

We learned most about the cold and how to resist it from the Canadian Mounties. In the southern part of Canada the Mounties use cars and motorcycles and airplanes. They are mechanized and there the glamour is gone. The entire force has only 115 horses left. But in the Arctic they are still the dashing redcoats dramatized by James Oliver Curwood and a score of other writers.

Washington often figures in conversations north of the sixth parallel, and usually in wistful tones. We saw a good deal of Ernest Gruening, Governor of Alaska, who owns a home in Washington. One night in a chilly C. C. C. barracks at Whitehorse, he longed for an old-fashioned political bullfest with such friends as Attorney General Biddle, Marquis Childs, and Justice Douglas. And I remember the day at Kluane Lake, where not a white woman had been seen during 14 lonely months of wilderness duty, that a technical sergeant of engineers asked, "Is it really true, lieutenant, that there's four gals for every guy down there in Washington, D. C.?"

I nodded in mournful assent.

He thought for a moment. "Golly," he said, "things sure are distributed bad, ain't they, lieutenant?"

In Whitehorse our soldiers drank beer in the saloon which was the model for the famous Malemute Saloon in Robert W. Service's immortal Shooting of Dan McGrew. The first night in Whitehorse some of us rolled up on the floor of Service's old cabin in our sleeping bags. Service is in Vancouver, British Columbia. An old man now, he told us he had no desire to return to the wilderness scenes where, as a young goldweigher in 1898, he wrote the poems which were to make him world famous.

How many of us will want to return to Alaska after the war? In a few weeks here in Washington I have met many officers who are ready to go back now. Why? Who can account for the perversity of the human spirit? In the Arctic we longed for the girls, the good food, the creature comforts, the bright sunshine of Washington. Now, in Washington we yearn for the lofty peaks, the white silences, the sizzling moose steaks, the frozen rivers of Alaska.

The old Indian trapper at Burwash Landing said it all: "Strange are the ways of the white man."

Voting by Servicemen From New York State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Dewey's Costly Victory Over New York Soldiers," published in the Philadelphia Record of August 25, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEWEY'S COSTLY VICTORY OVER NEW YORK'S SOLDIERS

Gov. Thomas E. Dewey has won his first campaign victory—over the servicemen of his own State.

The Nation's soldier vote machinery is getting under way. Its operation so far makes quite clear that Dewey has accomplished what he set out to do with his own "soldier-vote law":

Prevent most servicemen of New York State from voting in November.

New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania all have Republican administrations. New Jersey and Pennsylvania have model soldier vote laws. New York has the Dewey law.

Under the Pennsylvania and New Jersey laws every serviceman eligible to vote gets a ballot. No strings. No red tape.

Under the Dewey law every New York State serviceman must first send in an application for a ballot. Then the application must be "screened" by election boards for errors and insufficient information. Then, if approved, the soldier will be sent a ballot. If he gets the ballot in time to return it to New York 4 days before election, his vote will count. Otherwise it won't.

Now see the picture to date:

New Jersey already has mailed out ballots to its 308,000 eligible servicemen.

Pennsylvania has mailed, or is in process of mailing, ballots to its 563,000 eligible servicemen.

New York State, so far, has not mailed out a single ballot. Of its 1,000,000 eligible servicemen, only 212,465 so far have been able even to apply for ballots.

The top estimate of applications by the deadline is 400,000. And how many of those applications will be disqualified in the "screening" process time alone can tell.

It takes no crystal ball to see what's ahead.

In New Jersey and Pennsylvania virtually every serviceman will have a chance to vote.

In New York considerably less than half of its servicemen will apply for a ballot, let alone vote.

Bear in mind that it was Governor Dewey himself who insisted on this law which is going to disfranchise from 60 to 75 percent of New York State's G. I. voters.

Many Republicans opposed it. They felt, as did Republicans in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, that it was shoddy politics to cheat soldiers of their votes, good politics to see they got a chance to vote. Those opposing Dewey on this issue realized that every serviceman's family is going to resent any effort by any political group to play politics with the serviceman's vote.

But Dewey had his way. He got his law. Now he's won his point.

Victories of this kind in August do not, however, portend victory in November.

A candidate whose hope for winning depends on keeping people away from the polls is not a candidate to command the respect of the vast majority of independent voters who think for themselves—the voters who are going to decide this election.

Perhaps Governor Dewey senses this after looking at the current Gallup poll. Fortune poll, and Bulletin poll in Philadelphia—all forecasting a Roosevelt triumph.

Address by Hon. Robert F. Wagner, of New York, Before New York State Federation of Labor Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me before the New York State Federation of Labor Convention at Syracuse, N. Y., on August 22, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My friends, during the 40 years that I have been in public service—years of war and peace, depression and prosperity—I have known the record of the New York State Federation of Labor. And you have known mine.

This is not an occasion for you to express your opinion of my record. I am here today to pay tribute to yours.

Whenever I hear those dangerous voices, casting aspersions on labor's patriotism in time of war, I answer them by citing the record of the New York State Federation of Labor.

Whenever I hear those foolish voices, which fail to recognize that labor is a sane and constructive influence in our economy, a conservative influence in the true sense, I answer them by citing the record of the New York State Federation of Labor.

Whenever I hear those malicious voices, seeking for personal or partisan gain to make the American people believe that labor's interest is a selfish or narrow one, I answer them by citing the record of the New York State Federation of Labor.

When I entered the State legislature as an assemblyman in 1905, I did not represent any one group or section of the people of my district. I was deeply imbued then—even as I am today—with the American concept that a lawmaker should follow his own conscience and attempt to serve the people as a whole. If labor and I have seen eye to eye on so many issues through all these years; if we have made common cause on so many occasions, it is only because I have been convinced that labor has fought for decent things, for progressive measures, for forward-looking policies.

Neither you nor I have always been right. We have both made mistakes. But over the long pull, I have discovered that what you have stood for has been good for America. And that is why I have stood with you.

We could not have made the gains of the past 40 years alone. We have needed the help—and we have received the help—of people in all walks of life, who have wanted to improve the conditions of the average citizen. But nonetheless, laboring men and women, in State and Nation, have been the nucleus for the forces of progress.

My own experience proves this to be a fact. Between 1911 and 1915, I was chairman of the now historic factory commission, here in the State of New York. The investigations, conducted by this commission, laid the foundation for the whole code of enlightened social legislation which became a beacon light to the world. This beacon light could never have been kindled, were it not for your aid.

In 1913, I proposed a State industrial board, to regulate the working conditions and to safeguard the lives of men and women in industry. This proposal was the springboard from which we jumped to the present State industrial commission act. This instrumentality for focusing attention upon human rights could not have been created without your assistance.

In 1913, the Workmen's Compensation Act, upon which I had worked during 4 years, became law and withstood the test of the courts. This pioneer of social-security legislation was your achievement no less than mine.

In a reminiscent mood recently, I was looking through the labor laws of this State and traced the genesis of many of them back to bills which I initiated during my years in the State legislature. Some of the measures which I sponsored included the earliest minimum-wage laws, the earliest successful efforts to keep children out of factories and away from dangerous machinery, to prevent night work by women in factories, to declare that labor is not a commodity of commerce, to limit the use of the injunction in labor disputes, and to protect peaceful picketing. These things which you and I accomplished in those early days may not seem much in view of all that has happened since until we remember that the acorn is always smaller than the tree.

We had to contend in those early days, it is true, with the people who said that this humane code would ruin our industries, would set up a bureaucracy, would impair our credit. But every one of these laws proved to be a stepping stone to the unmatched prosperity and wealth and leadership of the Empire State. Our business system thrived and benefited by the standards that we set.

In 1919 I left the New York State Senate and became a judge. During 8 years on the bench I watched with concern and then with alarm the change that was taking place in America. The end of the last World War had brought a dreadful reaction in its wake. We got caught up in a boom and mistook it for prosperity. Our industrial system became more productive, but we neglected to distribute its benefits wisely. We watched the stock market go up, but we were blind to the fact that unemployment was going up at the same time. In our thinking we forgot the human element. At home and abroad we lost the peace just as surely as we had won the war.

When I entered the United States Senate in 1927, I carried with me the experience which you and I had gained together. And how that experience was needed. Unemployment was going up, up, up. Our capacity to deal with it intelligently was going down, down, down.

The first important task was to get the facts—and toward that end I initiated and obtained action on a bill for a comprehensive count of the unemployed. The revelations of this count made it impossible to ignore any longer the millions of hunger-driven and fear-haunted men and women being pressed toward demoralization by the hopelessness of their plight.

The next step was my sponsorship of an unemployment stabilization board, of various relief and construction acts, and of broad programs of public works—with which you are all familiar—to revive business and to provide employment.

By 1934 these lifesaving measures had become rounded into a systematic and comprehensive program, which was equally beneficial to industry, agriculture, and labor.

Between then and the commencement of the present war we were attaining a reasonable measure of sound prosperity. This afforded me an opportunity to sponsor certain measures, to make our economic security and our economic freedom keep pace with our economic wealth.

I introduced and guided to enactment the present Social Security Act—with its Nation-wide provisions for unemployment insurance, old-age insurance and pensions, and aid for dependent children and for public health.

I initiated, and the Congress approved, various housing measures, to make it possible for middle-income groups to own their homes on better terms and at lower costs—along with measures for slum clearance and low-rent housing.

I sponsored the Railroad Retirement Act for transportation workers.

After a terrific struggle, and with your unstinting aid, the National Labor Relations Act—generally called the Wagner Act—was enacted. This act transformed the right to organize and bargain collectively from a hollow promise to a living reality.

Before the war broke out, I commenced the fight for the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. This bill is intended to liberalize the old-age insurance system, to improve unemployment insurance and the whole system of public employment offices, to establish social-security rights for men and women in the armed services adjusted to their needs, and to establish a national system of health insurance.

You know all about the efforts to defeat health insurance. The opposition has employed every trick and device that was used against workmen's compensation 30 years ago. They have resorted to misrepresentation, fear, and threat. But we shall persist and push forward until adequate medical care at a cost within his means, becomes the birthright of every American—to the great mutual benefit of the patient and the doctor.

The war has held in suspension, by common consent, some of the programs conceived in peace. But as victory draws near, we must not dwarf or minimize the tremendous economic problems that face us in the immediate months and years ahead.

I hope that you will bear with me, while I cite the stark reality of a few figures.

We have now appropriated for war purposes about $350,000,000,000, or about nine times our whole national income during the last year of the depression. We are now spending money on the war at the rate of more than $90,000,000,000 a year, or more than our total national income in the peak year of prosperity before the depression. This will give you some idea of the impact upon our economy when war spending tapers off or stops.

Largely because of the war program, our national income, which was less than $40,000,000,000 in 1932, and about $78,000,000,000 in 1940, was more than $145,000,000,000 in 1943 and will probably approach $155,000,000,000 in 1944. Employment in the working population and the armed forces, which stood at about 48,000,000 in the middle of 1940 has now risen to about 65,000,000.

What do these figures mean? They mean that, if we take no preventive steps, our annual national income after the war could fall off by as much as $50,000,000,000. They mean that unemployment could increase by ten to twenty million, not counting those women and minors in war industry who may not continue at work after the war. These figures present the possibility—if we do not act realistically to prevent it—of a depression such as this country has never seen before.

That is the dark side of the picture. But there is a bright side—and we can make the bright side come true. These same figures of high production and high employment during the war, show what America can do when it puts its shoulder to the wheel and organizes its vast resources effectively. These figures show that we can eliminate poverty and have higher standards of living than ever before. We can have a national income at least 50 percent higher than it was in 1929, with all that this means for the health, prosperity, and welfare of 140,000,000 people.

We are now, today, at the crossroads of decision on this momentous issue. Shall we go backward or forward? Shall we face peril or prosperity after the war, for ourselves and for the boys and girls who will be coming back with the laurels of victory?

My friends, this problem cannot be solved by kissing the flag, or by quoting the Constitution, or by uttering confident platitudes about faith in the future of America. The old wishing ring has been tried before, and it has never worked. What a pity it is, after all our tragic experience in the past, that there should be some who still rub the wishing ring and close their eyes.

The problems of demobilization, of reconversion, of post-war adjustment, and of the peace years thereafter, will be bigger social and economic problems than we have ever had before. We cannot solve these bigger problems by having narrower minds, shorter vision, or colder hearts. There is a kind of faith that we must have, but it must be faith in action—faith in the realization that the history of America has always been a history of growth—and that growth always means bigger tasks accompanied by a bigger capacity to meet them successfully.

Several years ago I introduced in the Senate the first bill for comprehensive post-war planning. During the present session I have worked for the indispensable requirements for satisfactory post-war legislation—the kind of program outlined in the Kilgore-Murray bill. On this issue, we have neither won nor lost—we have just begun to fight.

Such legislation should establish permanent machinery to deal with post-war problems.

It should establish a permanent policy board, including representation of labor, industry, agriculture, and the consumer.

It should set up and maintain some device for a continuing inventory of employment and business conditions. There should be held in readiness, for immediate commencement where needed, such programs of encouragement to enterprise, public works, housing, and social security benefits as may be necessary to maintain the highest possible levels of employment;

It should establish a retraining and reemployment system, to concentrate upon the placement of returning servicemen and war workers. Along with this, it should provide free vocational training for veterans, and it should provide adequate maintenance during this period of training for those who need it;

It should liberalize and improve the whole system of unemployment benefits;

It should organize all these efforts under a single top direction, to secure maximum efficiency of operations and speed of decision.

You know as well as I do that the Congress has not yet passed legislation measuring up to these standards. No one has a greater right or duty than you have, to insist that such legislation shall be passed.

The arguments against this legislation are ghost-like apparitions of the arguments against all those measures which brought us out of the depression 10 years ago, against the very philosophy of government which enables us to act. Now as before we hear the argument of "States' rights," presented in one form or another. I yield to no one in my respect for that degree of State sovereignty which our Federal system contemplates. But I am not aware of any time when social or economic legislation enacted in Washington invaded any right or privilege of any State in the Union. This legislation was enacted because the States were the first to realize that large-scale industry knows no State lines, that unemployment knows no State lines, that neither prosperity nor depression stops at State boundaries, and that America's economic destiny is to perish as a divided nation or to live as a united nation.

Imagine our fate if, when the Japs bombed Pearl Harbor, the President had asked the Governors of the 48 States to handle plans for national defense, and to organize 48 armies to win the war. What would have happened to our war production if, instead of creating the War Production Board to marshal our resources, we had turned the job over entirely to a little W. P. B. in each State capital?

Are we not as determined to win the peace as we are to win the war? The States alone were completely helpless to provide jobs for any of the 15,000,000 who were unemployed in 1932. How are the States alone going to provide jobs for the 15,000,000 men and women who will be demobilized by our armed forces when victory comes? Let me not be misunderstood. We need the cooperation of the States and the communities, of industry, and of individuals—but we need a strong and responsive Federal Government as well.

The issue of permanent peace also turns on this question: For how can we take the leadership toward international security unless we demonstrate our capacity to provide security at home? And how can we have vision enough to see the problems of the world as a whole unless we have vision enough to see the problems of our own Nation as a whole?

The plain truth is that the overworked State rights argument is a mask to hide the true designs of those who want to cripple or contract all the things that we have worked for, over the long, hard years. The argument has both an isolationist and a reactionary flavor.

We shall not permit reaction to succeed. Too much hangs in the balance—all the work that we have done, the whole future of America, the lives and welfare of our children and their children after them.

Men and women of the New York State Federation of Labor, hew to the line that you have always set, and I promise to be by your side as long as my strength remains.

Address by Hon. Joseph F. Guffey, of Pennsylvania, Before United Automobile Workers' Union, Bristol, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered yesterday at Green Gardens, Bristol, Pa., before Local Union No. 130, United Automobile Workers.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Here at Green Gardens, just across the road from Republican Joe Grundy's high tariff estate, is a good place for us New Dealers to open fire. We can see the whites of their eyes, so let 'em have it.

My interest in labor goes back to my boyhood when I saw miners and their families driven out of Possum Hollow, in Sewickley Township, and forced to camp out on the bar in the river because nobody dared risk the anger of the coal barons by leasing them land on which to erect their flimsy tents. When I was in my teens I saw Henry C. Frick crush the Knights of Labor in the Connellsville coke region and smash the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers in the Homestead strike. Those were the days when the lords of coal and steel ruled this State through their coal and iron police, their judges, and their government at Harrisburg. It was worth a workman's life to have it known he was trying to organize labor in western Pennsylvania. He was put on the black list and that meant starvation for himself and his family.

During the years that followed I fought, as well as I could, for liberal leaders and liberal principles. My liberalism did not begin with Franklin Delano Roosevelt. It began with my father and his friends. It matured under William Jennings Bryan. It became effective under Woodrow Wilson, with whom I had studied at Princeton University. Yet I was to live to see Wilson's great life work and America's victory in the First World War wrecked by the same Henry C. Frick who had crushed labor in the 1890's, and who had never forgiven Wilson for the passage of the Adamson law which established the 8-hour day for railroad workers. Frick, combined with another reactionary Pennsylvania Republican, Senator Knox, who was Frick's personal attorney, with Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, and Senator Penrose, to defeat the Treaty of Versailles and destroy the League of Nations.

We all know today what that foul deed has meant. Wilson foresaw what would happen—even to the flying bombs which are today pounding the city of London—and he warned us. In his speech at Denver, Colo., on September 25, 1919, President Wilson issued this solemn prophecy which has cruelly come true in every detail:

"Stop for a moment to think about the next war, if there should be one. I do not hesitate to say that the war we have just been through, though it was shot through with terror of every kind, is not to be compared with the war we should have to face next time. There were destructive gases, there were methods of explosive destruction unheard of even during this war, which were just ready for use when the war ended—great projectiles that guided themselves and, shot into the heavens, went for a hundred miles and more and then burst tons of explosives upon helpless cities, something to which the guns with which the Germans bombarded Paris from a distance were not comparable. What the Germans used were toys as compared with what would be used in the next war." That was Woodrow Wilson's prophecy.

But Frick and the high-tariff reactionary Republicans were willing to risk that. Today your husbands, brothers, and sons are paying the cost of these men's guilty gamble in blood. Why—because of something else that Wilson believed in—labor. In the same speech Wilson said:

"There is another matter which I am sure will interest a great many in sound of my voice. If we do not have this treaty of peace, labor will continue to be regarded, not as it ought to be regarded, a human function, but as a purchasable commodity throughout the world. There is inserted in this great treaty a magna carta of labor."

That is the last thing these reactionary Republicans wanted—and the last thing they want today. They elected their man Harding and the Ohio gang. They had their high tariff. The result was economic chaos and social catastrophe when Joe Grundy, of Pennsylvania, put over the Smoot-Hawley high-tariff law which Herbert Hoover signed, despite the protest of more than 1,000 American economists on the ground that it would destroy American prosperity and create mass unemployment.

Now we are back in the same war, with the same sort of reactionary Republicans trying to sneak back into power by default, with the soldiers not allowed to vote, with industrial labor shifted all over the country in new war industries, with another "return to normalcy"—a snap-back to isolation, with another panic and another war already in the making as the price we, the people, would have to pay for the privilege of having an ersatz Hoover and streamlined Harding in the White House.

There is only one thing we can do about it, and that is not to let it happen. It must not happen and it will not happen if labor lives up to its rights and its responsibilities.

The reactionary, high-tariff Republicans are moving heaven and earth to stop labor from defending its rights and interests. Just now they are making a great fuss over the simple proposal to obtain a dollar contribution from every member of organized labor as a fund with which to support Roosevelt and TRUMAN. They believe that we have forgotten how in 1936 members of the du Pont family alone contributed $600,000 to the Republican campaign fund. They believe that we have forgotten how in 1940 members of the Pew family acknowledged contributions of $380,000 to the Republican campaign fund. What is the difference between a few millionaires contributing $600,000 and 600,000 men contributing a dollar apiece? What is the difference between Joe Pew's family giving $380,000 and 380,000 workmen chipping in a dollar apiece? There have been dark charges that the labor groups which favor Roosevelt and TRUMAN may raise as much as $5,000,000. To the Republicans, this is almost chicken feed.

Some years ago, when the late Charles Schwab, of Bethlehem Steel was down in Washington seeing me on some business he had with the Government, he told me that when Boies Penrose was Senator from Pennsylvania, Penrose, sent for him from time to time. Whenever Penrose called, Schwab dropped everything and hastened to Washington for his orders. Schwab told me that Penrose never wanted less than a quarter of a million dollars and that in one Presidential election Penrose has told him to go out and raise a fund of $6,000,000 for the Republican Party. Schwab raised that amount of money, according to his own statement.

And here's one thing more, while I'm on the subject of Penrose. At the end of the last war, Wilson's administration made an honest effort to taper off war contracts so that labor would not be sacrificed to war profits and so as to ease the reemployment of returning veterans. This was not what the Republican reactionaries wanted. Acting on Government assurances, the Eddystone Rifle Plant in this State promised its workers in December 1918, that none would be laid off until July; but after Boies Penrose publicly lashed the Wilson administration for letting Eddystone run to produce what Penrose called "post-war nonessentials," the Contract Board canceled all contracts with that factory as of January 11, 1919, and thousands of deceived workers jammed the cashier's windows for their last pay checks. Cutting pay rolls still seems to many Republicans the road to what they call prosperity.

Here, however, is where you have your power and your chance to act. You know that a Republican victory would sweep away any and every safeguard which you have won during the last 12 years. Your hours of labor, your rates of pay, your very right to organize would go down like a house of cards before the avalanche of graft and greed, of reaction and revenge.

So I tell you very frankly that your only assurance of a decent and peaceful future lies on the road to political action. Organize, organize, organize, register, register, register, vote, vote, vote. Vote for your friends and against your enemies. Make your votes count and see that your votes are counted.

Your right to do this is unquestioned. Your right to contribute money for that purpose is unquestioned. So long as this is in any way a free country, no man, no group, no party can take away from you the basic American right—the right of free association and united action for any legitimate purpose.

As most of you know, I led the fight at the National Democratic Convention for the renomination of HENRY AGARD WALLACE, as Vice President of the United States. I lost that fight. HENRY WALLACE is a great liberal, a great American, and a leader with a great future. But if he could not be renominated, I am glad that the convention chose HARRY TRUMAN, of Missouri, to be President Roosevelt's running mate. I have sat beside HARRY TRUMAN in the United States Senate for the last 9 years, and we have always voted together on every issue affecting the rights and dignity of labor and the rights and dignity of our service men and women. The cause of liberalism and the cause of labor—and they are the same cause—will be in safe hands with President Roosevelt and Vice President TRUMAN. We can win with Roosevelt and TRUMAN, and we will win with them in November and thus make it possible for America to win the peace after America has won the war.

Speaking as a lifelong and loyal member of the Democratic Party, the Democratic Party must and will take labor into partnership throughout the Nation. Too many old-line politicians regard labor as mere political cannon fodder, to be marched to the polls on election day and butchered on every roll call in the Congress of the United States. I call for a full, fair, and free partnership between all of labor—organized and unorganized—and the Democratic Party, a party which is Nation-wide and not the property of any sectional group. That is what has begun to happen, even in the South, where labor has recently won important elections and removed from the national scene certain elderly or loud-mouthed politicians who curried favor with the northern absentee owners of southern wealth by labor baiting and abusive investigations. "Cotton Ed" SMITH, of South Carolina, will no longer be with us in Washington, and neither will JOE STARNES, of Alabama, or MARTIN DIES, of Texas. But LISTER HILL, of Alabama, is coming back and so is CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, after battles in which floods of Republican money were unable to halt the march of labor and of liberalism in the new South.

This is possible because labor is organizing politically and is taking the road of political action nationally. The fight will not be over quickly, nor will it be easy. The Republican Party still contains plenty of men like Sewell Avery, of Montgomery Ward, who hate labor, and plenty of men like Joe Grundy, over there, who wish to plunge us into high-tariff bankruptcy. The party that stole the election of 1876 from Tilden and gave it to Hayes, the party that counted out Bryan in the election of 1896, the party that gave us Harding and the Ohio gang in 1920, is still doing business at the same old stand and will stop at nothing to win the election.

So again I say to you: Organize, organize, organize; register, register, register; vote, vote, vote!

Vote for your friends and against your enemies. Make your votes count and see that your votes are counted.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me at Faneuil Hall in Boston, Mass., on July 4, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

No son of New England could remain unmoved after an invitation to join in the commemorative ceremonies at this noble shrine of New England's decisive role in the struggle for American liberty. No American could be other than thrilled by the opportunity to join that long line of distinguished speakers who have annually come upon this rostrum since before the birth of the republic. No son of Connecticut could conceal his pride for the privilege to speak in Faneuil Hall.

This is the place where the courageous spokesmen of our forefathers sounded the keynote of a new nation. This is the tribune from which stanch patriots dared to utter the challenge of free men in a new world. Here in this very hall the men of New England gathered to hear the words, and to learn the principles of freedom, for which they were prepared to fight and to die. We from the outer parts of New England envy the citizens of Boston in their possession of the historic places which mean so much to all Americans. A city is indeed fair, which holds within its precincts the sacred monuments of a nation's glory. But we would remind you that these treasures of our history belong in a larger sense to all New Englanders, and, indeed, to all Americans. The shots from the muskets at Lexington and Concord may have been "heard round the world," but they were heard first by the men of New England. From Connecticut, from Rhode Island, from the upper regions of New England's mountains, as well as from the farms of Massachusetts, sturdy patriots assembled on the fields of Cambridge, and in their wake, came, no less sturdy and no less courageous, the sons of New York, New Jersey, Virginia, and the others of the Thirteen Colonies. Thus, on the banks of the River Charles, in the old Colony, and in New England, was the first American Army formed, and a common struggle joined, out of which was born the Republic we celebrate today. And so, I say to you that in preserving and cherishing these places where our history was made the citizens of Boston and of the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts are in fact custodians for all the people of America.

I have referred to the gathering of patriots in Cambridge in 1775, out of which the first American Army came into being. Consider for a moment what that army was, and compare it with the mighty legions of America today. In the beginning it consisted of no more than a few thousand men, who literally had left their plows in the field and their shops unclosed, to bring aid to the embattled men of Massachusetts. They were untrained and unorganized. They had neither uniforms nor equipment save what each patriot himself could supply. They lingered for months without plan or strategy, save the undying spirit to fight for freedom.

Yet, out of that motley array was molded under the genius of Washington and his able officers, many of them from New England, an army which was able to wage 7 years of relentless war, to the final victory at Yorktown. What was the key to that miracle? Certainly it was not previous training, or a warlike disposition of the settlers in America. They were men of peace. They braved the hardships of a new and unexplored land in search of peace. They were men of peaceful pursuits. Their muskets were weapons for home defense and implements for securing food from the forests. How, then, could they have been transformed into a disciplined military organization capable of outmaneuvering, outmarching, and outfighting the best trained professional soldiers of Europe?

There is only one answer. The first American Army, established on the fields of Cambridge, Mass., like the great American Army of today, was the product of the American spirit. Then, as now, it was an army of citizens; then, as now, it was an army of freemen; then, as now, it was an army of men who knew why they fought, and who knew the awful consequences if they failed. It was their resolute purpose to maintain their new country as a free country that compelled them to go about the business of creating an army and waging victorious war.

That same continental army marches on today with the millions of Americans in Europe and in Asia and through the enemy-infested islands of the Pacific. Those who then sailed the seas with Barry and Jones sail again with the lads of our Navy and Coast Guard on all of the perilous seven seas. New weapons are at hand. The scale of warfare is broader and the fields of battle are more far flung, but it is the same American spirit, the same will to win, and the same understanding of what is at stake that gives to our men in battle today the strength and the courage to vanquish the hordes of Nazis and Japs who until lately believed themselves unconquerable.

It is well, on this day of independence, that we celebrate the immortal quality of this spirit of America. It is well, too, that we whose racial heritage may not reach back to the colonial days on this side of the water join in that celebration. We also are partakers of the American spirit. We love the rocks and rills of this, our country, because we, too, have sought and found our freedom here. Our sons fight for that freedom with the same purpose and the same resolve as the direct descendants of the minutemen of the old colony.

The Yankee Division today is no less patriotic, no less American, no less dedicated to a final victory for freedom in this great country, than was the Continenal Army that camped on the Charles in 1775.

It is right, therefore, that we pay tribute not only to the patriots of the Revolution, who in this setting struck the first blow for America, but also to our own sons, the flesh and blood of this generation, who fight all over the world for the same free country.

The Continental Army achieved its first great victory in the liberation of Boston. The American Army today is also the liberator of cities. The world was amazed when the proud regiments of George the Third evacuated this prize port of the New World, rather than endure a siege laid by the farmers of New England. The world today is equally thrilled by the liberation of Rome—the first city of all Christendom—through the triumphant marches of an American Army in Italy.

It must have been with fervent prayers of thanksgiving that the people of the Eternal City watched the banners of the New World, many of them carried by Italian-American doughboys, as they passed through the historic arches of that ancient citadel. The liberation of Rome by American troops this year means what the winning of Boston meant in the Revolution. It means that American freedom is on the march, carrying with it the blessings of liberty. It means that other great cities now in the hands of agressors shall also fall. It means that victory and peace for all liberty-loving peoples are near at hand.

But Independence Day is not a day for the celebration only of victories in battle. On this day in 1776 our forefathers, while in the midst of battle, proclaimed to the world the basic principles of political freedom as conceived by men who had undertaken to hew a new nation out of the forests of an unexplored continent. The Declaration of Independence was an inevitable proclamation because it gave expression to the very hearts of the colonists. It was also a timely document, because while war was still waged and the outcome still in doubt it gave direction and inspiration to the men on the battle line. They knew why they fought, but they needed to know that all the people of the Colonies were dedicated to the same high purpose.

And so when the couriers galloped away from Philadelphia bringing news to all the Colonies, North and South, of the final, irrevocable, and unanimous decision that the fight was for a new nation—based upon the eternal principles of freedom—national unity in the New World was born. In this respect and at this hour we present-day Americans might well give renewed strength to our men in arms by evidence of a greater unity here behind the lines.

Today we still hold firmly to the doctrines of that eighteenth century declaration. As our forefathers arraigned George the Third for his indefensible acts of aggression in America—so do we charge our enemies with crimes against freedom. As our forefathers—for the right to be self-governed, and free from the aggression of tyrants—pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors, so do we, today, dedicate all that we are, and all that we have, for triumph of the just cause we defend.

Total war is thought to be a new concept. No one who reads the Declaration of Independence, and who knows of the unqualified and unanimous support which that declaration received from the patriots in every colony, can doubt that total war, total effort, and total sacrifice, was pledged by the people of America as they created and sought to defend a new nation on this continent.

Today the world marvels at the speed, the efficiency, and the success with which the United States has been mobilized and transformed into the most powerful war machine on earth. But I say to you, that the totality of our war effort today is no more remarkable than the totality of the war effort of those patriots who, surrounded by the institutions, the garrisons, and the vested interests of a despotic royal system, dared to rebel and to fight up and down this Atlantic seaboard until victory was theirs.

Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, these are the inalienable God-given rights for which this Nation was made and for which it still fights. When we recite this hallowed phrase we dwell most often upon liberty, and too little upon pursuit of happiness. We are ever vigilent for the protection of that institutional liberty which is based upon a democratic form of government. Let us not be forgetful of the God-given right to pursue happiness under any form of government.

Happiness as visualized by the authors of the Declaration was that sublime state in which individuals would be at peace with their God and at peace with their neighbors. It did not imply reckless mirth, or license on any of the outward signs of earthly pleasure. Men may know happiness in hardship, privation and suffering, if they are good and charitable men, and true sons of God.

But oppression by a tyrant is the denial of the right to happiness, because it is a challenge to the dignity of one who is created in the image of God—and that, in essence, was the charge made against George the Third.

If we are true to the Declaration of Independence, we are obliged, as patriotic Americans, to insist upon the observance of the inalienable rights of man from all quarters—both within and without our country. And if we fight today to preserve a system of free government that is based upon the dignity of man, as we do, we must be careful that our own actions, within our own country, are consistent with our war aims.

It is lamentable indeed, in this hour of great national crisis, that we should have to admit that the pursuit of happiness seems threatened even within our borders. While we send our sons beyond the seas, to wage war against the aggressor of mankind, we permit to thrive among our own citizenry the cancerous growth of intolerance. While we proclaim to the world our national adherence to the inalienable rights of man, and our irrevocable dedication to the civil and religious guarantees of our own American constitution, we are blind to the insidious spread of racial and religious persecutions—even in neighborhoods where the initial battles for American freedom were fought.

No nation, however strong, however clothed with the outword symbol of liberty, can survive the internal persecution of its own citizens—even though the persecution be aimed at a small minority. The greatness of America might quickly be dissolved if this became a land where the deserving humble people of other parts of the world might no longer find protection. The proud banner of our Republic will be forever sullied if we allow rampant intolerance to strike down defenseless persons because of their race or creed.

There are those of us who still believe that the blessings which have been showered upon this land flow from a God who gives His grace to those who observe the basic virtues of good men. By and large the American people have been a charitable people. In the past, waves of ignorance and intolerance have beaten in vain against the strong and open heart of America. Let us in this hour, by our individual and collective rededication to the principles of our Declaration of Independence, resolve that the heart of America shall once more take unto her protection and care all those of our fellow citizens who are threatened with the cursed affliction of persecution.

It was 168 years ago today that a group of heroic Americans affixed their names to the Declaration of Independence. Among the charges which they made against George the Third was that he had excited domestic insurrection among the colonists. The signers representing the Massachusetts Bay Colony were Samuel and John Adams and Robert Treat Paine and Elbridge Gerry. They were not unmindful of the dangers to follow. They knew, oh so well, the consequences of failure. They were, as well, confident in "the protection of Divine Providence," as they pledged to each other their "lives, * * * fortunes, and [their] sacred honor."

By this great declaration they set forth on a great adventure—an adventure resulting finally in the establishment of the richest and most powerful nation in the world. Down through the years since that time, from generation to generation, has come the heritage which is now in our hands—and which is now being defended by our sons—our sons who are fighting on land and sea, and under the sea and in the air, all over the world. Largely through them we shall preserve the heritage, untarnished, for those generations yet to come.

Many of our sons will die—as men died in this neighborhood a long time ago—and to fully keep faith with them we must this time be certain of the role in which we are cast. They have met the enemy. They have suffered the weight and fullness of his brutality. They have seen the whites of his eyes and have felt his steel, and they now know, as we do, that in God's good time victory on the battlefield will be ours. When that victory comes—and God speed the day—and our enemies lay down their arms, our task is not yet finished. We must insist, under God's further guidance, upon a peace that will be lasting. We must stay at that task, and it may be a difficult task, until confident that tyrants cannot again rise to torment and torture men and nations.

The world leadership established by the courage and the vision and the blood of the founders must be maintained and exercised. We must renew our love for our neighbor, and our confidence in each other here at home.

Those who lighted the flame so many years ago, just yonder at Concord Bridge, showed us the way, and we must keep that torch aglow and held so high as to give light to the world.

On occasions during the passing years there have been mistakes, but there must not be a mistake this time.

Our loyal legions press forward, building battle monuments all over the globe—monuments in the form of restored freedom and peace—and we here at home, whose hearts beat with theirs, ask God's help as we seek to make certain that that peace shall endure.

Investigation of Record of Hon. Harry S. Truman, of Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I presume that every Senator is more or less familiar with the record made by Mr. Maurice Milligan, United States district attorney in Missouri. Mr. Milligan is the United States district attorney who successfully prosecuted the cases against the so-called Pendergast machine. Recently I learned that in response to an inquiry from a newspaperman, Mr. Milligan had written a letter concerning our colleague the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN]. I heard about it and wrote to Mr. Milligan asking if it were true that he had so responded to this inquiry from a newspaperman. I suggested that if it were true, I should like to have a copy of the letter.

Today I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. Milligan in reply to my question. I ask unanimous consent that that part of the letter which refers to the investigation and record of the Senator from Missouri in this connection be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 23, 1944.

Senator CARL A. HATCH,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of August 15, 1944, in regard to a letter or written statement that I made to a newspaperman concerning Senator HARRY S. TRUMAN, of Missouri.

My delay in answering was due to the fact that I was out of the city when your letter arrived and have only returned today.

In an interview with Mr. Ray Murphy, of Washington, D. C., in answer to an inquiry concerning Senator TRUMAN, I made the following statement in writing:

"JULY 27, 1944.

"DEAR SIR: In the long series of investigations conducted by my office involving vote frauds and other matters of corruption in Kansas City, the finger of suspicion was never at any time pointed in the direction of Senator HARRY S. TRUMAN.

"His record as a citizen and as a public official is above reproach."

MAURICE M. MILLIGAN,
United States Attorney.

An Independent R. E. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered at the third annual convention of the Association of Illinois Electric Cooperatives at Springfield, Ill., on August 17, 1944, by Harry Slattery, the Administrator of the R. E. A., and also an editorial from the St. Louis Star-Times of August 21, 1944, entitled "For an Independent R. E. A."

There being no objection, the address and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is the first public address I have made to an R. E. A. audience since the affairs of R. E. A. and of the national association came under review by the Senate of the United States.

I have deliberately kept silent and not because I had nothing to say. I have had, and very definite and positive things. But I have considered it wise, out of respect for the Senate investigation, and in consideration of the whole situation, to hold my tongue until an appropriate time arrived. I am sure you will appreciate that this has not been an easy thing for an Irishman to do, in the light of what has taken place. Now, however, I feel that I am free, and it is time that I should speak.

I am glad to be here for several reasons. It is always an encouragement to me to meet face to face men and women who take R. E. A. seriously, and so demonstrate that they realize the deep meaning of our movement for the restoration of American agriculture to its proper place in the national economy, and therefore for the security of the Nation. Without flattery, I regard Illinois as one of the leaders among the States in this rural electrification crusade. That judgment rests upon personal observation, and from scanning the cold figures of the statistical tables. You have made active use of the opportunity R. E. A. offered to bring to the farm homes the blessings of electricity, which Edison said flowed from the hand of God.

It was considerate of your chairman, in extending an invitation to address your third annual convention, to permit me to select my own subject. It is related directly to the most prominent topic of your meeting—post-war planning and post-war execution. As to that subject, you may remember that I early had a live interest. In October 1942 I appointed the first R. E. A. committee to consider post-war problems and have given much attention to it since. I congratulate you upon your interest in this matter, and I am glad that Senator LUCAS, who is here tonight, and other Senators and Congressmen on both sides of the political party fence are likewise taking a keen interest.

I am sincere in saying that the topic I have chosen to present to you, the independence of R. E. A. is, in my judgment, of crucial importance to the welfare of this great agency, not only for this fall, or for the immediate post-war period, but for the next 25 years, at least, by which time or before, you will have discharged your obligation to Uncle Sam and be on your own.

As to the text for this talk, I desire to read to you and refresh your memories concerning the ninth section of the R. E. A. Act of 1936.

"SEC. 9. This act shall be administered entirely on a nonpartisan basis, and in the appointment of officials, the selection of employees, and in the promotion of any such officials or employees, no political test or qualification shall be permitted or given consideration, but all such appointments and promotions shall be given and made on the basis of merit and efficiency. If the Administrator herein provided for is found by the President of the United States to be guilty of a violation of this section, he shall be removed from office by the President, and any appointee or selection of officials or employees made by the Administrator who is found guilty of a violation of this act shall be removed by the Administrator."

This language, written by Senator Norris, and inserted in the Norris-Rayburn Act, was taken verbatim from the T. V. A. Act of 1933, and the whole Nation knows that its observance has been one of the greatest factors in making T. V. A. the success that it is today—a success of which all Americans are proud.

The prohibition this section contains rests upon a fundamental principle which is emphatically approved as sound and necessary by a vast majority of the superintendents, managers, directors, and consumer members of our eight-hundred-and-odd R. E. A. cooperatives. And also by the ablest and most disinterested authorities on business management by Government agencies administering economic undertakings like public power and rural electrification projects.

The crystal-clear intent of this section is to prohibit the management and employees of R. E. A.—some 600 when the war broke, and certain to exceed a thousand in the near post-war future—from being converted into a political machine for the benefit of any political party in any election, State or National. In calling your attention to this provision as a broad principle of Government and an efficient administration, as well as the subject of independence, I am certain you will agree that I am not violating the spirit or text of the section I have just read.

It will be no news to you that a Senate inquiry has been in progress; that one of its objectives was to consider whether or not R. E. A. should be made independent again; nor that the subcommittee conducting the inquiry, consisting of two Democrats and two Republicans, has made a unanimous interim report recommending this restoration.

It is unfortunate that a series of events took place that made this investigation inevitable. I shall not recount them here. They are known to you. One thing, however, is certain. It is better to have had the inquiry made, not by opponents of Rural Electrification Administration, but by its friends and supporters of rural electrification.

The most important feature of the report is the recommendation for the restoration of the independence of Rural Electrification Administration at the earliest possible date. I approve that recommendation because it supports a principle for the permanent welfare of Rural Electrification Administration, far above the personal interest of myself or any other man or set of men.

This question is being discusssed in every cooperative in the Nation today. It is in the mind of every person here tonight. It is being considered by thousands of interested friends outside the Rural Electrification Administration fold. You have a right to know where I stand, and why, and I shall tell you.

The act of 1936 provides that "All of the powers of Rural Electrification Administration shall be exercised by an administrator." Further, the exercise of these powers was preserved to the Administrator in the Reorganization Act of 1939. Listen carefully to this language:

"It direct that the 'functions and activities of Rural Electrification Administration shall be administered in that department by the Administrator of Rural Electrification Administration under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.'"

Let us ask, Why was R. E. A. and its Administrator thus made independent, just as was the three-man board of T. V. A.? And why was it, like T. V. A., in the words of the President, "clothed with the power of government but possessed of the flexibility and initiative of a private enterprise?" Plainly because it was a business enterprise in behalf of the people which needed business management. To get things done it must have freedom of action, and be protected from the ancient routine, red tape methods of the old bureaus as well as from politicians.

It was a constructive job that required first-class initiative. But it also was a defensive job, and still is, despite the notion of those misguided souls who seem to think we can now safely cooperate and drink pink tea with men who would rejoice to see every co-op in the United States in bankruptcy, and many of whom will do their sly best to put them there.

I repeat. It was a brand new enterprise, unfitted for men of fixed viewpoints and habits. "Area service"—which meant making electricity available to every last farmer in a given feasible area at a price he could afford to pay, had never been tried before. The private companies derided and rejected it because their experience showed it unsound from their profit-making viewpoint. Their engineering precedents were of almost no value to us. They were accustomed to build lines to serve city people. We had to build lines to serve farmers over wide areas.

In this unknown field we had to find our way. We had to pioneer in law. We had to pioneer in engineering. We had to pioneer in finance. We had to pioneer in management. We had to pioneer in education and information, especially to convince official America, the press, the engineering world, the public, and some farmers, that the thing could be done. We had to convince doubting Thomases that the farmers had enough business sense and cohesiveness to own and manage electric cooperatives. I congratulate you in Illinois, and the cooperatives in every State on having given them the surprise of their lives.

All these divisions of our work were intertwined and interrelated. Team play was necessary. The divisions and sections of R. E. A. had to work and learn together, and the men to know each other. This close team play is still necessary for the days ahead.

Above all, they needed and they acquired in the school of experience understanding of the character and importance of this great undertaking, and that, over the first 6 years, is what happened. Save for one or two deplorable exceptions, there was harmony, as the committee found. But just about the time we had learned our job and gotten our gait, we were dismembered, shoved around, moved out, and lost a large number of our most experienced and loyal men and women. Worst of all, we have lost the old esprit de corps.

But let John Carmody tell it. When he was before the committee he was questioned as to his experience, and his advice was asked. He said: "We had a small, flexible organization which could turn around fast and meet its obligations. We had the statutes of Congress that were our guide. That is all we needed. We had our appropriations, and we had to live within the appropriations and within the statutes. It was all very simple and effective."

Asked if he felt that he could not efficiently conduct the affairs of R. E. A. if, whenever it was necessary to do something he had to go through Agriculture and get approval over in another department, he replied:

"Well, it just put five or six more layers on top of us, and it wasn't a question of Department of Agriculture with me, it was just the question of going from an independent agency that knew what it was doing and knew how to do it and was getting the job done, going into another agency where we would have to educate a great many people, chiefly clerks, because the business of a bureau finally gets turned over to a few clerks, not to the people who really know the total administrative job, but to clerks irrespective of their titles, that is what it is."

Asked why he resigned, he replied:

"When the reorganization plan was announced in the newspapers, and it was clear that R. E. A. would lose its independence and become a bureau in a very large organization, I determined instantly to resign, and I so advised the President."

And now let us see what Senator Norris, who more than any other one man is known as the father of R. E. A., has to say. On June 5, 1939, just before the transfer was effected, he wrote a letter to the President which, by his permission, was placed in the record of the hearings. He said in part:

"MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am very much worried about the Rural Electrification Administration. The recent order transferring this organization to the Department of Agriculture, I fear, is going to result in great damage to that Administration. I have had a conference with Mr. Carmody and have gone over the situation with him and I am afraid the transfer as proposed is going to mean his resignation. * * * He has built up a wonderful organization. It commands the respect of the farmers of the Nation. He is of the opinion that if this order is carried out, much of the work of this organization, accomplished under great difficulties, will to a great extent be frustrated and destroyed. I cannot help but share with him this belief."

And what does the Senator think today? I quote from a recent letter:

"In the act setting up the R. E. A. it is provided it shall be nonpartisan and independent of politics. It is conceded I think by every friend of the R. E. A. the Nation over that it is necessary for its success, that it be freed from partisan politics and that it shall not become a partisan political football of any political party."

And again:

"I would be glad to let every man and woman in the United States know, if they care anything about my opinion, that I am opposed and always have been to having R. E. A. transferred to any Department of Government. It ought to be an independent organization, and it must, if it is going to succeed. * * * I am in favor of any bill that Congress can enact into law that will restore R. E. A. to its independence."

Permit me to envision my hopes for the future administration of R. E. A. I trust that in 1960, on the occasion of the twenty-fifth birthday dinner of R. E. A., some speaker will be able truthfully to say:

"The wisdom of the founders of the Rural Electrification Administration in making it an independent business-like enterprise; in protecting it from partisan political influences; and in basing the selection and promotion of its employees solely upon merit and efficiency has been amply demonstrated.

"It was a happy circumstance for the farmers and people of the United States that the Seventy-fourth Congress which met in 1936 recognized that there are no such things as Democratic, Republican, Progressive, Socialist, or any other kind of political kilowatt hours—only, in this case, rural kilowatt hours.

"For 25 years, with one interim now happily forgotten, the Administrator, the division chiefs, the technical staffs, and the employees of R. E. A. down to the last messenger boy, have been undisturbed in the discharge of their duties by the ups and downs of politics and of campaigns. It has made little difference to them, as public servants, which party was 'in' or 'out' or how many changes in Cabinet officers occurred.

"The once tremendous task of electrifying rural America has now been accomplished. The fact that rural rates today are below levels once thought impossible, that there have been so few failures, that the vast majority of the older co-ops are now out of debt, and that the institution is an honor to the Nation is in no small degree due to the observance of the law written to prevent R. E. A. becoming a patronage dump. And further to the fact that the cooperatives have kept themselves free from self-seekers, political henchmen, and racketeers."

In conclusion, let me read the last paragraph of my little book, once in circulation, titled "Rural America Lights Up."

"R. E. A. is a fine example of the functioning of the democratic process. The very method by which electric cooperatives are organized and managed manifests true democracy at work and stimulates the courage to make it work. Millions of men, women and young people are being educated and trained in the application of democratic principles to industry and finance. R. E. A. has its part to play in arresting rural decline and restoring farm life to the vigor it possessed when the Nation was young."

[From the St. Louis Star-Times of August 21, 1944]

FOR AN INDEPENDENT RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

Breaking a silence which he stated he had maintained out of deference to a Senate investigation of his custodianship of the Rural Electrification Administration, Harry Slattery at last challenged his foes to open combat with the watchword, "I stand for an independent R. E. A."

The sordid plot of power-grasping interests, spearheaded by the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association and its president, Clyde T. Ellis, which for more than a year have embarrassed and impeded the R. E. A. with an insurance project, is better known than he, perhaps, realizes. Only in cabalistic Washington could a man like Slattery, who made an important contribution to such conservation projects as Boulder Dam, the Federal Power Act, the investigation of the Teapot Dome scandal, be kicked around for insisting that R. E. A., like T. V. A., "be administered entirely on the nonpartisan basis," as the charter of both agencies reads. It was time that he break his silence and live up to the nomen, bestowed upon him by Teddy Roosevelt, of "the Irish rebel."

Although former Senator George Norris, of Nebraska, had repeatedly come to Slattery's defense, his vindication was not effected until a Senate investigation gave him a clean bill of health and recommended that the agency be restored to independence at the "earliest possible time." Simultaneously this recommendation directs a well-deserved slap at Secretary of Agriculture Wickard, for the committee which is investigating R. E. A. is an Agricultural Subcommittee. It is a matter of record that from the day 5 years ago when

R. E. A. became an adjunct of the Department of Agriculture it has been shot through with red tape and obnoxious influences.

Will the Senate make an end of this political horseplay and restore R. E. A.'s independence? Will it do so "at the earliest possible time"? That time is now if R. E. A. is to play its useful role in post-war rehabilitation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER
OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System on Tuesday, the 8th of August, by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, pressing reconversion measures with which the Senate Military Affairs Committee are busy have prevented me from speaking to you tonight as I originally planned from the platform of the Second Emergency Conference to Save the Jewish People of Europe.

This second emergency conference, which ended tonight in New York City, had before it—as its name suggests—a most important and urgent task, the task of formulating concrete claims and proposals to effectuate the rescue of the several million Jews surviving in Europe today.

The fact that a Second Emergency Conference to Save the Jewish People of Europe was necessary, following the first one, held just over a year ago, is sad in itself. For, despite the able planning of the first conference and despite the very active work of the crusading emergency committee to save the Jewish people of Europe during the elapsed year, this most tragic problem is still before us awaiting determined and large-scale action by the governments of the United Nations.

We all know well enough the magnitude of the disaster which has befallen the Jewish people of Europe; nearly 35 percent of their total have been murdered. Proportionately this would mean 18,000,000 British casualties, 62,000,000 Russian casualties or 46,000,000 American casualties.

The disaster has not come suddenly. It is the culmination of long decades of persecution and confusion in which nothing is definite and clear, not even the meaning of the term "Jew."

And it is the confusion about their status which has made the wholesale murder of the Jews of Europe possible and has hampered intervention on their behalf.

I believe, therefore, that it is of the utmost importance to the rescue efforts that their position be clarified, at least as to terminology and definition.

There are Jews in Russia and there are Jews in England. Millions of my fellow Americans are Jews. What is their relation to, and what differentiates them from, the Jews of Axis Rumania and Hungary or from the Jews of Poland? Spiritually they are all Jews. But, practically speaking, American Jews are members of a great and mighty free Nation—the United States of America; the Jews of England are Englishmen; the Jews of Russia are Russians; but the Jews of Warsaw and Bucharest, like the Jews of Jerusalem, are—what?

This "what" is the stumbling block of all efforts to rescue the Jews who live under that great question mark. The Axis maintain that they are nationals of the country in which they live and that their slaughter is a purely internal affair.

The fact, however, is that these people, together with those of their kinsmen who were fortunate enough to make their way back to Palestine, constitute a nation whose national life was suspended for 1,800 years and which is now reborn.

Thus, these people of Europe and Palestine factually constitute the renascent Hebrew Nation. Consequently, Hebrew nationality does not mean Englishmen who practice the Jewish religion; it most certainly does not mean the millions of Americans, commonly referred to as Jews, who are actually Americans of Hebrew descent and of the Jewish religion. They do not belong to the Hebrew Nation, no more than President Roosevelt belongs to the Dutch Nation or Mr. Wendell Willkie belongs to the German Nation. They are Americans first, last, and always. Their ancestors way back, 2,000 years ago, were Hebrews.

Justice Frankfurter, for example, is not a Hebrew. He is an American of Hebrew descent, practicing the Jewish religion, exactly as Justice Murphy is an American of Irish descent, practicing the Catholic religion.

This might be an abstract and academic problem as far as Justice Frankfurter and the other millions of Americans of Hebrew descent are concerned. To the Hebrew Nation in Europe it is a problem of the gravest urgency and reality. Indeed, it is a problem of life and death.

Now, if we understand the true status of the Hebrew in Europe we are in a position to take immediate action to check, at last, the continued slaughter of millions more of innocent men, women, and children.

Up to several weeks ago in Hungary, thousands of Hebrews were daily packed into cattle trains which took them to the extermination camp of Poland. The International Red Cross in Geneva has made it known on the authority of the Hungarian Government that all Hebrews in Hungary "holding entrance visas to Palestine will receive permission from the authorities to leave for that country."

This creates an entirely new situation in which the responsibility is thrown on our shoulders and, more particularly, on the shoulders of the British Government.

As an American and as a Christian, I venture to suggest to the British Government, as the mandatory for Palestine, that it is their inescapable moral duty to answer the Hungarian Government—through the International Red Cross—that every Hebrew will be admitted into Palestine.

I am, of course, aware of the unfortunate disagreements regarding the political status of Palestine which have forced this land to play such a tragically small and passive part at a time when its sons and daughters have undergone the greatest ordeal of their martyred history.

I was happy to learn, therefore, of a proposal made in this direction by the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation which separates the rescue question from the complexity of the Palestine problem.

The Hebrew committee proposes that there be established in Palestine emergency rescue shelters—free ports—into which all Hebrews fleeing their German tormentors should be admitted and kept in a manner similar to the emergency refugee shelter which the President has established at Oswego, N. Y.

At the recent conventions of both the Republican and Democratic Parties, resolutions were passed and planks inserted in both platforms to the effect that the gates of Palestine be thrown wide open to all escaping Hebrews. This represents the will of practically the entire American Nation. Certainly we are all, therefore, for the immediate establishment in Palestine of emergency rescue shelters.

It is creditable that the Hebrew committee, moved by the horrible plight of its people, should concentrate all its efforts to obtain the establishment of emergency rescue shelters. But I venture to suggest that is not enough; that the time is overdue when we of the United Nations must extend to the tormented Hebrew people our brotherly hand of solace and that this should be done with the dignity due an ancient and honorable nation which, in the time of its sovereign existence, gave us the greatest book of all, the Bible.

It was more than 2 years ago that I first urged that we recognize the Hebrew nation as one of the United Nations—and a fellow partner in the common war against Axis tyranny.

Let it be made clear that the 3,000,000 Hebrew men, women, and children who have died in this war have not died in vain as useless victims of German mass murder but that they have died as honored casualties in a world struggle for decent humanity.

Let us recognize the surviving 5,000,000 Hebrews as a renascent nation whose banner waves among those of the other United Nations.

Let the Hebrew guerrilla bands who are fighting the enemy in Europe and the 30,000 Hebrews in the Palestinian Regiment be given the chance to fight in their own name and under their own banner in a Hebrew Army.

Let us permit their own statesmen and representatives to participate in the councils of the United Nations where their interests are involved, such as the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, the Inter-Governmental Committee on Refugees, and, above all, on the Inter-Allied Commission on War Crimes in London, for it is against the Hebrews that 80 percent of the atrocities in this war have been committed.

And finally, let their statesmen as representatives of a people who have lost more than one-third of their population in this war participate in the settlement of the peace and in the planning of a better world in which their nation too can live in freedom and with honor, in a world free from the fear of aggression and war.

Newdealand, My Newdealand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, though I feel quite certain that my good friend, Mr. F. J. McCollum, editor of one of California's most influential dailies, the Coalinga Record, would modestly disclaim the title of "poet laureate," even of his own home town, least of all, of that mystic realm of Newdealia, a recent production of his, one which was inspired by recent political trends, is well worthy of incorporation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a most timely contribution to the gayety of the Nation, if not to the comfort of those whose administrative activities he so gently chides.

Mr. Speaker, McCollum's poetical pronouncement to which I have just referred is the following:

NEWDEALAND, MY NEWDEALAND

(Tune: My Maryland)

With humble hearts to thee we bow,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
No power but thine shall rule us now,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
Where once Old Glory floated free
Waves now the banner of F. D.,
And prostrate in the dust are we,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.

Can e'er a fairer name be found?
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
There's music in the lilting sound—
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
Thy radio words that sear and burn
Let those who question swiftly learn
From coast to coast and then return,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.

Our every need thy favor fills,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
Except to meet our income bills,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
Beneath thy dictates so benign
That daily greet us, line by line,
Our very garbage cans are thine,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.

Thou dost protect us from all care,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
No voice but thine shall fill the air,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
We can but follow, thou shalt lead,
Direct our very thought and deed,
Thou tellest what to plant and feed,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.

Thy agents clutter every town,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
Thy spoken wrath shall crush us down,
Newdealand, My Newdealand.
Thy will be done, oh, Mighty One.
The earth, the air, the stars, the sun,
The whole shebang is thine to run,
Newdealand, Oh Newdealand.

Suffrage for the District of Columbia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask that a sound and timely editorial from the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star be printed in the RECORD. I am heartily in accord with the suggestion made by the Star that the Congress should take favorable action on the joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from Texas, Representative SUMNERS, and myself proposing an amendment to the Constitution which will give the people of the District of Columbia a vote for President and Vice President, and will also make it possible for them to elect a Representative in Congress.

As I see it, the argument made by the Star is unanswerable. No sound reason can be given why the people of the District of Columbia should not be given the vote, the same as all other American citizens. This is particularly true so far as the soldiers now defending our Government are concerned. They are fighting for their country the same as all other American soldiers, and are making a great sacrifice. They are paying taxes to support the Government, the same as the people of all other cities, but they are wrongfully deprived of the rights of American citizens, so far as a part in their Government is concerned.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LETTER FROM A SOLDIER

"If we Washingtonians now serving in the armed forces, or those at home, are capable of fighting, or running the war front at home, why are we not as capable of casting a vote as any other American?"

The soldier who asks that question of The Star—his letter is printed elsewhere on this page today—has every reason to be puzzled over a condition that is a shameful contradiction of many of the things he is told he is fighting for. He and his comrades and their families here at home are, of course, "as capable" of casting a vote as other Americans, if capability in that respect is measured in terms of intelligence, loyalty, and other marks of good citizenship.

They cannot vote because the men who wrote the Constitution, without knowing where or when the Capital they provided for would be founded, failed to provide a method of voting for the people who some day might live there. They may have taken it for granted that the States which ceded the land for a Capital would take care of the voting rights of their citizens.

But that failure, or oversight, then is subject to remedy now. The remedy lies in the joint resolution by Representative SUMNERS, of Texas, and Senator CAPPER, of Kansas, proposing an amendment of the Constitution as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to provide that there shall be in the Congress and among the electors of President and Vice President members elected by the people of the District constituting the seat of the government of the United States, in such numbers and with such powers as the Congress shall determine. All legislation hereunder shall be subject to amendment and repeal."

A Summary and Explanation of the Provisions of the So-called Dingell-Celler Bill (H. R. 5227) To Provide a National Program for War Mobilization and Reconversion, and for Other Purposes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, in order that the membership of the House may have an opportunity to understand in as few words as possible the purpose and intent of the Dingell-Celler bill—H. R. 5227—I have requested unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a summary and explanation of the several provisions of this bill.

This bill was drawn by a nonpartisan unofficial committee of the membership of the House. In drawing the bill the committee has considered all of the legislation that has been offered in connection with the subject of providing a national program for war mobilization and reconversion.

We contacted and had the benefit of the advice and counsel of representatives of the American Federation of Labor, the C. I. O., and the railroad brotherhoods. I am informed, and believe my information is correct, that the above bill has the approval and support of each of the above-named labor unions.

It is a compromise bill. It has been carefully drawn. It deserves the favorable consideration of the membership of this House.

A summary of the provisions of the bill is as follows:

Section 11 declares the objectives of the act.

Section 102 establishes the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion, to be headed by a director at a salary of $15,000 a year. Included in the office would be the Office of Contract Settlement, the Surplus War Property Administration, and the Retraining and Reemployment Administration.

The Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion is authorized to formulate such plans as are necessary to meet the problems arising out of the transition from war to peace; to issue directives to other agencies; to make appropriate studies, reports, and recommendations to Congress; to consult and cooperate with governmental and private groups; and to employ personnel to carry out these activities. Reports are to be submitted to Congress quarterly, summarizing the work of the office and appraising the activities of the various executive agencies in the field of demobilization and post-war adjustment.

Section 103 creates an advisory board, appointed by the President, subject to Senate confirmation, consisting of three representatives of industry, three representatives of labor, three representatives of agriculture, and one public representative who is to be chairman. The Board is to advise with the Director with respect to war mobilization and reconversion and make recommendations to him relating to legislation, policies, and procedures.

Section 104 establishes a special joint committee of the Senate and House on post-war adjustment. It is to be composed of four Members from each House, not more than two from each House being members of the majority party. The committee is to make a full and complete study with regard to legislation, demobilization and post-war adjustment, consult with the President, the Director and appropriate standing Congressional committees, and study and review the report submitted by the Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion.

Section 201 directs Government contracting agencies to terminate prime contracts for war production whenever performance under such contracts will not be needed for the prosecution of the war. Such contracts are not to be continued merely for the purpose of providing business and employment unless continuance in whole or in part is necessary to avoid substantial injury to a plant or property.

Section 202 provides that curtailment of war production or termination of war contracts are to be managed so as to be integrated and synchronized with the expansion or resumption of other war or nonwar production. In order to effectuate this policy, Government contracting agencies are to report current and anticipated changes in requirements to the Chairman of the War Production Board. Government control agencies are to permit the expansion, resumption, or initiation of nonwar production whenever the war the war effort is not adversely affected; and the Chairman of the War Production Board is authorized to establish policies to be followed by Government contracting agencies in selecting individual contracts, or classes of contracts, for curtailment, nonrenewal, or termination.

Section 203 creates in the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion a board of appeals, to consist of three members to be appointed by the President, subject to Senate confirmation, each of whom is to receive $8,000 annually and serve 2 years. Persons aggrieved by the action of a Government control agency in allocating available materials may apply for a hearing before the board of appeals. If the board of appeals is satisfied that the action of the Government control agency substantially interferes with, or curtails the operations of, the appellant and that, as a result, serious unemployment of the appellant's employees will come about, or that the interests of the consumers of the appellant's products will be substantially impaired, the board of appeals will so report to the Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion, who will thereupon allocate sufficient of the short material to the appellant as will be necessary to prevent hardship to the appellant's employees, or to the consumers of his product.

Section 204 instructs the Attorney General to make surveys to determine whether any factor exists which may tend to eliminate competition, create a strengthened monopoly, injure small business, and otherwise promote undue concentration of economic power, either during the war or in the period of post-war transition. The Attorney General is to report to Congress on the results of his surveys and recommend such legislation as he deems desirable.

Section 301 sets out the objectives of title III, which are, basically, to facilitate the maximum utilization of the national manpower, both during the war and during the transition from war to peacetime production.

Section 302 creates a retraining and reemployment administration, to be headed by an administrator appointed by the President for 2 years, subject to Senate confirmation, who is to receive $12,000 annually. The administrator, under the direction of the Director, is to establish a unified reemployment program, to maintain full information on declining and increasing employment opportunities, provide for placement of workers in employment and to oversee the financing of workers during such times as employment is not available. The issuance of regulations by the Administrator to govern the activities of Federal agencies in these fields is authorized.

Section 303 creates an advisory committee for retraining and reemployment, consisting of representatives from 10 Government agencies mentioned by name, and such others as the Administrator may designate.

Section 304 directs the War Production Board and other agencies in possession of such data to furnish to the Administrator full information on current and projected schedules of production. The War and Navy Departments are instructed, insofar as military security permits, to keep the Administrator informed on current and projected rates of discharge of servicemen. The policy is enunciated that the armed forces are to discharge servicemen as rapidly as war and defense needs permit. The retention of personnel in the armed forces merely for the purpose of preventing unemployment or awaiting opportunities for employment is prohibited.

Section 305 instructs the Administrator to perform his duties through the facilities and personnel of other Government agencies and through appropriate State agencies.

Section 306 authorizes the Administrator to facilitate recruitment, transfer, and placement of workers by payment of transportation expenses to new jobs, or to bona fide residences (within the United States), or to both. The traveling allowance is limited to the amount provided by the Federal Government for its employees. The United States Employment Service will be continued as a nationally operated service for a period of 2 years after the termination of hostilities.

Section 307 gives the Administrator general supervision and direction of the activities of Government agencies relating to the training and retraining of personnel released from war work. In consultation with appropriate Government agencies, he is to develop plans relating to training and retraining.

Section 308 provides that there is to be no amendment or modifications of powers now vested in the Veterans Administration, or the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

Section 401 (a) and (b) fix the principle that a person for whom suitable employment cannot be secured is to be entitled, within the limits hereafter set forth, to interim placement benefits. Beginning with the fourth month after the enactment of the act, benefits would be paid to unemployed qualified employees in the amount of 75 percent of weekly wages, but such benefits are not to be less than $8 per week, nor more than $20 per week for a single person, or $25 per week for a person with dependents. Benefits would be limited to 52 weeks in any 2 consecutive years.

Section 401 (c) provides that a person is not unemployed if he does not maintain an active application for employment at a public employment office; a man is not counted as being unemployed on Sunday unless it is in a continuous period of unemployment. Persons receiving annuities or pensions, unemployment allowances, vocational educational allowances, or similar benefits are not counted as unemployed; but if the interim placement benefit exceeds such other benefits, the amount of the excess may be paid to the individual.

Section 401 (d) provides that the employee is to be disqualified for the receipt of benefits if he fails without good cause to accept suitable work, or to report for work if he is so directed; if he is discharged or suspended for misconduct related to his employment; if he left work voluntarily without good cause; if his unemployment was due to stoppage of work because of a labor dispute other than lock-out; or if he made or helped to make any false or fraudulent statement in order to cause benefits to be paid. The labor-dispute disqualification does not apply if the employee who is unemployed is not directly interested in the dispute which causes the stoppage.

Section 401 (f) and (g) sets forth the standards of suitable employment in terms copied from the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Section 401 (h) provides that a person may not be compelled to apply for or accept transportation away from his present location, as provided in section 306.

Section 401 (i) provides penalties for making or causing to be made or aiding in making false or fraudulent statements.

Section 402 (a) provides that a qualified employee is to be one who in the calendar year next preceding the beginning of the benefit year earned $150 or more in wages. This provision is identical with that of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Section 402 (b) requires the Administrator to offer to each State unemployment compensation agency opportunity to participate in the administration of interim placement benefits. The Administrator must permit such participation if the State agrees to receive claims for benefits, to adjudicate and pay them or forward them to the Treasury for payment and to furnish funds to the extent that benefits would be payable under the State law. The Administrator may terminate an agreement with a State upon a finding by the Social Security Board, affirmed, if the State requests, by a court, that the State is failing substantially to comply with the agreement.

Section 402 (c) provides that the Railroad Retirement Board and the Unemployment Compensation Board of the District of Columbia are to participate in the administration of interim placement benefits.

Section 402 (d) authorizes the Administrator to use Federal agencies in the administration of interim placement benefits to whatever extent is necessary after the services of the State agencies and the Railroad Retirement Board have been used to the maximum practicable extent.

Section 402 (e) gives the claimants for benefits the right to be heard before a State appellate tribunal, where a State administers the benefits, or before a tribunal of a Federal agency, in cases where the Railroad Retirement Board or some other Federal agency administers the benefits.

Section 402 (f) authorizes Federal court review decisions of the agencies administering interim placement benefits.

Section 402 (g) limits review to the procedure prescribed in the bill.

Section 402 (h) provides for court review of a finding by the Social Security Board that the State is not complying with the terms of its agreement with the Administrator.

Section 402 (i) provides for the determination of the respective obligations of the Federal Government and the State agencies. The Federal Government is to pay for the cost of the benefits over and above the amounts payable under the State laws.

Section 402 (j) provides for the determination of the respective obligations of the District of Columbia, the Railroad Retirement Board, and the Federal Government.

Section 402 (k) provides for the payment by the Administrator of the extra expenses of the Railroad Retirement Board incurred by reason of its participation in the administration of interim placement benefits.

Section 403 authorizes the Administrator to delegate his authority to appropriate persons or agencies. So long as an agreement with a State agency is in effect, delegation of such authority to such agency may not be revoked or modified.

Section 404 confers general administrative powers on the Administrator, authorizes employment of personnel, authorizes securing of necessary information, and provides procedures if necessary information is refused by the persons having possession of it.

Section 405 amends the G. I. bill of rights by adding to the readjustment allowance under title V an additional weekly allowance of $5 for each of not more than 3 dependents. Thus, the maximum weekly amount payable under title V of the G. I. bill of rights would be $35. Dependents would include unmarried children under 18 or children of any age if because of mental defects they are incapable of self-support, wives, and parents incapable of self-support and dependent on the veteran. The limitation on readjustment allowances of 52 weeks is changed to an amount, in any 2 consecutive years, equal to 52 times the weekly benefit.

Section 501 authorizes the Federal Works Administrator to make, from funds appropriated for that purpose, loans or advances to the States and their subdivisions, to aid in the making of investigations and studies, surveys, designs, plans, specifications, or the like preliminary to the construction of public works. Funds appropriated for this purpose are to be allotted, 90 percent in the proportion which the population of each State bears to the total population of all the States, and 10 percent in accordance with the discretion of the Federal Works Administrator, except that no State may be allotted less than one-half of 1 percent of the total available funds. Advances are to be repaid if and when the construction of the public works so planned is undertaken.

Section 601 contains definitions. Most of these are routine. The following are important:

A week of unemployment is any 7 consecutive calendar days in which a person has remuneration of less than $3.

Dependents include unmarried children under 18 dependent on an individual; the wife of an individual dependent on him; and dependent parents incapable of self-support.

Employment means any service performed as a civilian after December 31, 1940, by an employee for his employer and includes civilian service outside of the United States for a United States war contractor by a person who was on September 16 a citizen of or resident in the United States. Governmental service and maritime service is also included. Excluded is service for a foreign government, domestic service, or service for a member of the person's family.

Weekly wages are defined as one-thirteenth of the wages in that quarter of the calendar year preceding the beginning of the benefit year in which wages were highest. This is the usual wage base under State compensation laws.

Section 602 authorizes the necessary appropriations.

Section 603 provides that the act except as otherwise specified becomes effective immediately and terminates 24 months after the termination of hostilities. Termination of hostilities means termination of hostilities of the wars in which the United States is now engaged as declared by a Presidential proclamation or concurrent resolution of the Congress.

Section 604 specifies that if any provision of the act is held invalid the remainder of the act is not to be affected.

Section 605 terminates the present Office of War Mobilization when the Director created by the act takes office, and transfers the records, property, and unexpended appropriations from the present Office of War Mobilization to the new Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion.

Section 606 continues the orders, policies, procedures, and directives prescribed by the present Director of War Mobilization until superseded by the new Director.

Section 607 specifies that no alien shall be employed in any capacity in the administration of this act unless he has served honorably in the armed forces of the United States.

Section 608 titles the act as the "War Mobilization and Reconversion Act of 1944."

"The Veterans Have a Right to Expect That the Realities to Which They Return Will Conform To the Ideals for Which They Fought"—Gov. Earl Warren

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1944

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, under the privilege just extended to me by the membership of the House, I hand to the Public Printer for incorporation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of an address which was delivered by the Honorable Earl Warren, Governor of the State of California, at the American Legion, Department of California, convention, a conclave which convened at Los Angeles on August 15 last.

As that which this great Governor of a great State then had to say will influence greatly the trend of contemporaneous events, his remarks are deserving of a far wider audience than the one that crowded to overflowing the Philharmonic Auditorium on that memorable occasion. Its reprinting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will contribute much toward that end so devoutly to be wished for.

Mr. Speaker, the text of the address of Governor Warren to which I have just referred is the following:

Commander Haughton, comrades, and friends of the Legion, when we met at San Francisco on August 17, just 1 year ago, the state of the war was very different than it is today.

At that time the armed forces of our country were just beginning to reveal the fullness of their power.

Our boys had taken the island of Vella la Vella in the Solomons. With the British they had invaded Sicily; Messina was ours, but the battle for Italy had not yet begun. The Russians were battling for Kharkov and, although they had taken Bryansk, they found the Nazis still strong in counterattack.

In full possession of Europe, the Germans were boasting a new secret weapon to launch against our gathering forces in England.

On the Pacific coast aircraft plants were calling urgently for 150,000 additional workers within 30 days.

A year ago we had taken the initiative on all fronts, but the day of victory seemed far away.

Today that initiative has assumed the proportions of a world-wide offensive against the Axis, with coordination and striking power never witnessed before in the history of warfare.

Americans have jumped from the Solomons to the Marshalls and the Gilberts; have passed the Carolines to strike the Marianas, and Guam is once more an American island. Tojo has gone. Kioso, his successor, warns the Japanese people that a direct thrust against their homeland is imminent.

We are steadily completing our struggle for Italy, and the battle is on as far north as the classic city of Florence. The Russians have liberated their country, are pounding Warsaw in Poland, and are poised for the invasion of East Prussia.

Doughboys and Tommies have extended the D-day beachhead through Normandy and Brittany, and now move forward on a complete front of 130 miles to within a few miles of Paris.

The secret weapon is known, and its dangers can be reckoned with. The Nazi, no longer boasting, is fearful of his own army. On the Pacific coast we begin to hear more of cut-backs and less of manpower.

The change that has taken place within the year has brought new hope to the fathers, mothers, wives, and loved ones of our men and women in the armed forces, and calm joy to every American.

But it is also bringing closer, month by month, week by week, and day by day, new problems for our people, new responsibilities for leadership, not only in Nation and State, but in every county, every city, every community.

Foremost among the challenging adjustments that must be made will be the readjustment to civilian life of the greater part of 11,000,000 men and women whose lives have been disrupted by the stern requirement for service with the armed forces. Certainly, nothing ahead of us will be charged with greater moral obligation on the part of the Nation.

Those who have served with our Army and Navy, our Marine Corps, our Coast Guard, have made the greatest sacrifice. In a certain sense, they have made the only sacrifice. They have made it under conditions taking them suddenly and entirely out of their normal environment—rendering them helpless for the time being to manage their own affairs or provide for their own future.

War will affect some of them physically, many of them psychologically, all of them conomically and socially. They will return s out of a nightmare, uncertain of themelves, still vibrating with the excitement of the things they have seen and done. There will be the strangeness of civilian clothes, the eeling of sudden let-down, the struggle to link the joy of return with the job of making a living.

They will soon come to appraise the ideals for which they have endured rigorous training, risked dangerous combat. That appraisal will be influenced largely by conditions as they find them at home.

The veterans of this war have a particular right to expect that the reality to which they return will conform to the ideals for which they have fought.

They would be the first to disclaim any desire to constitute themselves a special class; they realize that what is best for our country as a whole will be best for them as veterans.

Nevertheless, we at home must realize that we are trustees for those in the armed forces of our country. It is up to us to prepare, in their absence and for their benefit, conditions wherein they will find the abstract of freedom translated into real opportunity for development of useful, satisfying lives.

Failure to discharge our obligations would be to risk tragic consequences. The hearts of these strong and willing men and women would become embittered, their minds disillusioned, and their hands turned, perhaps, to unsound expedients—bad for the Nation and bad for the veterans too.

We are fortunate to have within our country men of the last generation, veterans of World War No. 1, men who have known war, who have not forgotten what it means, who understand the strangeness of changing a uniform for civilian clothes, men who have had to tackle the problem of readjustment.

One of the few compensations for all the loss and suffering of the last war is that out of it have come the men best fitted to understand, most willing to help, a new generation, the men most determined that we shall not fail in our obligation to the veterans of World War No. 2.

Today, with World War No. 2 forming another great band of veterans, the work of the American Legion and its kindred organizations becomes the real job of constructively aiding to overcome the difficulties that will confront these new veterans.

To this job the American Legion has already devoted itself; for its accomplishment you have brought and will continue to bring your insistent and just demands to every level of government.

Californians are justly proud that during the last year this important work of the American Legion has been carried on under the leadership of a Californian * * * our own Warren Atherton. He has been able in leadership and tireless in his activity to bring the American Legion closely and helpfully to our boys in the fields of battle.

His service as national commander will long stand as a tribute to our California department.

Largely as a result of the foresight and interest of our veterans, the State of California laid the foundation for its veterans' program nearly a year and a half ago.

With the cooperation of all branches of State government, a constitutional amendment, the Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act, was passed by the legislature. It will come before the people for their approval at the November general election and, when approved, will authorize a $30,000,000 bond issue to provide loans to California veterans for the purchase of homes and farms.

To avoid the delay involved in the submission of this bond issue to the people, I was pleased to sign a Legion-sponsored bill passed at the 1943 legislative session to give our first returning veterans the benefits of a home- and farm-purchase program as soon as they were ready for it. We are, therefore, in a position today to give our veterans the tremendous advantages, the independence, and self-reliance, that come from settling in their own home or working their own farm.

A further sum of $300,000 was made available to our veterans' welfare board for a program of educational assistance to California veterans. Under that program they may resume their education with tuition, books, and supplies paid for by the State, and an allowance to the veteran for living expense while so engaged.

Educational aids were also provided for the children of California veterans killed in action or dying as a result of war service.

Our State department of education has been making timely preparation to meet the demands for education, both general and vocational, that will be made upon our school system by thousands of young people whose education was interrupted by the war or who stand in need of further education to retrain themselves for civilian life.

A further sum of $150,000 was appropriated to the veterans' welfare board to carry out a program for assisting our veterans to obtain the benefits to which they are entitled. In this work we have had the complete cooperation of our veteran organizations and their service officers.

Action was also taken to freeze the unemployment-compensation rights of those entering the armed forces until after their discharge from service. Civil-service employees of the State entering the armed forces were given an absolute right to be restored to their former positions, and other veterans seeking to qualify under civil-service examinations have been accorded preferential rights.

All of these programs are American Legion programs.

These programs, established mainly for Californians in the service, were not designed to meet, nor could our State alone assume, entire responsibility for service to all the veterans we will have in California as a direct result of the war effort.

Readjustment and retraining of veterans for civilian life will be just as much a part of the cost of the war as their training for war itself. Upon the Federal Government, therefore, rests the primary obligation to provide basic funds and programs. The reason for this can be demonstrated by a few simple facts.

In addition to the 600,000 Californians who entered the service, a further 200,000 residents of other States came to California after 1940 in connection with national defense and war programs and were inducted into the armed forces from California. Presumably, many of them will return to California when the war is over.

Furthermore, California stands high on the list of States in the number of its training camps and debarkation points. With increasing intensity of action in the Pacific, our State has become a main street to battle, down which approximately 5,000,000 service men and women will have traveled before this war is over. Many of them have come to like California as much as we do, and plan to settle here when their tour of duty is over.

This demonstrates the national scope of the veterans' readjustment that must be made in California and in other States similarly affected. It proves that the American Legion was right in bringing to the Congress its demand for those basic programs and appropriations that are now part of the Federal Servicemen's Readjustment Act, signed by the President June 1944—familiarly known as the G. I. bill of rights.

That national legislation is the supplement for measures already taken in California and other States in the Union. Its Federal programs for hospitalization, for unemployment allowances, for educational assistance, and for loans to servicemen recognize the national responsibility. They should be used as a bulwark of support for the States and local communities in their efforts to minister to the needs of our veterans.

Whether we are going to really help returning veterans to solve the practical and personal problems that will confront them depends upon how these programs are administered.

To make appropriations, to set up programs, no matter how well conceived, is not enough.

These things have a tendency to develop into machines operating with routines and red tape. Their size and complexity make for delay, and tend to confuse the very persons they were designed to serve.

Unless we translate them into human terms, and reduce them to proportions of simplified service the individual veteran can understand, they will not succeed. We must remember that each veteran will eventually return to his own community—his own home; that his problems will be as numerous and varied as the veterans themselves—so essentially human, so clearly individual—that they cannot be cataloged or classified by any governmental machine.

It is of the utmost importance, therefore, that the State, with its counties, cities, and towns, be given full opportunity to participate in, and that they be ready and willing to participate in, the administration of Federal programs. Into the work must be brought not only the public agencies involved but also the organized effort of all groups in California life—our veteran posts, our chambers of commerce, our labor unions, our farm bureaus, our professional societies, our social welfare organizations, our service clubs. Only in this way can the full resources of our State be drawn upon to make sure that California does not fail—to make sure that California receives, welcomes, and helps its veterans in the way they have every right to expect.

Our larger cities, where the adjustment will be most difficult, are aware of their responsibility. They are already organizing themselves accordingly. I have no doubt that all of our communities will respond.

Some idea of the great need for centralizing all veterans' services in one place in each community can be obtained from surveys showing over 50 available aids and benefits for veterans distributed among 30 Federal, State, local, or semipublic agencies.

Our veterans must not have to hunt down these services through any such maze as that. The services must be brought together into one place—one information and service center in each community—where the veteran can find them—and where they can find the veteran.

More than a year ago we set up in California a reconstruction and reemployment commission. Through this agency we have been working to mobilize the resources of our State—public and private—business, labor, and agriculture—for California's transition from war to peace; to prepare the way for jobs and opportunities for 600,000 California veterans and for the 1,500,000 civilians who have come to California to participate in the war effort.

The commission has assigned to one of its nine advisory committees the job of dealing specifically with demobilized service men and women. That committee is tied in closely with our veteran organizations. It has kept abreast of all developments in the field of veterans' welfare. It stands ready to cooperate fully with the Federal Government, our counties, and our cities, to make sure that every step has been taken—or will be taken by legislation, if necessary—to assure that readjustment of veterans in California is accomplished with promptness, efficiency, and consideration for the veteran and with credit to our great State.

To you, Department Commander Haughton, your successor, your officers, posts, and members, I am privileged to express gratitude for the cooperation and the inspiration you have given to our State and to me as Governor.

I am proud to be a Legionnaire—more proud than I have ever been in the past 25 years—proud because the Legion has devoted itself so completely to the cause of our newest veterans. That cause is America's greatest task—America's greatest opportunity. Our job has just commenced. I am sure that we will do it well.

So, let us strive together in California to make sure that the return of our young men and women from the battle fronts of the war may be, not a so-called veterans' problem, but a joyful homecoming to share the happiness, the prosperity, of which our State is capable and which, by intelligence, courage, and vision—and with God's help—we will attain.

Correspondence in Connection With Testimonial Dinner to Hon. John A. Danaher, of Connecticut

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I would wish to be acquitted of any suspicion that I would ever forget Meriden, Conn. If I had any such disposition, however, the two present Senators from Connecticut, who grew up together in Meriden, would not permit me to do so. Actually my recollection of Meriden is probably longer lived than theirs. It is nearly 45 years since I came to Washington officially as secretary to my grandfather, the late United States Senator William P. Frye, from Maine. At that time Connecticut was represented in the Senate by United States Senator Joseph R. Hawley and United States Senator Orville H. Platt. It was early impressed upon me that Senator Platt came from Meriden. I later learned that associated in the practice of law with Senator Platt was Mr. Cornelius J. Danaher, of Meriden, who is the father of the present Republican junior Senator from Connecticut, JOHN A. DANAHER.

It was with very real pleasure that I learned some weeks ago from Mr. Eliot B. Stretch, chairman of the Meriden Republican Town Committee, that a testimonial dinner was to be tendered by Meridenites to Senator DANAHER, and I sent to Mr. Stretch a message of felicitation. I have since received from Mr. Stretch a letter of thanks which enclosed copies of various messages from our colleagues which were read at the dinner meeting. That the RECORD may show this evidence of the high esteem in which Senator DANAHER is held by all of us here in the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the correspondence referred to may be printed in the Appendix.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLICAN TOWN AND CITY COMMITTEE,
Meriden, Conn., August 15, 1944.

Senator WALLACE H. WHITE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Meriden Republican Town Committee is deeply grateful to you for the splendid letter you sent to me on the occasion of our testimonial to our friend, Senator JOHN A. DANAHER. The event was a huge success, and was attended by Gov. Raymond E. Baldwin, our complete Republican State ticket, our Congressman at Large, B. J. MONKIEWICZ, and our Congressman from the Third Connecticut District, Maj. RANULF COMPTON. When I invited you and a few other Senators to send me a word of greeting to our guest of honor, I did not anticipate so complete a response, but the estimates and appraisals you gentlemen submitted were most enthusiastically received. Then, when CLARE BOOTH LUCE in her own splendid style introduced Senator DANAHER, it was perfect.

Senator DANAHER announced his intention to seek reelection, and the following week was unanimously renominated by the Republican convention. After 6 years of the grueling intensive work confronting you gentlemen in the Senate, it struck me as a fine tribute to my long-time friend that the result should be so complete. I would not wish to appear presumptuous, but if you believe it fitting, I would very greatly like to ask you to place in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some of the letters which you Senators sent to me. I think a very great many people would like to know of the esteem in which Senator DANAHER is held by so many of the really great leaders of the Republican Party.

Please believe me with my thanks and very real esteem,

Sincerely yours,

ELIOT B. STRETCH.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE,
July 25, 1944.

ELIOT B. STRETCH,
Chairman, Republican Town Committee,
Meriden, Conn.

MY DEAR MR. STRETCH: I have just learned of the dinner to be given in honor of Senator DANAHER on July 31.

I wish I might be with you on this occasion, for I would welcome the opportunity to tell his home people how greatly I esteem Senator DANAHER. He is an indefatigable worker, of high intelligence, of most agreeable personality, and no Senator is held in higher esteem by the membership of the Senate than is he. If the people of Connecticut knew of his work and of him as his associates in the Senate do, he would be reelected by an overwhelming majority. Give him my cordial regards.

Believe me,

Sincerely yours,

WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.,
Minority Floor Leader.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
July 26, 1944.

ELIOT B. STRETCH,
Chairman, Republican Town Committee,
Meriden, Conn.

DEAR MR. STRETCH: I received your notification that the Meriden Republican Town Committee is holding a testimonial preconvention dinner for Senator JOHN A. DANAHER on Monday, July 31. JOHN DANAHER and I entered the Senate the same day. It has been a continuous pleasure to serve with him and to enjoy his unfailing good humor. No Senator could have worked harder than he has worked at the legislative job. His legislative ability and keen judgment have promoted and improved constructive laws and blocked many which ought not be enacted. You have an exceptional representative, who should certainly be renominated and reelected.

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. TAFT.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
July 28, 1944.

ELIOT B. STRETCH,
Chairman, Republican Town Committee,
Meriden, Conn.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I wish I could personally attend your testimonial dinner honoring Senator JOHN A. DANAHER. I should like to be able to tell you at first hand how much Senator DANAHER means to us in the Senate. In my 16 years of Senate experience no Senator has made more friends or registered a more definite influence or assumed a more effective place of authority than has Senator DANAHER in his comparatively brief career among us. He has displayed indefatigable energy. He has been tireless in his attention to duty. He has taken a commanding position in Senate proceedings. He is a tower of strength to good government. He is one of our truly great Republican Senators. I cannot too emphatically express my hope and my deep desire that Senator DANAHER will be reelected by a majority which will reflect the confidence which he has richly earned and deserves.

Cordially and faithfully,

A. H. VANDENBERG.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
July 26, 1944.

ELIOT B. STRETCH,
Chairman, Town Committee,
Meriden, Conn.

DEAR MR. STRETCH: Hon. JOHN A. DANAHER is one of the most industrious, efficient, and capable of our Senators. I worked with him in Judiciary Committee of the Senate until very recently, when I was obliged to retire from that committee to take up other work.

He succeeded me as the ranking member on the minority side of the committee.

My confidence in him made it more easy for me to retire from that important committee.

I have a strong personal regard for him and I wish you would convey to him publicly, my greetings and best wishes for his return to the Senate.

Sincerely yours,

WARREN R. AUSTIN.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., July 26, 1944.

MY DEAR MR. STRETCH: Please extend my cordial greetings and best wishes to Senator JOHN DANAHER. He has rendered outstanding and highly patriotic service in the Senate which I hope may long continue.

The Connecticut Western Reserve in Ohio takes pride in the good Republican record of the folks "back East."

Yours sincerely,

HAROLD H. BURTON,
United States Senator, Ohio.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
July 27, 1944.

ELIOT B. STRETCH, Esq.,
Chairman, Republican Town Committee
Meriden, Conn.

DEAR MR. STRETCH: I have been advised of the testimonial dinner to be given to my friend and colleague, your Senator JOHN DANAHER, on the eve of your State convention, and, because of my friendship for him, I want to add my tribute to the others.

JOHN DANAHER and I entered the Senate together in January 1939. We have been intimately associated in the work of the Senate in the last 6 years. He has made a place for himself in the Senate that is unique. Beyond question, in my opinion, he is the best debater on either side of the aisle. His forensic ability is commented upon frequently by both Democrats and Republicans. He has an analytical mind which is evidenced in his conclusions. He is an indefatigable worker, constantly on the job and he has the happy gifts of wit and humor which crop out frequently and which have endeared him to every one of his colleagues

The State of Connecticut and New England are most fortunate in having JOHN DANAHER in the Senate, but beyond all this, the common people of our country have in him a friend, one who has an understanding heart for their problems.

It would be unthinkable that he would not be continued in the Senate where he would have increasing influence and prestige as the years go by.

This tribute comes from my heart for one whom I delight to call friend.

With good wishes for a happy gathering on the 31st and thanking you for transmitting this communication thereto, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES W. TOBEY.

Servicemen's Rights and Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, I am inserting an article which is being issued by the United States Government as a handy guide for the veterans of our armed forces.

The purpose of it is to give the veterans a correct picture of the rights and benefits available to them and their dependents. Without attempting to answer all the questions anyone could ask, it simply gives the high spots and tells them where the answers can be found.

On the whole, it is a most valuable document and one that should be placed in the hands of every serviceman.

It reads as follows:

THINGS TO DO AFTER DISCHARGE

Four things are mentioned below that should be given your immediate attention:

REPORT TO SELECTIVE SERVICE BOARD

Every man discharged from the armed forces should report to his selective-service board in person or by letter, within 5 days of his discharge. This is required by law. Ex-servicewomen are not required to report but should do so if they desire aid in securing reemployment.

APPLY FOR OLD JOB WITHIN 40 DAYS

If you want to get back the job you had before you entered the armed forces, you must apply for it within 40 days after the date of your discharge.

PAY GOVERNMENT INSURANCE PREMIUMS DIRECT

Most ex-service men and women will want to keep their national service life insurance in force. To do this it is necessary to pay the premiums direct to the Veterans' Administration; otherwise the insurance will lapse.

PUT YOUR RECORDS IN ORDER

Every ex-member of the armed forces has a serial, service, or file number. It is most important that you keep a record of it and of other such records—such as originals or legal copies of necessary papers—in a safe place where they can always be found.

The reason is simple. Claims and requests for benefits will usually require certain information, such as a man's Army or Marine Corps serial number, Navy file or service number, details of his discharge and, in some cases, proof of the relationship of dependents. The most important records are the following:

Army or Marine Corps serial number.
Navy service or file number.
Coast Guard service number.
Discharge papers.
Disability claim "C" number.
Insurance policies.
Social Security card.
Birth certificate (self).
Birth certificate (wife).
Birth certificate (children).
Marriage certificate.
Any divorce decrees.
Last will and testament.
Selective-service registration card.

Get these records in order now—even though you may not need them immediately. Some day you may be saved great inconvenience and delay by having them all together where you can find them easily.

BENEFITS FOR VETERANS

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

As a veteran discharged under honorable conditions, you automatically receive mustering-out pay of from $100 to $300 to help tide you over the immediate period after your discharge and to aid you in your necessary readjustment to civilian life.

Those who served less than 60 days receive $100; 60 days or more, but no foreign service, $200; 60 days or more, and foreign service, $300. Certain groups are excluded, such as those receiving base pay (not counting fogies) of more than $200 a month at the time of their discharge. Any eligible veteran discharged before this law was passed may obtain payment by applying to his own branch of the service.

INSURANCE—GOVERNMENT

Your national service life insurance will be one of your most valuable assets after your discharge. If you let it lapse, you will not be able to buy similar protection for yourself and your family for the same cost. To keep it in force you must do two things:

1. Pay the premiums direct. Make your check or money order payable to the Treasurer of the United States and mail it to the Collections Subdivision, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C. You may arrange to pay your premiums monthly, quarterly, semiannually or annually.

2. Your insurance was originally issued on what is called the 5-year-level-premium-term plan. Any time after it has been in force a year, and before the 5 years are up, you may convert it into ordinary life, 20-payment life or 30-payment life. Your new policy will have regular cash values after the first year from which you can borrow if necessary.

If you wish to change your beneficiary, write the Director of Insurance, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C.

INSURANCE—PRIVATE

If, when you went into the service, you had private life insurance, you may have arranged to have the Government protect this for you by guaranteeing the premiums. If so, remember that payments must be brought up to date, with interest, within 2 years after your discharge. Your insurance company or the Veterans' Administration will answer any questions.

GETTING YOUR OLD JOB BACK

If you worked for a private employer or for the Federal Government before the war, and want your job back, the qualifications are brief and simple: the position you left must have been other than temporary, you must have completed your military service satisfactorily, you must still be qualified to perform the duties of the position, and you must apply for reemployment within 40 days of your discharge. If you cannot call upon your employer immediately, write and tell him when you can return to work, and keep a copy of your letter.

If you have any difficulty, go to your reemployment committeeman—a man assigned by your local selective-service board to be your personal adviser on reemployment. If necessary, he can obtain the assistance of the United States district courts and the Federal district attorney. This service is free.

GETTING A NEW JOB

The United States Employment Service has 1,500 offices throughout the country and extends service to 2,200 other communities. All are ready and anxious to help you. In each of these local offices, there is a special veterans' employment representative to assist war veterans in finding suitable jobs. They also advise and assist members of veterans' families seeking work. If you want a job, register at the United States Employment Service office nearest you as soon after your discharge as possible.

GETTING A GOVERNMENT JOB

If you were a Federal Civil Service employee (other than temporary) when you entered the war, you should apply to the agency where last employed within 40 days of your discharge or to the Civil Service Commission in the event you experience difficulty in being reinstated. If you satisfy the requirements (see "Getting your old job back" above), you are entitled to your former position or one "of like seniority, status, and pay."

If you didn't have a civil-service job before, but want to get one after you are discharged, you will get special consideration and preference in civil-service examinations. This preference also applies to wives or widows of veterans under certain circumstances.

All wartime veterans discharged under honorable conditions are entitled to preference in United States Civil Service examinations. The entitlement to 5 or 10 points will be determined by the Civil Service Commission upon application to the Commission.

Other privileges for veterans are:

1. Examination for positions of guard, elevator operator, messenger, and custodian, will be restricted to veterans as long as veteran applicants are available.

2. Time spent in military service will be credited toward experience required for a position of the kind you left.

3. Age, height, and weight requirements are waived for veterans in most instances. Other physical requirements may be waived.

4. Veterans are exempted from provisions of law prohibiting Government employment to more than two members of a family.

5. If an appointing officer passes over a veteran and selects a non-veteran, he must submit his reasons in writing to the Civil Service Commission.

6. In personnel reductions in any Federal agency, preference in retention will be given to veterans.

There are approximately 4,500 local Civil Service Secretaries located in all first- and second-class post offices, who will advise you concerning Government employment, or such information may be secured from your reemployment committeeman or the United States Employment Service, who will put you in touch with a representative of the Civil Service Commission.

APPRENTICE TRAINING

Virtually all of the 30,207 apprentice-training programs in the United States extend opportunities to returning veterans. Veterans may be employed as apprentices and be paid as they learn, getting not only a steady job but training which prepares them for skilled jobs. Age restrictions and other limitations are lifted for them in many cases. Information may be obtained through your nearest United States Employment Service office or the nearest facility of the Veterans' Administration.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

If you have a service-connected disability, which results in an occupational handicap, you can probably be taught a new type of work in which your disability will not hinder you. Through the Veterans' Administration you may be trained in a college, business, or trade school, or on the job with a business firm. Tuition, books, supplies, and equipment are provided at Government expense. During training, if the pension being received is less than $80 per month, it will be increased to the rate of $80 per month, if you are single; $90, if married, with an added allowance of $5 a month for each child, and $10 for each dependent parent.

If your disability is not service connected, or occurs after you have left the service, and constitutes a vocational handicap, you may apply to your State board of vocational education for guidance, special training, and placement. If in financial need, other services available include medical treatment, hospitalization, maintenance, and transportation during training, educational supplies, occupational tools, and equipment. This is a Federal-State program of vocational rehabilitation and operates in each State. Apply to your local superintendent of schools or the nearest United States Employment Service office for the address of the nearest vocational rehabilitation officer.

TRAINING FOR WAR WORK

During the war you may acquire the skill necessary for war-production jobs under the vocational training for war workers program. Information concerning this program is available from your local superintendent of schools or the United States Employment Service.

IF UNEMPLOYED

To cover temporary periods of unemployment following discharge, financial help is available to you, either through State or Federal sources.

State programs

State unemployment-compensation programs provide weekly payments to unemployed workers based on their previous work in covered jobs—that is, most jobs in private firms in business and industry; factories, shops, mines, mills, stores, offices, banks, etc. Types of jobs not covered are farm work, household service, Government and self-employment, and work for many small firms. Almost all the States have frozen any unemployment-insurance rights you may have earned before going into service. You may be able to draw upon them in case you are unemployed after your return.

Full information on job opportunities and unemployment compensation can be obtained at your nearest United States Employment Service office.

Federal provisions

Weekly allowances of unemployment compensation are available through a Federal program if you are not eligible under a State program. If you qualify under both, money received under a State plan is subtracted from the Federal allowance. Under the Federal plan, you may receive 4 weeks of allowance for each calendar month of active service after September 16, 1940, and before the end of the present war, up to a total limit of 52 weeks.

If you are completely unemployed, your allowance is $20 a week. If you are partially unemployed, you receive the difference between your wage and the weekly allowance plus $3. If you are self-employed, you may still be eligible if your net earnings in the previous calendar month were less than $100. Allowances remaining unpaid at your death do not become part of your estate.

Eligibility requirements: You must have served after September 16, 1940, and before the end of the present war, and have been discharged or released under conditions other than dishonorable after 90 days' active service, or because of injury or disability incurred in line of duty. Unemployment must have started within 2 years of discharge or the end of the war. When you file a claim, you must be residing in the United States, be completely unemployed or (if partially employed) be receiving weekly wages of less than $23; you must register and continue to report to a public employment office, be able to work and be available for suitable work. Illness or disability which occurs during a period of unemployment for which allowances have already started will not disqualify you.

Disqualifications: You will be disqualified from receiving such allowances if you leave suitable work voluntarily and without good cause, if you are suspended or discharged for misconduct, if you fail without good cause to apply for suitable work to which you have been referred by a public employment office, or to accept suitable work when offered, or if you fail without good cause to attend an available free training course. A job is not considered suitable if (a) the wages, hours, or conditions of work are substantially less favorable than those prevailing for similar work in the locality, or (b) the position offered is vacant because of a strike, lock-out, or labor disputes.

Such disqualifications begin the week in which the cause of the disqualification occurs and continue for not more than 4 weeks immediately following. Under special circumstances the Administrator of Veterans Affairs may extend the period of your disqualification.

You will also be disqualified from receiving an allowance for any week in which your unemployment is due to a "stoppage of work" existing because of a labor dispute in which you are participating or directly interested.

Fuller information concerning these Federal benefits may be obtained at your nearest United States Employment Service office.

LOANS FOR HOMES, FARMS, BUSINESS

These three types of loans including farm and business equipment, are available to veterans who served on or after September 16, 1940, and before the end of the present war, and who are discharged or released under conditions other than dishonorable, after active service of 90 days or more, or because of service-incurred injury or disability. Applications must be made within 2 years after discharge or separation, or 2 years after the end of the war (whichever is later), but in no event more than 5 years after the end of the war.

The Administrator of Veterans Affairs will guarantee up to 50 percent of any such loan or loans, provided the amount guaranteed does not exceed $2,000. Loans guaranteed by the Administrator bear interest of not more than 4 percent per year and must be paid up within 20 years. The Administrator will pay the interest on the guaranteed amount for the first year.

Although the conditions vary somewhat for each type of loan, the general requirements are that the loan must be used for the purpose specified, that the terms of payment bear proper relationship to the veteran's anticipated income and expense, that the purchase price not exceed a reasonable normal value, that the property be useful and reasonably necessary, and for farms or business loans, that the veteran have such ability and experience as to provide a reasonable likelihood that he will be successful.

Detailed information concerning these loans is available at any facility of the Veterans' Administration.

Information concerning other opportunities in farming, including kinds of farms, cost of farms, sound farming methods and sources of credit can be obtained from your county agricultural agent. A booklet on this subject is also available upon request to the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington 25, D. C. Ask for "Shall I Be a Farmer?" (AWI-105).

If you had a business of your own before you went into service and had to close it up or turn it over to someone else when you left, you may be able to get a loan to reestablish your business or a similar one, through the small-business loan program of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

You must show prior business experience and have some capital to put into the business yourself, and there must be sound economic need for the business. Apply through a bank or other financial institution; if the bank cannot make the loan, file your application directly with the R. F. C. through its loan agencies.

EDUCATION

Educational aid for veterans is available from the Veterans' Administration provided: (1) You were discharged under conditions other than dishonorable; (2) you were not over 25 at the time you entered service, or can demonstrate that your education or training was interrupted or interfered with by your service; or if you desire a refresher or retraining course; (3) you served 90 days or more (not counting the time in Army specialized training program or Navy college training program, which course was a continuation of a civilian course and which was pursued to completion, or as a cadet or midshipman in a service academy) or were discharged or released from service because of an actual service-incurred injury or disability; and (4) you start such education not later than 2 years after discharge or end of war (whichever date is later).

Length of training: One year (or its equivalent in part-time study). If you complete these courses (except refresher or retraining courses) satisfactorily, you will be entitled to additional education or training not to exceed the length of time you spent in active service after September 16, 1940, and before the end of the present war (not including Army specialized training program or Navy college program). No course of education or training shall exceed 4 years.

Types of courses: You may select your own course at any educational or training institution which accepts you as qualified to undertake them, provided the institution is on the list approved by the Veterans' Administration.

Types of educational institution: Public or private, elementary, secondary, and other schools furnishing education for adults; business schools and colleges; scientific and technical institutions; colleges, vocational schools, junior colleges, teachers' colleges, normal schools, professional schools, universities, and other educational and training institutions, including industrial establishments providing apprentice or other training on the job.

Expenses paid: The Veterans' Administration will pay to the educational or training institution the customary cost of tuition, and such laboratory, library, infirmary, and similar payments as are customarily charged, and may pay for books, supplies, equipment, and such other necessary expenses (exclusive of board, lodging, other living expenses and travel) as are required. Such payments shall not exceed $500 for an ordinary school year.

Living allowance: The Veterans' Administration will also provide a subsistence allowance of $50 a month if you have no dependents, $75 if you have. (This may be reduced, however, if you attend on a part-time basis or receive compensation for work done as part of your training.)

You may also want to apply for school or college credit for what you learned in the service or a record of it to show your prospective employer. For information on this subject and application blank, write to:

Army: United States Armed Forces Institute, Madison 3, Wis.

Navy: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

Marine Corps: Marine Corps Institute, Marine Barracks, Washington 25, D. C.

Coast Guard: United States Coast Guard Headquarters, Washington 25, D. C.

HOSPITAL CARE

If you should ever need hospital care for a disability incurred in line of duty in the service, it will be provided upon request to the Veterans' Administration. You may also be given free transportation to the hospital.

If your illness is not due to service, you may still get hospitalization if a bed is available and you are financially unable to pay the cost yourself.

MEDICAL ATTENTION

If you need medical service or dental care not requiring hospitalization, it will be provided by the Veterans' Administration if the condition was caused or aggravated in line of duty by your service. Medicine, appliances, bridgework, and so forth, are included.

DISABILITY PENSIONS

If you are discharged from the armed forces with a disability due to service, you may be entitled to disability benefits including a pension. The amount payable runs from $11.50 a month for 10 percent disability up to $115 a month for 100 percent disability. In addition there are special rates and allowances for specific injuries and more seriously disabling conditions. Apply through the Veterans' Administration.

CARE IN NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME

A veteran who is so disabled as to be unable to earn a living, and is without adequate means of support, may apply for admission to one of the numerous National Soldiers' Homes for disabled, located throughout the country, where former members of the armed forces may live and receive care.

LEGAL PROTECTION

In general, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act protects service men and women up to 6 months after their discharge by making it possible for the courts to suspend enforcement of certain civil liabilities during that time, such as:

Lawsuits for collection of debts.
Contracts.
Repossession of property.
Collection of certain taxes.
Sale of property for taxes.
Eviction of dependents for nonpayment of rent.
Insurance premiums.
Rights in public lands.

Legal counsel, without charge, is available to service personnel through State chairmen of the American Bar Association, or you may consult your local selective service board, Red Cross, or Legal Aid Society.

INCOME TAX

In some cases Federal and State laws provide for deferment or adjustment of tax payments by veterans. For information on Federal income tax and other Federal taxes, go to the nearest office of the collector of internal revenue. Your own State tax commission at the State capital will answer questions about State income tax and other State taxes.

ASSISTANCE WITH SPECIAL PROBLEMS

There are in most communities agencies organized to meet special needs which arise from time to time for financial assistance, medical care, legal aid, or other personal problems. For advice in such situations apply to your county welfare office, the local chapter of the Red Cross, or the Veterans' information service center. Information and advice may also be obtained at military installations from the Army's personal affairs officers, the Navy's civil readjustment officers, and the Marine Corps' rehabilitation officers.

CLAIMS FOR BACK PAY

Army inquiries should be addressed to the finance officer of the camp in the United States from which discharged or transferred to the Enlisted Reserve Corps. Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard inquiries should be addressed to the Claims Division, General Accounting Office, Washington 25, D. C. Be sure to print full name and serial or service number.

REVIEW OF DISCHARGE

If you feel that your military service justified a more favorable discharge or dismissal than you received, you may at any time within 15 years request and receive a review of it, unless you were discharged or dismissed by general court-martial sentence. Subject to approval by the Secretary of War or of the Navy, the reviewing board may change or modify a discharge, or issue a new one, if evidence warrants. Apply to your own branch of the service.

REVIEW OF RETIREMENT

Any offier retired or released to inactive service without pay because of physical disability has the right (within 15 years) to request review of the retiring board's decision. Apply to your own branch of service.

LAPEL BUTTONS

All those who served honorably in the armed forces of the United States on or after September 8, 1939, are entitled to wear the lapel button that signifies such service. If you did not get this button when discharged, it will be issued to you, free, upon presentation of your discharge certificate or other certificate of service at most military and naval installations.

WEARING UNIFORM AFTER DISCHARGE

You are entitled to wear your uniform from the place where you receive your discharge to your home, provided that the distinctive mark required by certain branches of the service to designate ex-servicemen be worn as directed and provided that you go there within 3 months of the discharge date. You may also wear your uniform on ceremonial occasions. In such cases you wear the uniform in the highest rank or grade that you held during the war.

BURIAL

A sum not exceeding $100 may be allowed on the burial, funeral, and transportation expenses of any honorably discharged veteran of any war, a veteran discharged for disability incurred in line of duty, or a veteran receiving pension for service-connected disability. Application should be made to the Veterans' Administration.

Men and women dying in the service of the United States in the armed forces and veterans whose last discharge was honorable are eligible for burial in a national cemetery. Apply to the superintendent of the national cemetery.

Headstones are supplied for veterans, without charge, upon application to the Quartermaster General, United States Army, War Department, Washington 25, D. C. In most cases, an American flag for draping the casket may be obtained from the Veterans' Administration or any county seat postmaster.

JOBS FOR DEPENDENTS

Special attention and assistance will be given by the local offices of the United States Employment Service and local veterans' employment representatives to members of veterans' families seeking suitable employment.

Wives and widows of disabled veterans are given certain preferences for positions in the United States civil service.

PENSIONS FOR DEPENDENTS

When a member or former member of the armed forces dies of a service-connected disability, his widow, children, and dependent parents may file a claim for pension with the Veterans' Administration. A veteran's own pension for disability is not continued after his death.

SOCIAL-SECURITY BENEFITS

In the event of the death of a member or former member of the armed forces who had had civilian employment in private business or industry, survivors' insurance benefits may be payable on his social-security account. The next of kin should inquire immediately at the nearest Social Security Board office.

GOVERNMENT INSURANCE

When a veteran dies, the Director of Insurance, Veterans' Administration, should be notified immediately so that all questions of insurance can be settled promptly.

Upon the death of a person who carried Government insurance, the Veterans' Administration, when notified, will forward the necessary blanks to the beneficiary. In the case of National Service life insurance, payments will be made by the Veterans' Administration, not in one lump sum but in 240 equal monthly payments, if the beneficiary is under 30 years of age, or in equal monthly installments for life if beneficiary is 30 or over.

DEPENDENTS OF VETERANS RECEIVING VOCATIONAL TRAINING

The pension of a disabled veteran who is receiving vocational training may, in some cases, be increased on account of a wife, husband, children, or dependent parents.

DISABLED DEPENDENTS

Any disabled dependent of employable age with a vocational handicap may secure through the State rehabilitation agency special training and other services necessary to prepare him for a job. Apply to your State Board of Vocational Education, or inquire at the nearest United States Employment Service office as to the location of the State Rehabilitation Agency.

SIX MONTHS' DEATH GRATUITY

When a member of the armed forces dies while in service, and not as a result of own misconduct, the widow receives a cash payment equal to 6 months' pay; if no widow, payment is made to the children; if no widow or children, payment is made to the dependent relative named. If no beneficiary has been named a claim blank is mailed only upon request from a qualified relative. Inquiries should be addressed to the particular service of which the service man or woman was a member; Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard. Recipients of this benefit are not eligible to receive muster-out pay.

BACK PAY

The balance of any pay account remaining due a person who dies while in service will be paid to the next of kin. Proper forms for filing this claim can be secured from the service involved, but actual payment is handled by the Claims Division, General Accounting Office, Washington 25, D. C., to whom any further inquiry should be made after claim is filed.

Unpaid portions of muster-out pay may be claimed by a surviving spouse; if none, by surviving children; if no surviving children, by a surviving parent or parents.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES

All allotments and family allowances are discontinued upon report of death of men or women in the armed services.

PRISONERS OF WAR AND MISSING IN ACTION

As long as a serviceman or woman is a prisoner of war or is interned in a neutral country or is listed as missing or missing in action, dependents will continue to receive family allowances as previously, and any allotments that are for their support and have been so designated.

SPECIAL PROBLEMS

See similar topic under Assistance With Special Problems.

BURIAL

Where an enlisted man or officer is eligible for burial in a national cemetery (see page 15), arrangements may be made under certain circumstances for the burial with him of his wife or widow, and in some of these cemeteries, for the burial of minor children and unmarried adult daughters.

SOME HELPFUL SUGGESTIONS

In correspondence with any branch of the service or with the Veterans' Administration or other organizations, the veteran's full name, birth date, rank or rating, and serial, service or file number should be given. Also, any other information that will be helpful, such as the number of his insurance policy if the correspondence concerns insurance, and so on. This will result in faster action for all concerned.

Social Security: If you had a social security card before entering the service, locate it now so you will have it ready to show your employer upon return to work. You will need it if your job is in private business or industry. If you had a card but cannot find it now, apply for a duplicate so that the new card will have the same social security number as the card originally issued to you. Apply to the nearest Social Security Board office or to the Social Security Board, Candler Building, Baltimore, Md. If you can supply the number which was on your original card, a duplicate can be issued to you more quickly.

Records: Gather together all the important records that you may need and have them in a safe place where you can get them quickly when needed.

Your discharge certificate is a valuable document, so you will be wise to have it recorded. To do this you should take it to the county clerk, county recorder or other appropriate official at your local county court house. In most States, it will be recorded without charge. The original will be returned to you and then, if you ever need a copy, you can get a certified one from this source. In the meantime, keep the original in a safe place. (If you lose it, write to your own branch of the service.) A small photostat copy can be carried in your wallet.

War ration books can be obtained when you get back by applying at the War Price and Rationing Board for the place in which you live. Apply in person, with evidence of your discharge.

Every veteran should keep the following personal record:

Letter From Lt. Gen. Mark W. Clark Concerning Chaplain's Prayer on June 6

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on June 6, D-day, when the Allied forces landed on the coast of France, Dr. Frederick Brown Harris, our chaplain, opened the session of the Senate with an inspiring prayer. By a mutual friend a copy of the prayer was sent to Lt. Gen. Mark W. Clark, commanding the American Fifth Army in Italy. General Clark, under date of August 3, addressed a letter to Dr. Harris thanking him for the prayer. I think it quite worth while to have printed in the RECORD this letter, written by one of the great generals of the United States Army, who is prosecuting with such skill, vigor, and success the campaign against the enemy in Italy. General Clark's letter is indicative of the appreciation felt by the officers and men fighting for their country on the battlefields of the world for the thoughts and prayers of those who must remain at home. I ask unanimous consent that General Clark's letter be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH ARMY,
A. P. O. 6464, UNITED STATES ARMY,
August 3, 1944.

DEAR REVEREND HARRIS: I have received your inspiring prayer which you offered in the United States Senate on June 6. I want to take this opportunity to thank you for sending it. It is one of the most impressive prayers I have ever received.

These past weeks have seen some great work accomplished by the United States armed forces and our allies. We of the Fifth Army are still driving forward against stiff resistance. We shall continue to drive the enemy before us until the day of final victory. The wonderful support and prayers of those at home is a constant source of inspiration and strength to us in the accomplishment of our purpose.

With best wishes, I am,
Sincerely,

MARK W. CLARK,
Lieutenant General,
United States Army, Commanding.

Rehabilitation of Service Men and Women

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABE MURDOCK
OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the American Journal of Nursing for August 1944 by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS].

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REHABILITATING OUR SERVICE MEN AND WOMEN

(By ELBERT D. THOMAS, Ph. D.)

As the war in Europe draws to a climax, our thoughts turn to what will happen to our service men and women after it is won. Fortunately, a great deal of planning has already been done, designed to help them over their difficult adjustments to civilian life.

These plans and the legislation necessary to carry them out have been made none too soon. There is always the possibility that one or both wars may end quickly. If Germany should collapse suddenly, some 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 men and women would be discharged as soon thereafter as practicable.

The blueprints for demobilization have not been completely drawn up even yet. So far as they have been filled in, the Army intends to release first those enlisted men and officers, with certain exceptions, who have had longest service or have been much under fire. After them will go fathers over 30, married men of 30 and over without children, and unmarried men with and without dependents. In all likelihood, few, if any, Navy or Marine Corps personnel will be released before the end of the Asiatic war.

Women in the armed forces will receive the same treatment as men. Members of the Army Nurse Corps will probably be discharged in direct ratio to the number of soldiers, sailors, and marines who are released from service.

Because of this, it is well to consider the plans made by the Government for the rehabilitation of service men and women. In all the planning, there has been but one basic thought in regard to the veteran's welfare after the war or after his period of training. That thought was made a part of the Selective Service Act when it first became law. Stated very simply, it is a guaranty that every soldier, sailor, or marine will be restored to his old job if he wants it. In other words, before the American citizen was called into service at all, it was contemplated that that service would disrupt his ordinary life to such an extent that it might very well upset his entire economic well-being.

All of the thinking on the welfare of the returned soldier, be such soldier man or woman, has been based on the premise that what is done for the soldier is not solely for his own good and that of his family. It is actually for the good of the whole body politic and the national economy. That fact should be stressed because it is, in a sense, unique that a government should think of its own welfare in terms of care for those whom it has called into service.

INSURANCE, REHABILITATION, AND MUSTERING-OUT PAY

No nation, of course, can ever do what it ought to do for those who give their lives in war. The man and woman who sacrifice their lives for their country have given their all. There is nothing that can be done for them excepting to enshrine them in a place of honor. There is one thing, however, that can be done for those who are left behind. That is insurance. This was President Wilson's great contribution to an attempt to take some of the sting out of war as far as individual sacrifice is concerned.

During the past 25 years it has become a national policy to do much for veterans. From the beginning of this war, we have planned better than ever before and more logically. We have planned from the standpoint of the veteran's welfare and that of the Nation. Many bills have already been enacted into law, among them the veterans' rehabilitation law, the mustering-out pay bill, and the so-called GI bill of rights.

Under a law passed by Congress on March 17, 1943, the veteran of this war, if sick or disabled, is entitled to care in a veteran hospital for the rest of his life even though he has served but one day in uniform. Not only that, his disability or injury need not be a result of his war service. It is enough that he is a veteran.

Consequently, the Veterans' Administration is enlarging its facilities to accommodate some 300,000 veterans of all wars by 1975. At that time, Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs believes, the peak will be reached.

According to recent information from the Veterans' Administration, in order to provide adequate care for patients, the present ratio of 1 nurse to 25 psychiatric cases will be maintained; for general medical, surgical, and tuberculosis patients, the ratio is 1 nurse to 6.5–7.5 patients. Army and Navy nurses wishing such duty are assured first preference by the Veterans' Administration following their release from the service.

The mustering-out-pay bill is designed to give veterans some allowance during the period of their adjustment to civilian life. This bill, passed by Congress on February 3, 1944, within certain limitations provides cash payments of $300 to service men and women who, having performed active service for 60 days or more, have served outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska; $200 for persons who have been in active service more than 60 days, but who have not served outside the continental limits of the United States or Alaska; and $100 for persons who have performed active service for less than 60 days. A down payment will be made at the time of discharge from active duty in the first two instances, with the balance to be paid at later stated intervals. Those who receive the $100 payment will receive it in one lump sum.

THE G. I. BILL OF RIGHTS

The G. I. bill of rights, as passed by Congress on June 13 of this year, provides for Government-financed education, Government-guaranteed loans, job-finding assistance, hospitalization, and unemployment compensation for veterans of this war.

To help veterans purchase homes, farms, or small businesses the legislation provides for Government-guaranteed 20-year loans by private or public lending agencies at a maximum of 4 percent interest, with the Veterans' Administration absorbing the interest charges for the first year. The guaranty may not exceed 50 percent of the principal of a loan and no guaranty may exceed $2,000.

The unemployment section insures a maximum of 52 weeks unemployment compensation of $20 a week during the first 2 years after discharge. A job-finding agency will be established for registration for employment and for placement in employment by the veterans' Employment Service through (a) the United States Employment Service, and (b) any State agency cooperating with the United States Employment Service. While the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is made responsible for veterans' employment, this is not a function of the Veterans' Administration, but is retained in the United States Employment Service.

Under provisions of the bill, any man or woman that has served 90 days and whose education has been interrupted by his war service may return to the school of his choice after his discharge. Maximum schooling is limited to 4 years, depending upon the length of service. The Government will pay not more than $500 annually for tuition and fees, and subsistence allowances of $50 or $75 a month, depending upon whether the students have dependents. Service men and women who were over 25 at the time of their induction must prove that their education was interrupted, while it will be presumed that the education of all under 25 was interfered with by their induction.

Since this law operates entirely on a voluntary basis—that is, the Government makes the offer and the returning soldier may accept it if he wishes—no one knows how many will apply for this education and training. It is known, however, that the task will tax the ability of the Nation's teaching institutions. The more diverse the training, the greater will be the benefit to America economically and socially. The whole aim of the bill is to replace the soldier in that type of life from which he came or help him reach that to which he aspires.

If the men and women of our Army and Navy have been fighting to preserve the American way of life, surely the Government should plan that that way will not be lost in the adjustment after the war. President Roosevelt tells us that we must not only win the war—we must see that it stays won. By that he implies a proper international organization for the preservation of peace. That is only half the job. The preservation of a decent domestic life is just as essential as the preservation of the peace for our Nation internationally.

For a country to be defeated by poverty, disease, and unemployment is quite as disastrous as to be defeated by a military enemy. War is the supreme extravagance, but a loss of health, wealth, and happiness through shiftless inertia on the part of the Government is the next greatest waste. One brings death by murder, the other by suicide.

There are many who say the United States cannot afford such laws. Cannot afford good health. Cannot afford economic stability. If America can afford $300,000,000 a day to destroy, surely it can afford a few thousands of dollars to create. The Nation's economic well-being demands it. The people's social sensibilities demand it. The logic of the situation demands it. This country can no longer say it cannot afford to do some good for its citizens when these citizens have done so much for it.

Today, more than ever before, the Government is recognizing that great areas in the country have low health standards. Babies die, mothers are permanently weakened through lack of proper care before and after childbirth; children are weakened and handicapped in their normal growth by poor nutrition and bad sanitation. Adults in some areas live in conditions which sap their interest in living, prevent their being useful workers and members of society.

NURSES WILL BE NEEDED

Here is the place—the need—for the nurse, and every nurse should think of herself as a guardian of public health. Post-war plans have been drawn up to increase public health services all over the country, especially in these substandard areas. Nurses, in ever increasing numbers, will be needed to man these clinics and health centers.

Thus it can be seen that the Nation has a vital stake in the expansion of nurse education. The Bolton Act, creating the United States Cadet Nurse Corps under the sponsorship of the United States Public Health Service, was designed as a wartime measure, pure and simple. It is my belief, however, that Federal assistance to nurse education must not be allowed to die with the coming of peace. The results it has achieved in a year more than justify its continued existence.

After this war we are going to need more and better nurses than ever before in the history of this country. Recruiting and educating these young women can never again be the duty of the schools of nursing alone. It is a duty which must be shared by the Government, the voluntary nursing organizations, and the schools, if we are to have an adequate supply of properly educated nurses to meet the evolving health needs of our land.

Universal education and alert health measures in peacetime actually pay dividends in time of war. An Army personnel officer, testifying before a Senate committee, declared that 5 out of every 10 men called by the draft are rejected for one reason or another. In those States where educational standards are low, public health nurses few, and health regulations just average, 7 men out of 10 are not taken. But in those States whose educational requirements are high, who provide public health nurses, and where health administration is on a State-wide basis, only 2 out of 10 are turned down. In States with excellent health and educational standards, the acceptance ratio is very much higher.

Did the States who paid well for the education of their youth and for the improvement of health waste money? There is no greater waste, in war or peace, than the man who cannot take some share in the protection of his country because of poor health conditions, which could be easily remedied, or because he does not know how to read as write Progress in peacetime too demands that every citizen be able to meet its challenges with optimum health.

The world has been put back countless years as a result of this global war. The creative energies of an entire generation have been devoted to but one purpose—destruction. Those same energies, directed to peaceful pursuits, might have done much to solve the riddles of the ages—the causes and cure of cancer, the virus diseases, and arthritis, the control of tuberculosis and venereal disease, the mysteries of the atom and the electron.

The men and women who are called to fight have made sacrifices, all great and some ultimate. What little is done for them by the Government through these rehabilitation bills will be a healing influence for them and for the communities to which they will return. These laws are the only means by which the Nation can show its gratitude for the invaluable services of soldier and sailor, nurse and marine.

Dumbarton Oaks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PETE JARMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, if the conference which commenced at Dumbarton Oaks Monday, and which I am delighted to say has apparently gotten off to such an excellent beginning as to justify optimism, accomplishes what we all so ardently hope and pray for, this old residence, already an institution in Washington, will become an incomparable international shrine. Hence, I consider it desirable that readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD become more familiar with it and, therefore, quote an editorial from the Washington Star of August 23:

DUMBARTON OAKS

One of the constructive effects of the present international conference in Washington will be to make Dumbarton Oaks famous throughout the world. The beauty of the house, its furnishings, decorations, and grounds is certain to remain in the memory of all participants in the meetings. For the information of Americans as well as visitors from abroad, a few words of explanation of the history of the property may be offered.

The land, it seems, was acquired from Thomas Beall by William H. Dorsey, first judge of the local Orphans' Court, in the administration of Thomas Jefferson in 1800. His house was constructed between 1800 and 1804. It was sold then to Robert Beverly, of Essex County, Va., whose wife was Jane, a sister of Colonel John Tayloe, the builder of the celebrated Octagon House. The Beverlys owned the place until 1822, when it passed to James E. Calhoun, of South Carolina, and thus became the residence of his brother, John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War under James Monroe and Vice President with John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson. Called Acrolophos and Monterey at different periods, the whole establishment was bought by Edward M. Linthicum in 1846. The next proprietor was Colonel Henry M. Blount, from whom the mansion and its immediate surroundings received its present name. Much more important, however, were the costly improvements added by Robert Woods Bliss, former Ambassador to the Argentine Republic, and his wife during their tenancy beginning about a decade ago. Harvard University is the actual holder of the deed, but the people of Washington especially and their guests are the beneficiaries of their exquisite taste, discrimination, and generosity.

Manpower and Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial was published in the Hartford (Conn.) Daily Courant on August 22.

This editorial expresses the sentiments of a large number of men and women who have written to me protesting the high-handed administration of the War Manpower Commission.

The mere fact that Congress refused to pass a labor-drafting bill means nothing to this administration. A directive by "Assistant President" James F. Byrnes is as good as a law for Mr. McNutt.

Watch the election returns in the labor precincts on November 7.

MANPOWER AND POLITICS

Area directors of the War Manpower Commission have been meeting in Chicago recently to discuss methods by which sanctions may be applied against employers who violate W. M. C. rulings. Since these rules are of bureaucratic rather than legislative origin, it is only fitting that the guilt of the offenders shall be decided by the same authorities who make the rules and who fix the penalties. These penalties are boycott and blackball. Through O. P. A., gasoline and tire rations are cut off. Through W. P. B. the Manpower Commission will seek to withhold materials and will doubtless seek the diversion of contracts from offenders. The W. M. C. itself will refrain from referring workers to the erring manufacturer.

The serious doubts about the legality of these procedures may explain the furtive, undercover manner in which the instructions are being transmitted to the lord high executioners in the field. The instructions were issued early this week and are supposedly currently effective, but the W. M. C. in Washington has thus far declined to make the details public, saying that there may be some changes made as a result of current discussions with regional directors.

Although it is wholly incidental to this problem, it may be fervently wished that the manpower directors have on their agenda some discussion designed to clarify the situation with regard to the steady transition of Government employees to the pay roll of Sidney Hillman's Political Action Committee. Although a worker in a Hartford factory finds himself frozen to his job, the freezing process apparently does not apply to employees of the W. M. C. and other Government agencies. Only recently W. M. C. released two of its highly paid officials to become director and women's director of the Political Action Committee. These are only two of a large group of Government employees who seem to have no difficulty whatever in giving up their Government work to engage in Mr. Hillman's campaign. Doubtless this latter work is considered by many New Dealers as being of a highly essential nature, if not to the war, then to their own political fortunes.

From the outset the activities of the W. M. C. on the national level have been dogged by this same political point of view. Even such a master politician as Paul V. McNutt is not adept enough to keep his political balls in the air while at the same time doing a workmanlike job of manpower control. Hence, the series of ineptitudes and inconsistencies that have characterized the handling of manpower in the United States. Unfortunately, the end, even now, is not in sight.

Veterans' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, veterans of World War No. 2 have been given wonderful opportunities by a friendly and generous Congress. This is as it should be, since these brave men were willing to give the supreme sacrifice for their country. Many of these brave veterans saw their buddies drop in action.

They can buy or repair a home, buy and stock up a farm, start a new business, get a high-school or college education, draw special unemployment benefits if unable to find work, be assured of free and adequate hospitalization.

Benefits extend to men and women of the armed services who have other than dishonorable discharges and who have served 90 days since September 15, 1940, or less than 90 days if they have service-connected disabilities.

It is important to know exactly what the Government now offers, what the terms, the conditions, the opportunities are in each field.

FIRST, TAKE THE OPPORTUNITY FOR HOME BUYING OR FOR BUYING A FARM

A qualified veteran will be able to get the Veterans' Administration to arrange for a Government-guaranteed loan for buying or building a home or for making repairs, alterations, and improvements on a home. Such loans also may be obtained by a veteran to pay off back taxes or delinquent debts on homes. The Government will guarantee 50 percent of the loan up to $2,000 and will pay the first year's interest on the part of the loan that it guarantees. Thus, a veteran can borrow up to $4,000, with the Government standing behind half of it.

These loans can be made by a bank, loan association, or any other lending agency, including an individual or friend of the veteran. If you are a veteran who obtains such a loan, you would have to satisfy the lender as to collateral on your share. But in case of buying a home, the home could be used as collateral. Interest on these loans cannot exceed 4 percent, and they must be repaid in full within 20 years.

In addition, the Government will guarantee fully a secondary loan up to 20 percent of the cost of the property. But the total amount guaranteed by the Government in both loans cannot exceed $2,000. This provision makes it possible for veterans to get cash for original down payments on homes. Interest on such secondary loans can run up to 5 percent. Veterans have until 2 years after the war or 2 years after their discharge, whichever is later, to take advantage of the loan opportunities.

Loans on the same basis are available for veterans who want to buy farms. Money from the loans may be used to purchase land, buildings, livestock, machinery, or other equipment or for making repairs and improvements. But if you are a veteran and want to buy a farm, you must show that you know something about farming and are likely to make a success of the undertaking.

SUPPOSE A VETERAN WANTS TO SET UP HIS OWN BUSINESS

Here the procedure and conditions for getting loans are about the same as those for buying homes or farms. The money may be used to buy an established business or land, buildings, supplies, equipment, machinery, and so forth. Secondary loans are also available for down payments. But if you are getting a loan for this purpose, the Veterans' Administration will want to know something about your background and experience in this business. In other words, you will have to show that there is a reasonable likelihood that you will make a success of it. Even so, it is expected that many veterans will want to start their own business and will be helped.

IF IT IS A MATTER OF EDUCATION OR TRAINING

When a veteran qualifies for a college, school, or training course, the Government will pay up to $500 a year to cover tuition, laboratory fees, cost of books, and so forth. The student also will get $50 a month living allowance, plus $25 a month if he has a wife or other dependents. He may choose his school, but he must keep up with the work or he will be dropped.

If a veteran was under 25 when he entered the service, he may return to school even though his education was not interrupted. That is, he may have left school and been working when he entered service. But anyone who was 25 or over when he went into service must show, in order to qualify, that his education was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with. However, any veteran who desires a refresher or retraining course may take such a course for 1 year.

A veteran who qualifies for college or other schooling will be able to remain at Government expense for 1 year. Then, if he qualifies for further education, he can remain for the length of time, up to a total of 4 years, that he served between September 15, 1940, and the end of the war. He has until 2 years after his discharge or after the war ends to return to school. This Government-paid education program stops 7 years after the war ends.

NEXT, AS TO UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Ex-service men and women will be able to claim unemployment benefits of $20 a week for up to 52 weeks if they cannot find jobs. They will be entitled to 4 weeks of unemployment benefits for each month of service, plus additional time allowance for the first 90 days of service. But they are supposed to register with a public employment agency, such as the United States Employment Service, and accept suitable work if offered. Furthermore, they will be disqualified from unemployment benefits if they give up suitable jobs without reason, are fired for misconduct, or, in certain cases, go out on strike. Unemployment benefits will be available to a veteran until 2 years after his discharge or 2 years after the war, whichever is later.

Cash benefits also are provided for self-employed veterans who make less than $100 a month. They can have the Government make up the difference between their net earnings and $100 a month. Like the unemployment payment, this benefit is allowed up to 52 weeks, according to length of service.

If veterans have any questions about these aids, see your Red Cross, veteran service officer, or local American Legion head. If you have any further questions or need any more help, write to Congressman JIMMY MORRISON, Washington, D. C.

Two Divergent Views of the Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Edgar Ansel Mowrer:

TWO DIVERGENT VIEWS OF THE PEACE

(By Edgar Ansel Mowrer)

Two books on international affairs have recently appeared. One is by former Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles, the other by the columnist, Walter Lippmann. Both contain plans for the future world. But here the resemblance ends.

Mr. Welles' book, The Time for Decision, is the most important book on foreign policy to appear in this country in the last 20 years. No one else in the administration could have written it, and, unfortunately, only a handful of Americans are competent to criticize the solutions it offers.

But what Mr. Welles says about world organization concerns every American.

Mr. Welles believes that the world can be organized for permanent peace, not in some vague future time—now. He knows that the foundation of such peace cannot possibly be anything less than an organization representing all nations, large and small, and with the power and the obligation to suppress aggression everywhere. (He quotes with satisfaction Maxim Litvinov's dictum, "Peace is indivisible.") He would put the immediate responsibility for this in the hands of a provisional executive council, heavily weighted in favor of the great powers.

As one of the authors of the doctrine of voluntary inter-American solidarity (good-neighbor policy), Mr. Welles trusts this can be maintained and leans (too) heavily on regionalism. He wishes to eschew the creation of an international police force, overlooking the utility of the latter as a "trigger" to set off combined action by the major powers. He further concedes to the big countries a veto power on action by the executive council, which to this writer is unacceptable.

In fact, many aspects of this plan are unacceptable.

Nonetheless, it is a real plan, not a shoddy imitation of one. Its faults—excessive nationalism and concentration of power in a few hands—are such as could be eliminated without upsetting the general structure.

Moreover, Mr. Welles understands that unless the international organization is set up now, while hostilities are still going on, it risks never being set up at all. Therefore he urges the governments, and Washington in particular, to go about setting up the provisional executive council, a security and armaments commission, a world court, and a world council right away, as the "four bodies indispensable to any permanent world organization."

Mr. Lippmann, on the other hand, has produced the most astonishing mixture of fatalism, specious reasoning, and quaint illusions about international affairs that has appeared in many a day.

His book, United States War Aims, seems to me an engraved invitation to World War No. 3.

Mr. Lippmann sees the world dividing into great communities—an Atlantic community; a Soviet orbit; a Chinese orbit; eventually an Indian orbit and a Moslem orbit; united in a vague association and a pallid world organization without political authority. And instead of calling out the fire department pronto, he urges us to recognize and perpetuate this division.

Mr. Lippmann hopes that somehow these great communities will be unable to fight each other. In the new wonderland: "Continental Europeans will not mind being separated into two camps and subordinated, part to Anglo-Saxons, part to the Soviets; Germans can be induced to accept disarmament in a fully armed world; Russians will permit a disarmed Germany to enter the Atlantic community; two of the three great blocs will never be tempted to gang-up on the third; the impingement of the overseas possessions of members of the Atlantic community on the Soviet and Chinese orbits will never cause friction; countries will never seek to change community—i. e., France or Spain will not wish to enter the Soviet orbit; Poland and Czechoslovakia never aspire to the Atlantic community;" therefore, security can continue to be entrusted to alliances of fully soverign nations and national armies and navies.

It is a lovely, neat world—if you can believe in it—and I suspect Mr. Lippmann does not. He has merely convinced himself that a really international organization is impossible. The new world cannot be planned; it grows like a tree. No one, insists Mr. Lippmann, can sit in his study and invent a workable peace.

Obviously Mr. Lippmann can't. But in 1789 the American founding fathers did. At that time, according to the historian Roland Greene Usher, there was among the Thirteen Colonies "no geographical or economic basis for a single nation or a single government." The Revolution against the British had been made in the name of States' right. The "radicals" of the day considered Virginia, Massachusetts, etc., to be just as fundamentally sovereign as Lippmann would have the national states remain today. And just as willful men in Philadelphia sat down and invented the United States, so, if given a chance, men like Sumner Welles could sit down with our allies and invent the United Nations of the world.

Always provided they could hush the croakers who say it cannot be done.

Emergency Assistance for Public Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, there is pending before the House of Representatives H. R. 2849. This is a bill which has for its purpose the authorization of an appropriation of funds to assist the States and Territories in more adequately financing their systems of public education during emergency, and in reducing the inequalities of educational opportunities through public elemental and secondary schools.

There was also pending in the Senate a bill known as S. 637. That bill was to the same import as the House bill, to which I have just referred. That Senate bill failed to pass the Senate.

I find that there is very much interest in the country with reference to the legislation suggested in these bills. The people of the Nation are always interested in educational matters. They are also very proud of the public schools. They want to keep the public schools as near to the people as possible. They have been skeptical of Federal aid and they are opposed to Federal control of public schools. They are, therefore, opposed to any Federal legislation that will jeopardize State control or that will tend to encourage Federal control.

Teachers in Ohio are very much interested in the proposed legislation and most of them seem to favor it.

Dr. T. C. McCracken, who is the Dean of the College of Education at Ohio University at Athens, has studied this subject very extensively and exhaustively. He is a thoroughly qualified school man, both from the standpoint of the philosophy of education and also from the standpoint of the technique of successful teaching. Dr. McCracken has prepared a short history of legislation of this kind, passed by Congress in the past 75 years. He has embodied in a letter that I received from him recently. I think this letter is very informative and this history should be considered especially by the Committee on Education of the House and Senate and also by all Congressmen interested in this legislation. I can recommend Dr. McCracken as being thoroughly American and thoroughly qualified to write about the subject involved.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have Dr. McCracken's letter presented to Congress and presented to the people of the country through the reading of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

OHIO UNIVERSITY, COLLEGE OF EDUCATION,
Athens, Ohio, August 3, 1944.

Hon. THOMAS A. JENKINS,
Ironton, Ohio.

MY DEAR MR. JENKINS: Following my promise to write to you relative to Federal aid for general education, I am forwarding with this letter some materials and data in which you may be interested.

I am enclosing one page on which I have listed acts which bring aid to general education beginning 1802, when the saline grants were made to 1920 when the Federal reserve income grant on minerals was made. At the present time approximately $2,000,000 a year are received by States from these enactments. On the same page you will find a list of defeated bills, beginning with the Hoar bill of 1870 and continuing to the bill which is at present before Congress under date of 1943, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, the Thomas-Hill-Ramspeck bill (S. 637; H. R. 2849). On at least two occasions these bills have been reported out of committee, but in all other cases they have been killed in committee. The Thomas-Hill S. 637 was killed by the rider which was put on it by the Senator from North Dakota last year. The Ramspeck bill, H. R. 2849, is the one which is still lodged in the House of Representatives committee. As indicated in my previous letter, the attempt is being made to bring it to the floor over the head of the committee. The educational people of the country are behind this bill quite unanimously and believe that there are enough votes to make it a law, providing it can be gotten to a vote in the House of Representatives. This would probably reopen the case on S. 637 in the Senate.

The point which I am wishing to make in this connection, however, is that through all these years, 1870–1943, practically all proposed legislation for aid to the States for general education has been killed. In the meantime, however, there has been liberal aid on the part of the Federal Government for special types of education. I refer to the following acts which are the most important of the acts in this area of support. These are listed on the enclosed sheet among which are the first Morrill Act of 1862 and additional acts to 1936 when the George-Deen Act was passed. They bring relatively large support for special types of education. There are other subordinate acts which from time to time have increased the amount of money given in connection with all of the acts mentioned in my list. For example, the Smith-Hughes Act provided for a much smaller amount of money at the beginning, but by 1925 it had risen to $7,200,000 annually. Other acts of less direct importance have been passed for aid to special education, thus increasing the volume of moneys made available for special types of education.

There is one special feature which has been included in these acts beginning with the Smith-Lever Act of 1914. For the first time, this act called for a matching of the money by the State on the dollar-for-dollar basis. This meant that the State's money which otherwise might have been spent within the State for various kinds of education was put into matching funds. This left the other kinds of education in the State with much less support than they had had before. In other words, the State has robbed its treasury for the support of special types of education at the expense of general education. Practically all of the important acts from 1914 have carried the matching provision. When the George-Deen bill was presented in 1936, they were evidently a little frightened lest the States might not be willing to match on the dollar-for-dollar basis. The bill provided, therefore, that in the first year, the States should match 50 cents for $1. The States' amount, however, was to be increased each year to 60, 70, 80, 90 cents, and finally $1 at the end of 5 years when it reached the dollar-for-dollar basis. General education, therefore, is being robbed within the States in order that the States may get additional support from the Federal Government for special types of education. There is, therefore, considerable danger in the matching plan.

The total amounts received by the Federal Government for each year under aid for special types of education runs well toward $50,000,000 a year. This is in contrast to the $2,000,000 to general education.

I have not included in the above the very liberal, and from many points of view unwise, Federal aid to education during the past dozen years. Most of this aid has been given directly by the Federal Government to Federal agents in the States. Regularly organized State programs have often been greatly handicapped by the types of aid which I have just mentioned. For example, no certification by the Federal Government was required. State and local plans for education were often greatly disturbed by such political aid from the Federal Government. The amounts of money spent under these plans have been much in excess of the aid which the Federal Government has given through regular State channels for general and special types of education.

The Ramspeck bill is probably on your desk. I am, however, enclosing a copy of it in order that you may have it at hand. I am enclosing a pamphlet issued by the National Education Association entitled "The Federal Government Must Aid Public Schools." This was put out by N. E. A. in support of S. 637. I am forwarding with this letter a copy of a manuscript which I have used on three or four occasions in various parts of the State of Ohio as I talked to educational and lay groups about the place of the Federal Government in education. There are nine pages of this manuscript. I am enclosing it for your assistance as you prepare for discussion in the House. I shall be pleased to have it returned when you are through with it, although if you need to keep it please feel free to do so, since I do have a second copy.

I hope that this presentation has not been too long. I have given in pages 1 and 2 of the outlines enclosed a list of bills and acts. You may wish to have one of your secretaries gather more information for you about them.

With best wishes, I am,

Cordially yours,

T. C. MCCRACKEN,
Dean, College of Education.

Why Is the W. R. A. Allowed To Spend Money This Way?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAIR ENGLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial from the Sacramento (Calif.) Bee of August 19, 1944, dealing with the ridiculous expenditure of public funds by the W. R. A. to propagandize the American people on the virtues of the Japanese in the relocation centers:

WHY IS W. R. A. ALLOWED TO SPEND MONEY THIS WAY?

During the period when the Japanese were being evacuated from the west coast—a matter of vital concern both to the residents of California and the areas where they would be relocated—the War Relocation Authority assumed an attitude of studious silence.

In fact, it was the opinion of Dillon S. Myer, the national director of the W. R. A., that if little enough were said about the evacuated Japanese the public soon might forget they even existed.

Indeed, this end might have been accomplished if it were not that the peculiar ineptness of the W. R. A. itself constantly made the public painfully aware of the presence of the Japanese. The point is, however, that when it was to the advantage of the Americans to be informed of the evacuation, the W. R. A. was singularly tongue-tied.

Now the public relations department of the W. R. A. has come suddenly to life.

Fat envelopes, sent under Government frank, are pouring from the W. R. A. offices stuffed with out-and-out propaganda in behalf of the Japanese. The purpose of the propaganda is to extol the virtues of the Japanese in the relocation centers; the obvious intent is to soften up the public for their release.

Included in the latest batch is a copy of an address delivered by a Japanese, a 12-page sheaf of photostats of favorable newspaper items, and a reprint of an article in Fortune, with illustrations. The last was reprinted by the American Council of Public Affairs and mailed in Government postage free envelopes.

The extraordinary thing about this is that it establishes some sort of a precedent in the use of Government funds to propagandize in behalf of any group of persons.

The same principle would be involved if the efforts were being extended in behalf of people named Smith.

Thousands of dollars in salaries are paid to the W. R. A.'s propagandists annually, in addition to the cost of printing, mimeographing, photostating and mailing.

Most persons will regard these expenditures as a decidedly improper use of Government funds. Also, how does Myer explain the silence of his press relations department on one occasion and its extreme verbosity on another?

Officers' Service Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, by permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a newspaper article, I want to call the attention of my colleagues to the magnificent work being done by the Officers Service Committee, located in the Hotel Commodore in New York City. The operations of this organization are carried on by volunteers in rooms provided free of charge by the generous cooperation of Mr. Martin Sweeny, president of the Hotel Commodore, which is a real and practical contribution to the war effort.

These volunteers, who give freely of their time without thought of reward or publicity, are prominent residents in New York City and whatever expenses are incurred, such as telephone service, and so forth, are paid for out of funds supplied by the National War Fund, through the New York City Defense Recreation Committee.

Army and Navy officers and their wives from every State in the Union, as well as from foreign lands, have called on the O. S. C. and no effort has been spared to make their stay in New York pleasant and comfortable. The Officers Service Committee is conducting a necessary and much appreciated service, quietly and efficiently, and deserves the gratitude and thanks of a grateful people everywhere.

The following article by Cecile Hamilton, appearing in the New York Herald Tribune on August 27, well describes their activities:

OFFICERS SERVICE COMMITTEE FINDS HOUSING A BIG PROBLEM—800,000 IN UNITED NATIONS FORCES GET AID FROM VOLUNTEER GROUP HERE; RECREATION DEMANDS RANK HIGH AMONG ACTIVITIES

(By Cecile Hamilton)

Enlisted men have no monopoly on need for morale-building recreation, family housing, and help with the personal problems of war-time living. Equally human and in need are the officers of the armed forces. No greater proof of this can be found than in the fact that, since its inception in 1941, the Officers Service Committee has given assistance to more than 800,000 officers of the United Nations.

To meet this demand the O. S. C. has expanded by leaps and bounds until today its activities require the work of 138 volunteers at headquarters in the Commodore.

Family housing is, of course, one of the biggest problems. As one lieutenant put it, "My dog and my wife are my only worries. What am I going to do with them?"

His was only one of hundreds of requests received that day for apartments. Many New Yorkers list available apartments and furnished rooms at O. S. C., but this summer the prevailing type has been the eight-room $350 affair, and few if any officers can touch them. Nevertheless, the O. S. C. manages to find housing for an average of 600 officers a month.

Even more popular is the hotel reservation desk. With the cooperation of hotel managers, O. S. C. is allotted several rooms each day at reduced rates. Demands for reservations are filled at the rate of 5,000 a month, which includes an occasional emergency call from the port director to obtain rooms for naval disaster survivors.

Recreation is understandably high on the list of service. Through the entertainment world's generosity theater, opera, concert and athletic event tickets are available to junior officers at half price and to senior officers at full price, less broker's fee. Cocktail parties and dances given by other organizations are listed and cards of introduction presented to officers who wish them.

New York is just as glamorous and exciting to officers as it is to many enlisted men. One young officer from Montana, with no friends in the city, asked to attend a cocktail party. As one was scheduled on Fifth Avenue, he received a card to present to the hostess. "Gee, lady," he grinned, "could I keep the card to send home to the folks? They'd be tickled to know I'd been to a party on Fifth Avenue."

As more and more men return from the combat areas and are discharged from hospitals, the organization has found it necessary to establish an extensive resort and travel bureau. Men back from 50 combat missions over Germany are not always in a mood for parties and gay times, but would rather find some quiet spot in the mountains or by the shore.

With the assistance of private beach clubs, country clubs, many small resorts, and private estates, the O. S. C. has been able to find suitable and happy surroundings for these men. Recently they sent a group of British and Canadian combat pilots to a private club and were delighted when they returned some time later saying: "Wait till we get home and tell the folks about American hospitality. They wouldn't let us spend a cent out there."

Conducting a large mail-order business is another necessary O. S. C. activity, most requests for shopping service coming from officers overseas. Flowers for mothers, rings for fiancees, birthday gifts for wives and presents for children are all handled by expert women shoppers. Typical of such requests was a letter from a lieutenant in the Pacific area asking the O. S. C. to buy a bottle warmer for his new-born son.

Adult Delinquency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

ADULT DELINQUENCY

The concise, meaningful 150-word address delivered by Richard N. M. Snyder, president of the board of directors at the Easton school district, to the 1944 graduating class of Easton High School has been reprinted in the New York Sun, New York's PM, and other newspapers and is on the way to becoming a newspaper classic of the time.

Jane Cowl broadcast Mr. Snyder's pithy, pungent apology to the rising generation for the delinquency of his own adult generation this week over a national radio network.

Mr. Snyder's speech, which is winning a place in the field of letters for its brevity and clarity and in the field of logic for its reasoning, follows:

"As president of the board of directors of the Easton school district I congratulate you upon the completion of your studies and the awarding of the diplomas here tonight.

"What I have to say will necessarily be brief. I have no message or advice to offer. Rather, I want to apologize to you. After 2,000 years of Christianity my generation has dragged you through the worst depression the world has ever seen, and now to prove our unfitness we are immersing you in the most horrible blood bath civilization has ever known.

"This mess that we are handing you is a flagrant case of adult delinquency. We now look to you for a better world. Despite your teen age, I believe that your jitterbugging, boogie-woogie and bobby socks represent a more mature mentality than our slot machines, politics, and radio singing commercials.

"We have given you the tools so that you might justify yourselves in the eyes of your children. Don't fail them as we have. Good luck and God bless you!"

That is a heartfelt message older men and women could repeat to their sons as they march off to fight and win a war they did not make themselves.

Tribute to Judge Carr, California Civic and Political Leader

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to record the passing of a distinguished Californian. The friends of Judge Francis Carr in all parts of California and of this country were shocked to learn of his death following a brief illness on Monday August 21, 1944. Judge Carr lived in Redding and spent his lifetime in Shasta County, Calif. That lifetime was one well spent in rearing five sons and two daughters, all splendid and outstanding American citizens; in civic and community leadership, much of which was of State-wide importance; in becoming one of California's ablest and best-known attorneys; and in being one of its greatest Democratic leaders. Judge Carr fought long and skillfully for the Central Valley project in California and the Shasta Dam which has just been completed and has barely begun to deliver its vast benefits to the people of California and of this Nation. For over 25 years he championed the cause of good roads as a leader in the California State Automobile Association and the Good Roads Commission. He was active in county, State, and national Democratic politics since 1896 and helped to provide the sinew and the bone of Democratic organization in California during the long lean years when there was little to encourage party loyalty and 40 years passed without the election of a Democratic Governor. He was truly a great leader whose courage, enthusiasm and fortitude were never shaken; his passing will be deeply mourned and his place will be difficult if not impossible to fill.

Study of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to call attention of the House membership to the editorial published in the August 28 issue of the Washington Post regarding the resolution for a study of congressional machinery and proposals for improvement in the functioning of our organization:

STUDY OF CONGRESS

Not much attention was given to the Maloney-Monroney resolution authorizing a study of Congress when it slipped through the Senate by unanimous consent on Wednesday. It was wholly overshadowed by the uprising in Paris, the fall of Marseille, the withdrawal of Rumania from the war and the international peace conference at Dumbarton Oaks. Nevertheless, this resolution may have a profound effect upon the future government in the United States. If it is promptly accepted by the House the resulting study will be the most promising undertaking of recent years to bring our national legislature abreast of its colossal responsibilities.

The resolution authorizes a joint Senate-House committee to "make a full and complete study of the organization and operation of the Congress of the United States" and to recommend improvements with the object of "strengthening the Congress, simplifying its operations, improving its relationships with other branches of the United States Government and enabling it better to meet its responsibilities under the Constitution." No doubt the committee would be composed of such men as Senators MALONEY and LA FOLLETTE, Representatives DIRKSEN and MONRONEY, who have already given much time and thought to the problem of modernizing Congress. It would probably call upon experts in and out of Congress for a full expression of views as to how our legislative body can be made to function more effectively. If the House acts promptly, the committee could begin work at once and it might have a program of preliminary reforms ready for approval by the time the new Congress meets in January.

It is true that the resolution as passed by the Senate contains a restrictive amendment informing the proposed committee that its duties would not include any recommendation for changes in the parliamentary rules of either house. Apparently this is a gesture intended to avoid the appearance of stepping on the toes of the Rules Committees. Some sponsors of the resolution believe that this amendment would have no effect upon the proposed committee's work. It appears to us, however, to be a needless and possibly dangerous restriction, and we hope that the House will strike it out.

In some measure the war has temporarily obscured the urgency of congressional reorganization, for under its pressures impediments to prompt action have frequently been overcome. The necessities of war have also held rein on the antagonism between the executive and legislative branches. With the stimuli of war relaxed, and the country confronted with staggering problems of reconstruction, world organization, etc., the need for a smoother working organization within Congress and for better coordination of executive and legislative policies will be especially acute. In our opinion, this is one of the most important tasks demanding prompt congressional attention, and the Maloney-Monroney resolution, stripped of crippling amendments, is undoubtedly the most practical approach that can be made to it.

Virginia Should Repeal the Poll Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, eight States in the Union still cling to the payment of the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting. In my judgment the time has arrived when the Legislature of Virginia should at the very earliest possible time take suitable action that will repeal the requirement of poll-tax payment to the right to vote. I am sure this matter has given much concern to our State political leaders. Personally, I have discussed it with many of them. The time for action is at hand.

In the last, and again in this session of Congress, there has been passed in the House a repeal act. I, of course, have voted each time against this attempted Federal usurpation of the rights of the States. I am frank to say, however, that the persistent reluctance of the States to take action on this matter leaves its Representatives in Congress in a most uncomfortable position. We may expect in the next Congress a renewed drive that will probably put the law on the statute books. In all probability it would be held constitutional by the Supreme Court. That would be a tragedy indeed.

Whatever may have been said in justification of the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting when it was written into our State law, so far as I can observe it serves no useful purpose now. It is, on the other hand, a definite cause of political irritation. It is outmoded and in disrepute, and we might as well be realistic about it. Virginia will either take the action or the Federal Government will repeal it.

If we force the Federal Government to take this action, we will have set a precedent of ominous and far-reaching effect. The precedent established would be that the voting qualifications in the States can be changed by the Federal Government at Washington. There are many who would like to see this step taken—a step toward a further centralization of power at Washington. Let us face the facts and act accordingly, on our own initiative and not at the mandate of Federal authority. I commend this most important matter to the earnest consideration of the distinguished and able members of our State legislature.

Approval of Treaties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED GOSSETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I dislike placing editorials or noncongressional comment in the RECORD. However, an editorial appearing in the Washington Post yesterday is of such importance that it should be reproduced here.

The imperative need for a change in the treaty-ratification provision in the Constitution will become more and more obvious in the days immediately ahead. Treaties should be ratified by simple majorities of the House and the Senate. The present requirement of a two-thirds vote of the Senate to ratify a treaty has always been and will continue to be a stumbling block in the path of our international affairs. It is hoped the Congress will soon submit to the people a constitutional amendment changing our method of treaty ratification.

APPROVAL OF TREATIES

Secretary Hull's action in submitting the British-American oil pact to the Senate for approval probably came as a shock to those who have been advocating greater use of Executive agreements in the conduct of our international affairs. Yet it was the logical course to take. The agreement touches the domestic interests of the country at several points. To leave policies of such far-reaching import solely to Executive discretion would certainly not be compatible with our democratic system.

Apparently the decision of the State Department to handle the pact as a treaty rather than an agreement was largely influenced by the intense interest which it aroused in the Senate. Both the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a special committee investigating oil shortages analyzed the pact. Presumably to make their concern more apparent they held a joint meeting last week. Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS pointed out that, while the agreement ostensibly deals with only international aspects of the oil problem, domestic interests will be inevitably affected by regulation of the flow of foreign oil. There developed in both committees a strong demand for full information about the treaty and its possible effect upon the oil industry as well as upon our future national defense. This does not seem to imply antagonism toward the pact, but a determination to see that it is properly safeguarded.

Failure to submit the agreement to the Senate under these circumstances might have led to its undoing, for legislation to carry out recommendations of the proposed International Petroleum Commission is certain to be needed. An antagonistic Senate could defeat such legislation or deny funds to meet our share of the Commission's expenses. There is no way of bypassing Congress on major questions of national policy, even if that could be considered desirable, without incurring even greater risks than are incurred in the submission of treaties to the Senate.

Precedent as well as good judgment confirms the course that has been taken. Both the sugar and coffee treaties were ratified by the Senate. Now it may be assumed that when the administration gets around to negotiating international accords on rubber, tin, and probably other commodities, these will also go to the Senate for approval. There is no direct analogy between these commodity agreements and the past for joint action to preserve the peace now taking shape at Dumbarton Oaks. Yet this latest precedent will strengthen the demand for submission of whatever peace treaties may be negotiated for approval by the Senate before ratification. Indeed, that course is implicit in the long consultations between Secretary Hull and a select group of Senators from the Foreign Relations Committee.

This renewed emphasis upon "the advice and counsel of the Senate" makes it the more imperative to hasten amendment of the constitutional requirement of a two-thirds vote for approval of treaties. The post-war period is almost certain to become an era of international pacts of many kinds. To leave control over this process to one-third plus one of the Senate might lead to a reckless frittering away of our victory. It is a risk that a great world power cannot afford to take. As a sequence to the current reaffirmation of the Senate's role in international affairs, administration and Senate leaders cannot move too quickly to abolish the undemocratic arrangement inherited from the dead days of our isolation from world affairs.

Like a Great Cloud

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Omaha World-Herald entitled "Like a Great Cloud":

LIKE A GREAT CLOUD

The story of meat as it is daily unfolding has come to resemble a nightmare. There is no thread of reason running through it. It simply is what it is, beyond understanding or explanation. Even the bureaucracy responsible for the preposterous condition can't explain, much less begin to understand.

Here in Omaha, as everywhere else, there is the problem of what to do with utility beef. There are just oodles of it, but nobody wants it. It's tough. And it doesn't taste very good.

"I bought one side of the stuff," says Charles Holm, "and it was so green and flavorless I had to grind it up as hamburger."

Yet it is about the only kind of beef to be had—in a year when meat production promises to go to an all-time high. Utility beef is beef that hasn't been fed and conditioned in the feed lots, where good beef is produced.

And why hasn't it been? Not for lack of feed. But because the bright boys of the bureaucracy in Washington had decided that meat is a wasteful and expensive food. Better than feed grain to cattle and hogs, to eat it ourselves. Lots more food value that way. And by converting ourselves into a Nation of vegetarians a food famine might be averted.

And so they vigorously discouraged the feeding of livestock. Accordingly beef—more beef than we know what to do with—comes to us green and tough and unpalatable. Distressed housewives don't want it, and it gluts the market. But with a good result, they say. Famine is averted. The answer to that is only another part of the foolish story.

From Washington the Des Moines Register and Tribune tells the fact about that.

"The war surplus problem"—in the words of a W. F. A. official—"has grown to commanding proportions." Agricultural "planners" are "faced with a huge threatening surplus." In this country "2,000,000 tons of surplus food are piled up." In England "there is thought to be nearly three times that much."

The surplus in England alone is "far more than the highest estimates of European requirements in the first year of the relief period." And "these huge stores of food have begun to hang over W. F. A. like a great cloud." The use of caves and stone quarries and abandoned mines for storage purposes is part of the recent hurried planning.

Here are but two aspects of the many-faceted food story. Figure the rest out—if you can—for yourself.

Resolution of Protest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARLE D. WILLEY

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a resolution of protest sent to me by the representative of a group of Christian citizens of Delaware and Pennsylvania, as follows:

Inasmuch as food is still rationed and farmers and poultry raisers cannot obtain sufficient grain to feed their stock, we, a group of Christian citizens from Delaware and Pennsylvania, assembled in Brandywine Summit camp meeting, protest the holiday granted to distillers to manufacture beverage alcohol during month of August 1944.

If there is sufficient synthetic rubber on hand, why cannot civilians get tires? Why has W. P. B. granted this privilege to distillers? We cannot understand there being any shortage of distilled liquors, when, according to the Government's own figures, there were 362,000,000 gallons of distilled liquors in bonded warehouses on May 1 of this year, and then the large quantities of Scotch whisky being sent from England under lend-lease, also huge quantities of distilled liquors being imported from Canada and Mexico. Since we want to win the war speedily, we protest against this waste of food materials and manpower in manufacturing 25,000,000 additional gallons of beverage alcohol, also the waste of tin by the brewers.

We cannot understand the order of W. P. B. in releasing tin for 1,000,000 cans to be filled with beer for shipment overseas. This is not only a waste of valuable tin but of shipping space.

We know that all kinds of alcoholic drinks are harmful and not essential to winning the war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a copy of this protest be sent to Mr. Donald Nelson, of W. P. B., and to both United States Senators for Delaware and Pennsylvania and to Congressmen from the State of Delaware and Congressman for Delaware County, Pa.

Limitation of the Presidential Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FOREST A. HARNESS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me on America's Town Meeting of the Air, August 24, 1944:

The two-term limitation on the Presidency has become a basic part of our republican system of government, and any departure from this time-honored custom is fraught with peril to our free institutions. Some will say this is partisanship, aimed against the fourth-term candidate. But I did not frame the charge. When some people feared that Coolidge might seek a third term, the Senate by overwhelming majority enacted a resolution which declared that more than two terms for any man is "unpatriotic, unwise, and fraught with peril to our free institutions." Every Democratic Senator voted for that resolution, among them Senator ALBEN BARKLEY, who just a month ago made the speech nominating Mr. Roosevelt for twice two terms.

Here in this incident is the whole argument. Men of both parties who voted for that resolution acted without partisanship. The Democrats followed a 150-year philosophy of their party, fathered by Jefferson, who strongly urged limitation. Jackson said, "It would be advisable to limit the Chief Executive to a single term of 4 or 6 years." The first resolution ever adopted by Congress was introduced by a Democrat, Springer, of Illinois, in 1875. Grover Cleveland uttered one of his most famous paragraphs against a President's exceeding two terms. The Democratic candidates of 1896, 1900, and 1908, pledged themselves not to seek reelection.

The Democratic platform of 1912 carried this plank: "We favor a single Presidential term and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible to reelection." And the Democratic Senate, redeeming that pledge in 1913, adopted a constitutional amendment for a single term by a vote of 46 to 23.

Now see the position of the man, and the party which clamored for 150 years to make even two terms—to say nothing of three or four—impossible. They are the first to betray their own historic position, the first to seek perpetuation in office.

Study and grasp this inescapable lesson. The very men who so bitterly opposed long tenure for Presidents have tasted the heady wine of power and become drunk with it. They have become corrupted by that power, corrupted intellectually by it to the extent that they are willing to sell their convictions and the philosophy of a century and a half to hang on to that power.

Here is complete proof of the wisdom of the great tradition which began with Washington and has been endorsed by both political parties for so many generations. Man—little man—is not fitted to have too much power over his fellows. Our founding fathers knew that. Every man who reads history knows it. Give an individual a little power, and he wants more. Give him more, and he schemes to hold onto it and increase it. Power corrupts the minds of the holder and those who share it with him. They do not voluntarily relinquish it but will, if given half a chance, hold it forever.

The President remembered this before power had gained its victory over him. He knew that the curse of Latin-American politics for a century had been Presidents who managed by chicanery or force to get themselves elected for three, four, and more terms. Up until the Roosevelt administration, we had steadfastly adhered to our two-term precedent and custom and had encouraged Latin-American countries to do likewise. What must our Latin-American neighbors think now as they see this great free Republic, which has kept its faith for so many generations, throwing aside this principle?

Of course, the excuse is that we are at war and dare not trust our affairs in other hands. But we were not at war 4 years ago. Then, other reasons had to be invented, among them, to keep us out of war.

I assert that it insults our people, our system of government, and our whole political philosophy to say that among 135,000,000 citizens there is only one man who can be entrusted with the management of our affairs. I say to you, "There is no indispensable man." Don't take my word for that. Listen to the words of Franklin D. Roosevelt, who said, "A great man left a watchword which we can well repeat: 'There is no indispensable man.'"

Actually, the need for limiting Presidential tenure is vastly greater now than when Washington and Jefferson established the tradition. Then Government exercised only the most limited authority. But in the past dozen years Federal Government has alarmingly gobbled up the powers of the States, and the Executive has rapidly invaded the powers of the courts and of Congress. If we believe in our political system, we dare not permit any man—the present incumbent or any other—to hold such immeasurable power, to command the obedience of such a vast bureaucracy and to administer such fabulous sums of money unless we say to him, "When 8 years have passed, you must hand over these powers to another, who will also be limited."

If you do not impose such limitation, then the Chief Executive will use the tremendous authority of his office, as the present incumbent has, to accumulate arbitrary and autocratic power, and to hold onto it until finally our Presidents, like the dictators we are fighting, can be dislodged only by force.

Protection of the American Shoe Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, in the approaching of this national campaign there will be attempts made to defeat some of the Congressmen for political purposes and in most instances those charges will be made that he voted unfavorably on some labor bill. For that reason I want to refer to my record in behalf of the shoe workers.

The shoe business in America is a tremendous business, employing over a million men and women and in speaking of post-war preparation to keep laboring men employed and to have conditions so that the returning soldiers will find employment I want to make a suggestion with reference to keeping the shoe workers of America steadily employed after this war is over.

Mr. Speaker, my suggestion is that we will need to have an adequate protective tariff placed against shoes made in other countries at lower standard of wages which flooded our markets from 1932 to 1938 which, because of being made by men and women working at very low wages could be imported into this country and sold for about half the cost of production of American shoes.

People were employed in Europe while our men and women shoemakers were idle about half the time. We can prevent this condition after the war by the application of a reasonable tariff and that should be one of the plans in the post-war to help keep our shoe workers employed at good wages.

There are many of us here who have rendered a fine service for labor and sometimes do not get the credit we deserve. Many of we Members had an opportunity to render a splendid service to the shoe workers of America back in April 1943.

I think I shall point out what I did in my district, like many of you did in yours, so that the shoe workers may know the interest some of we Congressmen have taken in their problems.

When there was grave danger in April 1943 of taking military and industrial shoes off of the essential list, I received letters and telegrams from the shoe companies, businessmen, and citizens in my district, located in Vandalia, Salem, Olney, and Carlyle, Ill., urging that I use my influence to prevent this being done. Many of you received the same sort of a request from your districts and enthusiastically complied with it, the results being that after many of us met with the heads of the great shoe companies over the Nation in conference here we prevailed upon them not to take industrial and military shoes off of the essential list, which meant that the manpower so employed was classified as being engaged in essential war work and allowed the companies to retain their employees, rather than losing thousands more of these experienced shoemakers to the military service.

As an evidence of my interest in protecting this industry and its workers, in addition to presenting its case to the committee referred to, I want to insert at this time a copy of my letter written to Hon. Paul V. McNutt, Chairman, War Manpower Commission, Washington, D. C., expressing my interest in the matter:

APRIL 12, 1943.

Hon. PAUL V. MCNUTT,
Chairman, War Manpower Commission,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am writing to urge you, in the interest of the many shoe factories in my district in Illinois employing thousands of men, that in your deliberation scheduled for Wednesday you give most serious consideration to placing the entire shoe industry on the essential list.

Many shoe workers have already been taken into the service as indicated by an advertisement appearing in the Carlyle Union Banner, Carlyle, Ill., by the Moran Shoe Co., and which is herewith enclosed. It requires years to develop the more technical men in the manufacture of shoes and it is extremely important that the manpower of the shoe industry be given serious consideration.

I earnestly hope that the committee may find it wise to include, in the order, not only shoes for military and industrial purposes but that those for civilian wear be listed as essential.

Respectfully,

C. W. VURSELL,
Member of Congress.

Showing my further interest I want to insert two telegrams:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 12, 1943.

OLNEY DAILY MAIL,
Olney, Ill.:

For the information of Olney citizens interested in shoe industry being declared an essential industry will suggest I am exerting all efforts to that end. Conference of representatives of shoe industry and four Government departments will be held here Wednesday and early decision is expected.

C. W. VURSELL,
Member of Congress.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 12, 1943.

THE VANDALIA UNION,
Vandalia, Ill.:

For the information of Vandalia citizens interested in shoe industry being declared an essential industry will suggest I am exerting all efforts to that end. Conference of representatives of shoe industry and four Government department will be held here Wednesday and early decision is expected.

C. W. VURSELL,
Member of Congress.

I think when the shoe workers of my district give consideration to the selection of their Representative in Congress on November 7 they should have the record of their Congressman representing them and their interests. I have great faith in the good judgment of the laboring men and women of this Nation and am willing to trust their judgment when they have the facts.

Unfortunately, there are often those who color the facts or attempt to deceive the laboring man to suit their own best interest.

We have not only protected the shoe worker during the wartime, but we must begin to prepare now to keep them steadily employed after the war is over.

Washington Army Orders Resented

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. GRANT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. GRANT of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the Montgomery Advertiser, August 25, 1944, Montgomery, Ala., sets out the feeling of the people of Alabama toward the recent order of the War Department made concerning the two races in Army camps. The Montgomery Advertiser is a progressive paper and stands for the fair treatment of all races. No one can find fault with this resentment.

It is indeed strange that while the Army takes great precaution to drill into soldiers the fact that when overseas that the customs and manners of the country in which they are located must be respected, but here in our own country, where things have gone so well for the duration that now that victory is in sight the customs and traditions must be abrogated.

All of the members of the Alabama delegation have strenuously protested this unwise order.

WASHINGTON ARMY ORDERS RESENTED

Montgomery, a tolerant, liberal, and intensely patriotic city, is profoundly disturbed by reports of high Army efforts to impose race customs and habits on the local military reservations that are in conflict with relationships growing out of generations of experience.

Montgomery quickly, firmly, and advisedly wants to let it be known that any efforts designed, directly or indirectly, to impose any form of social equality, is something that neither this community nor any other southern community can tolerate. This represents the thought of the better elements of both white and colored races on the subject.

If it be said that Army orders are something from which there is no recourse, the people of this community would have it understood that even Army orders, even armies, even bayonets, cannot force impossible and unnatural social race relationships upon us. It has been tried before and failed. It will fail if tried again.

Orders from Army headquarters seeking at this late date in the war to make whites and blacks mingle on a basis of social equality at the restaurant tables on the military posts or camps of this State can have no other effect than to cause friction which has been happily absent during the 3 years of the war up to this time. Heretofore, there has been commonsense recognition of nature's dividing lines. Any other policy can be interpreted only as due to ignorance of conditions. Certainly such orders could not come from anyone seeking the real welfare of the Negro race and the relationship between the races that all men of good will would like to see.

If troublemakers are responsible for this new situation, then troublemakers must be dealt with as such, because these troublemakers are a puny minority which must be shown that majorities rule here.

Since the establishment of our great airfields in this city, Montgomery's relationship has been most cordial with them and with the personnel they have brought among us. The officers and men of the fields have been the type that we were glad and proud to claim as friends and as participants in our social life. The fact that many of them were from the North or from communities where the race issue is not pronounced made no difference in the relationships, because the visitors recognized local conditions, had confidence in local judgment, and had respect for customs and traditions that have grown out of many years of trial and experience in the South. Furthermore, they were on the ground. They saw the conditions and the necessity for them. They were not deskmen, seated in some far away place, acting on some academic or idealistic impulse.

In Montgomery and in other Alabama and southern communities race relationships are a condition and not a theory. This is said kindly and firmly and in the utmost friendship for the members of the Negro race. We want the Negro soldiers to have the same food, the same pay, the same uniform, the same courts, and the same kind of justice, and the same protection as is given the white race. But political and economic and military equality are entirely different from the social equality that is implied in the new order for serving and seating of restaurant customers on the military reservations.

Our insistence upon this is in the interest not only of the white race but of the Negro race. We all know that we are to live side by side in the South, and each race is in a measure dependent upon the other. But domination by the race which is best qualified to dominate will be maintained at all costs. Efforts, even in a small way, to introduce any other practice bring only the deepest kind of resentment and encourage serious trouble.

These are facts which we cannot too firmly impress upon Army officials, our representatives in Washington, and all men everywhere.

The Political Action Committee—Sidney Hillman and the New Republic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, in the current August 21 issue of the New Republic there appears an article by Sidney Hillman entitled "The Truth About the P. A. C."

This article reads like a bedtime story. It pictures Hillman's P. A. C. as something of a shining knight engaged in rescuing progressive government from the hands of villainous reactionaries.

Although the title is otherwise, the article succeeds very well in covering up the real truth of the P. A. C., which is of enormous danger to the interests of honest American labor.

In hope of having both sides of an important issue presented, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] wrote to the editor of the New Republic requesting a chance to reply to Mr. Hillman. Not only did the editor deny the Senator from Nebraska this opportunity, but he did so with the emphatic assertion that he was not interested in the other side of Hillman's views. Somehow, the Senator from Nebraska had always supposed the New Republic to be a liberal journal, jealous of its integrity, and devoted to the democratic principle of presenting all sides of important controversial issues. I see now I was mistaken.

Since the New Republic is quite frequently cited by Members of Congress as an independent journal of integrity, I think Members should take notice that it is not of that character. By its own admission it is an ex parte sheet, entitled only to that weight which we accord a special pleader.

I, therefore, showing all fairness, ask unanimous consent, first, to have inserted in the RECORD the article as it appeared in the New Republic, written by Sidney Hillman and entitled "The Truth About the P. A. C." Following that I ask to have printed in the RECORD the letter addressed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] to Bruce Bliven, editor of the New Republic, asking that he be allowed to have printed in the New Republic a reply to the Hillman article. A copy of the letter written by Bruce Bliven denying the Senator from Nebraska that privilege, and the response of the Senator from Nebraska to Mr. Bliven's letter. Then I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the article which the Senator from Nebraska desired to have published in the New Republic in reply to the article by Sidney Hillman. Finally, I ask to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Reader's Digest entitled "I Object to My Union in Politics," written by William E. Mullins, a discourse on Sidney Hillman's political action committee. I point out to the Senate that I have been very fair in that I have put into the RECORD both sides of the matter. I desire the people to have the whole picture.

I have from the Government Printing Office an estimate which indicates that the cost of printing the material herewith submitted will be $231.

There being no objection, the articles and correspondence were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Republic of August 21, 1944]

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE

So many statements concerning the C. I. O. Political Action Committee and the National Citizens' Political Action Committee have recently appeared in print—some correct and some incorrect, some friendly and some hostile—that it may not be amiss to set down some of the fundamental facts about these two organizations.

The C. I. O.-P. A. C. was organized in July 1943 by the Congress of Industrial Organizations for the primary purpose of arousing the working men and women of America to a sense of their own responsibility as citizens of this Nation and, in a broader sense, as citizens of a free world. What really started the C. I. O.-P. A. C. happened the year before the organization came into being. The congressional elections held in November 1942 gave clear evidence that a powerful reactionary trend had set in, which, if it continued through 1944, might well reverse all the progress of recent years and render this Nation incapable of making its indispensable contribution toward the eventual establishment of lasting peace. One could not help but recall the congressional elections of 1918, in which Woodrow Wilson lost control of both Houses of Congress, and with it a large measure of his prestige. One could not help but remember the dire consequences both at home and abroad.

velt with a reduced but still substantial Democratic majority in the Senate and a bare majority in the House. But this distinction was illusory. Actually, through the unholy alliance of obstructionist Republicans and reactionary Democrats, a coalition had come into power which was determined not merely to block any further progressive legislation, but to undermine where possible the whole structure of New Deal reform.

Did this mean that the American people had changed its mind? Did the dramatic change in Congress reflect a conservative trend on the part of a majority of the population? We thought not. We thought not, because an analysis of the vote cast in the 1942 election clearly showed what had happened. Only a little more than 28,000,000 American citizens had cast their ballots in these elections, as against 49,800,000 in 1940. Almost 22,000,000 Americans who had voted in the Presidential year had failed to go to the polls 2 years later. The percentage of those who failed to vote was highest among the normally progressive groups of the population and lowest among those population groups which are normally conservative. The inference was clear. The forces of reaction were organized for political action; the progressive forces were not organized.

That is why the C. I. O.-P. A. C. was born 1 year later.

The funds for the C. I. O.-P. A. C. were supplied by the C. I. O. and a number of its major affiliated unions. To be exact, the sum of $669,764.11 was contributed. Of this amount approximatey $400,000 was spent up to the time of the Democratic National Convention. No disbursements have been made from these funds since the Democratic Convention, except in local primary elections, and none will be made until after the election. This decision was reached in order to eliminate any possible question of violating the Smith-Connally Act.

What did the C. I. O.-P. A. C. do up to the time of the Democratic Convention, and what will it do during and after the campaign?

First of all, the C. I. O.-P. A. C. put on a Nation-wide drive to register the vote. It embarked upon an educational campaign among the workers to show them why they had a duty as citizens to exercise their franchise; why this year it was more than ever important for them to do so; and how they could help to organize themselves and other progessives outside of the labor movement for effective political action. This campaign was carried on in the labor press by means of pamphlets distributed in large quantities, and when it was possible to obtain time, over the radio.

Second. The C. I. O.-P. A. C. endeavored to mobilize the progressive vote in certain important primary elections throughout the Nation in order to help unseat outstanding reactionary incumbents seeking renomination and to assist outstanding progressive candidates to obtain their party's nomination. Such activity is permissible under the law, since the Smith-Connally Act does not apply to primary contests. The C. I. O.-P. A. C. was active in the primary contests for nomination in both parties. It does not claim to have brought about the nomination or the defeat of a single candidate. It does claim to have contributed important support to the already existing progressive forces in many States—perhaps decisive support in a few instances. By and large, these efforts were more successful in the Democratic primaries than in those of the Republican Party. This is undoubtedly due to the fact that in the Democratic primaries the C. I. O.-P. A. C. was working with the prevailing trend, which has already taken a considerable toll of outstanding reactionaries and isolationists, whereas in the Republican primaries it was working against the pronounced nationalist and reactionary trend which fully manifested itself in the repudiation of Willkie and in the recapture of the Republican leadership by Herbert Hoover and the Old Guard.

Actual money contributions played but a small part in this undertaking. Under the Hatch Act, $5,000 is the maximum amount which any individual or group may contribute to any one candidate's campaign. There were not many instances where even that amount was contributed. But there were many instances where the voluntary organized efforts of P. A. C. workers were able to accomplish wonders in bringing out the vote. In most parts of the country that is all we have to do in order to insure a progressive victory. The majority of American citizens—and certainly the vast majority of industrial workers—are progressive voters by nature. They do not as a rule need to be told to vote for progressive candidates; they do need to be provided with the facts and the records of the candidates; and they do need to be provided with channels of organization by means of which to make their opinions effective. They need also to be reassured that it actually lies within their power to elect the candidates whom they prefer, and that it is their own responsibility to see that the latent progressive majority becomes an articulate majority.

That is the job the C. I. O.-P. A. C. set out to do among the industrial workers; and that is the job which the N. C.-P. A. C. has now undertaken to do among the population as a whole.

Since the decision was reached not to use union funds in the electoral campaign itself, once the party candidates were nominated, the C. I. O.-P. A. C. is now putting on a drive for voluntary contributions from individual members of labor organizations throughout the country. Similarly, the N. C.-P. A. C. is putting on a drive for voluntary contributions from individuals in every rank of life and in every section of the country. These funds will be used to carry on the effort to bring out the vote, to reelect President Roosevelt and to elect a progressive Congress.

It is too early to say what measure of success will attend these two fund-raising campaigns. But it is not too early to say that a great deal of nonsense has been written about the gigantic slush funds which are said to be at the disposal of these two organizations. Quite frequently a figure of $6,000,000 has been mentioned. The only element of reality about this figure is that the law would not permit the two organizations to spend more than $3,000,000 each or $6,000,000 together. Our goal is not nearly so ambitious as that. We hope the N. C.-P. A. C. will raise $1,500,000. I wish I could say that the drive had already produced half that amount. Actually, the effort has only just begun.

We shall undoubtedly fall far short of raising the amount of money which will be spent by the organized forces of reaction. There is no doubt that they have the dollars, but I believe that events will prove that we have the votes. In 1940, $16,000,000 of Republican money was not enough to elect a moderately progressive Republican candidate, because the people instinctively recognized that, in spite of Wendell Willkie, the reactionary Old Guard still controlled the party. In 1944 no instinctual intelligence is required; normal eyesight is all anyone needs to recognize the starched Hoover collar on the Republican candidate.

The response we have had so far to the membership drive in the National Citizens' Political Action Committee is most encouraging. Already it is clear that, so far at least as this election is concerned, farmers, publishers, educators, writers, and progressives from every part of the country and from every occupation are ready and eager to unite with the industrial workers in order to reelect the President and to elect a Congress which will responsibly and loyally support progressive policies at home and abroad.

The N. C. P. A. C. is committed to Roosevelt and Truman against Dewey and Bricker. Beyond that it has no partisan commitments whatsoever. It will support for election to Congress those men and women who, irrespective of party affiliation, seem best qualified to represent this Nation in the critical times which lie ahead. It will support those candidates who have shown that they believe in the principles set forth in President Roosevelt's economic bill of rights, who have shown that they understand that our domestic problems and our foreign problems are opposite sides of the same coin, and that neither can be solved at the expense of the other. It will support those candidates who, in the words of Thomas Jefferson, "have confidence in the people, cherish them, and consider them the wise repository of the public interest." It will oppose those candidates who openly repudiate these ideals, or who render lip-service to them in order to conceal their opposition.

At first some of the conservative newspapers made fun of us. It was alleged that our support actually hurt the candidates whom we were endeavoring to help. Then suddenly it was claimed that we were the dominant influence in the Democratic Party. And after HENRY WALLACE was defeated for renomination it was said that we were finished. Two weeks later we were again supposed to be very much alive and to have been responsible for the defeat of an outstanding isolationist. We are supposed to be at the same time trying to capture the Democratic Party and starting a third party. We are described as the President's greatest asset one day and as his greatest liability the next. Most of all, the ultra-conservative commentators have worried about what they call the P. A. C. ideology.

This "ideology" is neither a mystery nor a closely guarded secret. It is clearly stated in the P. A. C. program, which was adopted last May and which was officially presented to the resolutions committees of both the Republican and Democratic Parties. This program is both a statement of principles and a concrete plan of action. It rests upon the belief that we can and must find a way so to utilize the vast spiritual and material resources of this Nation that every American who is reasonably industrious and prudent may enjoy at least the minimum elements of a good life—that is, adequate housing, food, clothing, medical care, education, recreation, and an opportunity for advancement. It rests upon the belief that too many Americans have died and are dying in foreign lands in defense of democracy for us any longer to permit democracy to be betrayed here at home by social or economic barriers erected against anyone by reason of his race, religion, or national origin.

There are people—and they are by no means all Republicans—who do not agree with these principles, and who do not wish to see the progressive forces unite for the purpose of putting them into effect. Some of them have told us that we are unwise to organize for political action, because by doing so we might stimulate the forces of reaction to take similar action. The forces of reaction have taken this action long ago. They are entrenched and fortified on every rise of ground on the economic contour map of the world. They are fighting grimly behind their Maginot lines to perpetuate their privileged position.

But the united progressive forces of the world are on the march and will not be denied. They are fighting not for special privilege, but for equality of opportunity for all men everywhere, of every race, of every nationality, and of every religious faith.

The fight for human dignity and freedom will not end when we shall have achieved victory at the polls on November 7, any more than it will end when we shall have achieved military victory over Germany and Japan.

All that we shall have gained by these victories is survival—survival to fight for freedom, to vote for freedom, and to work for freedom—until finally freedom shall have been gained for all men who inhabit this earth.

SIDNEY HILLMAN.

AUGUST 17, 1944.

Mr. BRUCE BLIVEN,
Editor, The New Republic,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. BLIVEN: In your issue of August 21, you feature an article by Sidney Hillman entitled, "The Truth About the P. A. C."

Those of us who are a little uneasy about the P. A. C., even aside from political considerations, see the truth about the P. A. C. in a different light than does Mr. Hillman. I know your journal to be courageous in its desire to present differing opinions; and since the P. A. C. has become so controversial an issue, it occurs to me that you might be willing to have someone who believes otherwise than Mr. Hillman present another point of view.

Would you be willing to take an article of the same length as Mr. Hillman's, presenting the truth about the P. A. C. as someone else sees it? I make this inquiry in advance because I hesitate to take the time to write an article of this kind without some prior understanding that it would be acceptable. I could have the article ready within a few days' notice, and, of course, I am not interested in the matter of payment.

Very truly yours,

HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senator.

THE NEW REPUBLIC,
New York, August 22, 1944.

Senator HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BUTLER: This is answering your letter of August 17. We most decidedly would not print an article by you on the subject of the P. A. C. We don't print any article with which we do not in general agree, and we strongly doubt whether you would give a fair presentation of the facts about the P. A. C.

We are willing to print a communication from you on this subject if you care to write one. We assume no editorial responsibility for the contents of a communication, except that it must be reasonable in tone and not libelous. The normal length of a communication is 1,000 words, but in this case we would be willing to let you have a little more space, say 1,200 words, or about four double-spaced typewritten pages of pica type.

Faithfully,

BRUCE BLIVEN.

OMAHA, NEBR., August 25, 1944.

Mr. BRUCE BLIVEN,
The New Republic, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. BLIVEN: I am happy to have your letter of August 22, even though it so emphatically denies me an opportunity of answering Sidney Hillman's article, The Truth About the P. A. C., in the August 21 issue.

Your right to print only what you please is indisputable. That is the prerogative of a free press. But I am somewhat shocked over your emphatic unwillingness to present both sides of a controversial issue as important as Hillman's which arbitrarily hazards the workers' interests in a political crusade.

I do not know where I got the notion that the New Republic was a liberal journal, devoted to the democratic principle of presenting all sides of important controversial issues in a spirit of fair play in uncovering the truth. But I see now that I was mistaken. In future, I shall bear in mind that the New Republic is an ex parte sheet.

Your offer to give me the privilege of a "communication" is of little use because it is limited in space to less than half of the Hillman article. A subject of such profound significance to labor's interest can scarcely be presented within the confines of so limited a communication.

Yours very truly,

HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senator.

A BEDTIME STORY ANALYZED

(By Senator HUGH BUTLER, of Nebraska)

Sidney Hillman's bedtime story for naive liberals entitled "The Truth About the P. A. C." is one reason for the fog in the public mind about which he complains. In whimsical brevity his story runs like this: "For many long, long years a kind progressive Government lived in Washington. It did all sorts of good things for people at home and all over the world. One day in November 1942 it took a little nap and along came a certain bad, bad reactionary party and stole some of the chairs right out of the congressional parlor. Then up jumped Sir Sidney, the shining knight of labor, and vowed that he would fetch the stolen chairs. Mounting his trusty steed C. I. O.-P. A. C. and snatching his shield N. C. N. A. C., he dashed off with little "voluntary" dollars jingling in his pockets. After holding an "educational" pow-wow with his fellow travelers, they all rode out to the hustings where they encountered the bad reactionaries. Several primary battles were fought with legal dollars and Sir Biddle, who was there to enforce the Queensberry rules, gave the decision to Sir Sidney. In a final battle at the polls, Sir Sidney captured all of the stolen chairs and a few extra, whereupon he came back to the Commander in Chief for his reward. And the progressive government lived happily ever after in Washington because Sir Sidney saw to it that the good government was elected again, and again, and again."

All good bedtime story tellers will recognize that this is the point where the questions, and the real story, begin. Tell us more about C. I. O.-P. A. C. and N. C. P. A. C. Where and how did Sir Sidney get the little "legal" dollars that won the primary battles? What reward did Sir Sidney want for his great deeds?

If there is any fog in the public mind about the P. A. C., it is because Mr. Hillman has been generating much of the smoke. If the truth is to be told, Mr Hillman will have to be helped a little, particularly on some aspects of the P. A. C. he has carefully refrained from discussing. He and a self-perpetuating clique of fellow travelers on the C. I. O. executive council decided in private conclave on July 7, 1943 to form the P. A. C. and take the labor movement on a political crusade. Appearing before a Senate subcommittee in June 1944, Mr. Hillman stated that heads of the C. I. O. unions had the power to commit their unions to take political action and to write big checks for that purpose without consulting the rank and file; and this may very well be so because the wide executive powers in many union charters drawn by C. I. O. leaders mock the democracy Mr. Hillman shouts for so loudly in public.

Hillman planned the setup of the original organization in two parts: The top committee of the C. I. O.-P. A. C. which was to form the basic structure through 14 regional offices, and a large and indefinite number of subordinate P. A. C.'s There was shrewd wisdom in this scheme. The top P. A. C. provides the policy-making backbone, the initial financing, the motive force of the movement, and distributes innocent educational literature. This enabled Mr. Hillman to come to Washington and say that he was conducting a benevolent civic educational society. The little P. A. C.'s, formed by the international, national and local unions up and down the land, are to do the actual political work in the States and localities. This gets around the Federal Corrupt Practices Act which cannot affect State primaries and elections, except in an indirect way.

But Mr. Hillman remained uneasy over his crusading charger C. I. O.-P. A. C. It aroused resentment among farmers, other unions, and in many other quarters. It violated the spirit, if not the letter, of the Corrupt Practices Acts. It was heavily tarred with the communistic brush, as John L. Lewis, congressional investigations, and the split in the New York American Labor Party showed.

Considerations such as these and his old love for "front" organizations persuaded Mr. Hillman to find a suitable shield for the charger, C. I. O.-P. A. C. Rounding up as many good citizens as would not be too inquisitive about the contents in packages marked "liberal" and "progressive," Sir Sidney formed the National Citizens Political Action Committee in June 1944. This organization paralleled C. I. O.-P. A. C., in the broad field outside the C. I. O. All people who are not already corraled in some other organization, who will allow candidates to be picked for them with Hillman yardsticks, and who might contribute a dollar or more, are eligible to join N. C. P. A. C.

In offering the truth about the P. A. C., Mr. Hillman avoids discussion of the implications of his activities. They are essential parts of the truth and they show the evils which Mr. Hillman would bring down on the heads of honest labor.

First, as to organization. In forming the C. I. O.-P. A. C., a handful of the C. I. O. union leaders arbitrarily committed 5,000,000 workers to a major change in the labor movement. No referendum of all the C. I. O. workers was taken. The decision was dictated to the carefully selected delegates at the C. I. O. convention. Such a change is of the highest importance because it hazards the economic interest of the workers in the dangerous game of politics.

With wisdom born of historical experience, other labor unions were careful about riding two horses at the same time. The early labor movement had its fingers badly burned in politics. The Knights of Labor was shipwrecked in political storms. Samuel Gompers wisely kept the A. F. of L. away from political rocks. Abroad, labor organizations in politics first became the tools of dictators who afterward smashed them.

What will be the effect of Hillman's disregard of the workers' interests? The commitment of the C. I. O. to political action brings the storms of politics right down to the workbench in every factory. Every worker will become a political agent and the shop steward an American counterpart of the political commissar. Every relationship between management and labor will be tainted by union politics carried from the public arena into the private operation of industrial enterprises. C. I. O. leaders will carry political pressure and Government favor into every act of collective bargaining on a scale that will make small change of the little partisan actions of N. L. R. B. and W. L. B. Government agencies will hesitate to act upon the merits of labor disputes when the club of political reprisal hangs over them.

Does Mr. Hillman think that such conditions will make for social peace? Does he believe that farmers, professional men, manufacturers, tradesmen, and other union groups will sit by and permit a small executive clique of the C. I. O. to corner the large industrial vote and turn it into questionable channels? To regiment the voting population on these lines would soon produce a class society which has been the plague of Europe, and from which America has been free up to this time.

Union stewards occupy key positions in the factories. If they engage in political activities, as they certainly will as the C. I. O. gets deeper into politics, the worker is no longer a free man. If he doesn't "chuck in the buck for Roosevelt" and wear the political buttons, he can be the victim of a hundred harassing actions at the hands of his shop steward. A majority of 51 percent can use the whole power of a union to work against the minority of 49 percent. Would this be conductive to union peace? The union voter is at a disadvantage no matter how he moves. His free vote either goes to waste because his money is taken from him and employed to elect a candidate he may not favor; or, if he refuses to pay his dues, his job and livelihood are endangered. No regular political party has ever had such power over the voter as the C. I. O.-P. A. C. plans to exert.

And what of the financing? There was first of all the arbitrary appropriation of $670,000 direct from union treasuries—money collected as union dues and turned to political action. To date $400,000 of this has been spent to set up a Nation-wide political organization and to influence the primaries. Mr. Hillman says he will freeze the balance of this money to comply with the law, but the organization paid for with this money (which is the foundation of political campaigns) will continue functioning. In reality, therefore, the $400,000 spent before the conventions carries on and plays its part in the elections.

Perhaps the most insidious element in the original C. I. O. political fund was the spectacle of having high Government agencies like the W. L. B. support C. I. O. unionism and enforce the collection of dues as a condition of employment, and then have those unions in turn appropriate large sums from dues to support the President and the Government agencies.

It is naive to believe that the C. I. O. will not expect a quid pro quo for its money and political operations. Mr. Hillman says they are working for a progressive government, but you can be sure he will be hard-boiled when it comes to demanding concrete favors. Simple logic as well as past experience points to the danger that C. I. O. interests will be favored over employers, over the A. F. of L., above the independent railroad brotherhoods, and above all other interests of the country when it comes to the many favors a government has to bestow.

How the Attorney General got around the illegality of the original C. I. O.-P. A. C. fund of $670,000 presents a masterpiece of foggy understatement. His interests as a party man, rather than the high responsibilities of public trust, persuaded him to pick his way among the technicalities of the law.

The spirit, if not the letter, of the Hatch Act is certainly clear as to every union leader who checked out more than $5,000 to the C. I. O.-P. A. C. What Mr. Hillman and his self-styled "progressives" are trying to say in their befogged way is that they do not care about the spirit of the law if only they can squeeze between its technicalities.

No bedtime story about the C. I. O.-P. A. C., such as Hillman's, should fool the intelligent voter. Anyone who has watched Hillman's tactics can see the brass knuckles beneath the velvet glove. They came through scarcely a week ago when Mr. Hillman's own union, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, started soliciting their employers for political action funds. It is all "voluntary," but if employers do not kick in, they can expect labor troubles in the same way that the racketeers made them pay for labor peace. The workers will have to knuckle under in the same way if they fail to come through with "the buck for Roosevelt."

At the same time Mr. Hillman will attempt to dictate the way a worker shall vote. This now seems clear from resolutions of C. I. O. locals 65 and 72, in Salt Lake City, which protested against being forced to sponsor an "instructed vote."

How will the individual States of the Nation like it when the C. I. O.-P. A. C. moves in on them with its regional directors, propaganda literature, and money to influence State elections in favor of a special group? The Democratic Party has already been given a foretaste of the power Hillman has acquired by the well-known subversive tactics of "infiltration and boring from within." The A. F. of L. knows that the C. I. O. will not hesitate to use any political power it gains as an instrument to undermine all other unions. This is the plain handwriting on the wall.

What ideas will Hillman foster if the power of the C. I. O. P. A. C. becomes sufficient to influence government? Well, he is for the "good life"—for "democracy" (except when it comes to the dictatorial use of workers' dues)—for "adequate housing, food, clothing, medical care, education, and an opportunity for advancement." Who is not for democracy and the good life? The test does not rest upon contracting promises of heaven, but on how we go about making good upon them.

And here, we think that Mr. Hillman has some queer ideas about equality, of human dignity and of freedom. With the promise of attaining these ideals, the New Deal administration has centralized and regulated American life to the point where a dictatorship is the only remaining step. It has loaded us with a mountain of debt on which we shall pay heavy taxes for generations. It has set class against class, race against race, farmers against workers—all in the name of the good life. How can this be called progressive? It is more likely to end in bankruptcy and chaos and the workers, as European history shows, will be the first victims.

The 1942 elections which Mr. Hillman deplores, were the healthy assertion of the common sense of the people. It was an election of men pledged to stem the tide toward irresponsible government which has been rampant for 10 years. The restoration of the people's government to the people's Congress has already been too long delayed. By holding differently and working for the extension of dictatorial trends, Mr. Hillman is the reactionary in the cloak of the progressive. And as for unholy alliances, Hillman should hold his peace; at least until he gets a divorce from his marriage of convenience with Hague, Kelly, and Flynn.

I OBJECT TO MY UNION IN POLITICS

(By William E. Mullins)

I am a working newspaperman, holding membership in the Newspaper Guild of Boston, which is a unit of the American Newspaper Guild, which is affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations. I joined this union to help improve working conditions and to provide job protection for newspapermen.

Now, through my union's affiliation with the C. I. O., I find myself represented in politics, without my consent and against my will, by the C. I. O.'s Political Action Committee. I find myself in political company which frequently I do not like and pledged to political principles which frequently I do not share. I find myself committed, through no choice of my own, to one Presidential candidate, the Democratic, against the other Presidential candidate, the Republican, in this campaign. I also find myself committed on many other candidacies—and on many new, strange issues. I object.

I object as an American citizen and I object as a labor man. In my many years of observation of politics I have seen unions go into politics and come out on the losing side on election day. Then I have seen them fail to get from the winning side the things that they truly and legitimately wanted as unions. Unions do not need partisan politics. Unions were operating long before the National Labor Relations Act. A union is not a political proposition. It is an economic and human proposition. It must survive whether the party in power is Democratic or Republican or Socialist or anything else. It risks its life when it plays party politics. And if unions fail, democracy fails.

I hold to the view taken by Samuel Gompers, who first made the American labor movement a sound success. Study the records of legislators, he said. Study their votes on labor laws. Know your friends, and know your enemies, as individual legislators who make the laws. But stop there. Governors and Presidents do not make laws; they only enforce them. Leave them alone. They are more than individuals; they represent whole parties, local and national. Do not antagonize whole parties.

That is what Gompers taught. The opposite teaching will shake the whole American labor movement to its foundations.

I know the lengths to which men in politics will go in order to get even with elements which have opposed their party. I know what happens eventually to elements which break into politics and oppose a party which then wins. And each party some day wins. The pendulum always swings.

I would question the wisdom of the C. I. O.'s Political Action Committee if it had endorsed the Republican Party's national candidate. I question its wisdom in endorsing the Democratic Party's national candidate. We labor people are now in for endless trouble, nationally and locally.

There are Republican administrations today in 26 States. Many of these States—Massachusetts, for instance, and Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, California—are among the most important industrial labor States in the Union. Many of the Republican governors of these States and hundreds of the Republican legislators have been labor's friends. What are they going to say and do next year when the C. I. O. approaches them and says:

"We have fought your party. We have tried to ruin it. But now please protect us against antilabor legislation."

Even if Roosevelt is reelected, labor is going to lose.

In the Massachusetts primaries in July the C. I. O.'s Political Action Committee gave its endorsement to five candidates. Three of these candidates were badly beaten. Two of them were beaten by candidates who are sure to be elected to the next Congress: JAMES M. CURLEY and PHILIP J. PHILBIN. What will be the attitude of these two Democrats—who have been buffeted around by the C. I. O.—toward my union?

And another thing. In my State the Political Action Committee has hired as its legislative agent one Sidney S. Grant, who but recently was a legislative representative for the Massachusetts Communist Party. Nationally, the C. I. O. unions which originally pledged $700,000 to the Political Action Committee included quite a few which are known to everybody in the labor movement to be Communist controlled. The first 1944 organization meeting of the Political Action Committee was addressed by numerous Communists and fellow-traveler union leaders, such as Henderson of the Cannery Workers, Robinson of the Smelter Workers, Emspak of the United Electrical Workers, Quill of the Transport Workers, Curran and Smith of the Maritime Workers, and Merrill of the Office Workers. Last May the Communist Party of America officially dissolved itself as a political party. To what end? Only to transfer its whole driving force into the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O.

We labor people are forfeiting the good will of multitudes of our fellow citizens because the Political Action Committee is involving us in issues that have nothing to do with labor as labor. Here is an example. In Massachusetts the law said that first-degree murder must be punished by death. On came a bill to change that law and leave it to the judge to order death or life imprisonment. The C. I. O.'s Political Action Committee in Massachusetts has made that bill one of the tests of a legislator's labor record. If a legislator voted against that bill, then I, as a C. I. O. man, must be against that legislator. So the labor movement is to get tangled into all the quarrels between people who favor capital punishment and people who do not. Maybe the law should have been changed, but I object to a labor organization becoming involved in extraneous issues.

Nationally I see the same ridiculous and suicidal process. Through the top subcommittee of the Political Action Committee, I find myself committed to a national planning board and to price guaranties to farmers and to the farm tenancy purchase program and to international machinery to make long-term credits available to industrially backward nations. These are all controversial questions. Men of great intellect differ about them. Do the leaders of the Political Action Committee really think that men and women in our Massachusetts mills and factories have given them a mandate on these questions? Of course not. These leaders are not listening to their followers. They are telling their followers what to think. Which is regular Communist totalitarian practice.

Mr. Sidney Hillman, president of Amalgamated Clothing Workers, is the chairman of the Political Action Committee. He is also the dominating leader of the American Labor Party of New York State. He captured that leadership through an open alliance with admittedly Communist-controlled unions in New York City. At once there was a large secession of non-Communist unions out of the American Labor Party into the new Liberal Party. The Communists, however, are now able, with Mr. Hillman's cooperation, to work toward their ultimate aims in the American Labor Party and the Political Action Committee both.

I concede to the Political Action Committee an immense skill in its political organization work. Its little leaflets and booklets telling how to get people to register and vote are the best I have ever seen. They contain splendid political education for the voters as to primaries and elections and as to the powers and duties of city councils, of State legislatures, of the Congress, of the President. Everything is explained in language simple, clear, complete. From an educational point of view the publications of the Political Action Committee strike a new high level in campaign literature. The Republican and Democratic parties have nothing to equal them; they would be well advised to try to catch up.

I also concede to the Political Action Committee certain successes in the recent primaries. The committee frightened Congressman DIES, of Texas, into not running for reelection. It had much to do with defeating Congressmen NEWSOME and STARNES in Alabama, Congressman COSTELLO in California, and Senator HOLMAN in Oregon.

Its true great success, however, is in its elaborate and comprehensive machinery, throughout this whole country for getting people on its own side to register and to vote. The Political Action Committee is probably the most efficient "Get out the vote" endeavor that was ever organized in the whole history of American politics. This effort, unless there is a corresponding effort on the other side, may be decisive in November. I do not underestimate the Political Action Committee. It is energetic, intelligent, formidable. I all the more object to it from the labor point of view.

Having joined a union for economic purposes, I object to contributions out of union treasuries to funds spent for political purposes. During the rest of this campaign the Political Action Committee, now disguised as the National Citizens' Political Action Committee, will seek a personal contribution of $1 from each C. I. O. union member. I know the intimidations and coercions that can be practiced to get that dollar. But it is not that dollar that is my main point. My main point is the effort of the Political Action Committee to transform my union affiliations into political opinions.

The American labor movement has been for better economic relations between employers and employees. It has not sought quarrels with its fellow citizens on other issues. Now the Political Action Committee is trying to make the American labor movement into a political movement with opinions on every kind of issue, domestic and foreign. It is headed toward accomplishing just two things. One is to split the American labor movement even more than it is split now. The other is to raise up new enemies for the labor movement on utterly nonlabor issues and to confront the labor movement with more opposition than it ever before has faced.

I object; and I think that millions of my fellow unionists will object as soon as they see what is being done to them. The Political Action Committee is setting up a conflict between the labor movement and the free, independent political American spirit. The mass of unionists will in the end repudiate it. They are unionists, but, first, they are Americans.

War Success Nonpartisan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Des Moines Sunday Register of August 20, 1944:

WAR SUCCESS NONPARTISAN, MAJORITY OF IOWANS BELIEVE

A majority of Iowans disagree with a Democratic national platform claim of administration credit for building up our fighting power.

The Iowa poll found 66 percent of persons questioned in a survey attributed successful prosecution of the war to nonpolitical cooperation of all Americans; only 21 percent assented to the Democratic partisan boast; and the other 13 percent were noncommittal.

The poll found more Iowans approve than disapprove the Republican national platform plank on world organization against war, although there was not a clear majority in the voting.

Those who approved constituted 47 percent; those who disapproved totaled 19 percent. But 34 percent expressed no opinion.

PARTY LINE-UP

Republicans cast an 82-percent vote against the claimed Democratic credit for successful prosecution of the war, while only 8 percent voted to accord it. Democrats voted 49 percent against their national party plank, and 36 percent favored it.

On the Republican peace plank, Republicans registered a vote of 64-percent approval and 14-percent disapproval, while 28 percent of the Democrats agreed with it and 27 percent disagreed.

THE QUESTION

The question on the Democratic war plank was worded:

"A plank in the Democratic platform says: 'It (the Democratic administration) succeeded in building, in time, the best-trained and equipped army in the world, the most powerful navy in the world, the greatest air force in the world, and the largest merchant marine in the world.' Do you agree with this plank, or do you feel that our success in building up our fighting power is due to nonpolitical cooperation?"

The responses, by sex, were:

		(Percent)
	Total	Men	Women
Agree	21	20	21
Nonpolitical cooperation	64	73	66
Don't know	13	10	15

The answers, by residence, were:

		(Percent)
	City	Town	Farm
Agree	24	15	19
Nonpolitical cooperation	64	73	66
Don't know	12	12	15

The question on the Republican post-war plank was phrased:

"The Republican platform contains this plank on future peace: 'We shall seek to achieve such aims through organized international cooperation and not by joining a world state.' Do you approve or disapprove of this plank in the Republican platform?"

The replies by sex, were:

		(Percent)
	Total	Men	Women
Approve	47	48	47
Disapprove	19	24	16
No opinions	34	28	37

The answers by residence, were:

		(Percent)
	City	Town	Farm
Approve	48	47	47
Disapprove	21	22	16
No opinion	31	31	37

The poll revealed that only 27 percent of those interviewed had read the platform adopted by the Republican convention, and only 20 percent the platform adopted by the Democratic national convention.

The Iowa poll is conducted throughout Iowa by 60 field reporters who interview a representative cross section of the total population of the State. The Iowans to be polled are selected to provide proportionate representation to men and women, age groups, place of residence, income brackets, and party affiliation.

The Cheap Jeep

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Midland (Mich.) Daily News of August 22, 1944:

THE CHEAP JEEP

The question of surplus property disposal is now up in Congress and mentioned today is the proposal for a cheap jeep for those in the armed forces. It is said the reason for this is that many of those now in service like the idea of owning a jeep after the war. We're all for it. And we hope this section will be added to the bill.

We also hope that disposal of surplus property will be handled in such a way that the public can benefit from some of the bargains to be offered and so that all benefits will not fall into the hands of the speculators as they did after the last war. The net result was that the Government lost millions of dollars and the public paid a long price.

While there will be many items not wanted at all by civilians, there will also be many articles which can be used—many more articles than after the last war. It would seem to us that regularly established retail outlets would buy and sell many of these items and that they could be sold wholesale by the armed services. This in turn would give employment to a lot of returning soldiers until such time as they could locate jobs.

Fulton Lewis, Jr., Gives Facts About Guam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, we are approaching a national campaign in which the best interests of our country demand a fair and impartial presentation of the issues. It is unfortunate that efforts are being made to confuse the American people by inaccurate references to the island of Guam in order to divert attention from the Pearl Harbor disaster of December 7, 1941.

Administration spokesmen have frequently sought to embarrass opponents by alleging that Guam would have been fortified in 1939 if it had not been for the opposition of the minority party. Recently the President injected this same issue into the political campaign by declaring that "they did not permit us to fortify Guam." Such implications have a sinister meaning, and apparently this alleged issue is being revived to becloud developments which may present the truth about Pearl Harbor.

Those persons who persist in referring to Guam surely are acquainted with the factual background, and it must be assumed that they are deliberately deceiving the American people. Senate Document No. 202 of the Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, contains a pertinent statement by Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee. This publication effectually refutes unfounded charges which may create the impression that this administration at any time during the past decade sought to fortify the island of Guam.

In January 1939 a bill was presented to the House of Representatives including an item of $5,000,000 to build a breakwater, to dredge the harbor, and to build seaplane ramps on Guam. When hearings were held on the bill by the Naval Affairs Committee in the House, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Charles Edison, stated:

It is the present policy of the Navy Department now to ask for development only to the extent stated in the bill before this committee.

When the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs later held hearings on the House bill, Admiral Leahy referred to the assumption that it was intended to fortify Guam and then declared: "This is not the case; the only improvements contemplated at the present time are the building of a breakwater, dredging to improve the seaplane take-off area, and minor preparations for handling planes." The final conclusion of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, according to Senate Document No. 202, was as follows:

In view of the action of the State Department and in view of the fact that the item of $5,000,000 for Guam had been defeated by such a decisive vote in the House of Representatives, after consulting with the President on this item, the House action was not changed by the Senate.

Fulton Lewis, Jr., nationally prominent radio commentator, on April 10, 1944, referred to the misrepresentation concerning Guam, and presented some timely information, so that the American people may know the facts. Under leave to extend my remarks, I insert the statement made by Mr. Lewis on this subject:

The simple factual record is—and I'm sure that Speaker RAYBURN will agree, on mature reconsideration and research, that what I'm going to tell you now is absolutely correct, in detail:

In article 19 of the Washington naval treaty at the close of the last war, we, Great Britain, and Japan, agreed to maintain the status quo in the Pacific, with a few exceptions such as Hawaii. In other words, we agreed not to fortify the island of Guam.

Japan renounced the treaty in December of 1934, which meant that it expired for all of us, at the end of December 1936. Prior to that date, we couldn't fortify Guam if we wanted to, and no representative of the administration ever proposed such a thing, but after that date, we could do as we pleased.

In 1937, the House Naval Affairs Committee asked the Navy Department for a general and complete plan of fortifications, which the Navy would consider to be adequate for the protection of the United States.

That report was known as the Hepburn report, after Admiral Hepburn who headed the commission which drew it up, and it proposed two alternative plans for fortifying Guam—as part of the whole vast program. And this was in no wise a current Navy Department recommendation. It was merely one of many items, in an ultimate conception of what should be done, to make the United States completely impregnable, regardless of cost or foreign policy, or anything else.

One of those plans called for an expenditure of about $30,000,000, which the Hepburn report said would provide Guam with some outer breastwork fortifications. The other called for expenditure of about $150,000,000, which, the board said, would completely fortify the island and turn it into a major naval operating base.

Neither the President, nor the Secretary of the Navy, nor the War Department, nor the State Department, nor any other responsible official of the administration actively supported either of these proposals, and the record actually shows that in 1938, the Navy Department actually recommended to the Bureau of the Budget the authorization of a considerable expenditure toward fortification of the island, but the bureau of the budget reduced that to an authorization for $5,000,000, for mere dredging of the harbor.

It came up for consideration on the floor of the House of Representatives on February 23, 1939, on which occasion Chairman CARL VINSON, of Georgia, of the House Naval Affairs Committee, and Representative MELVIN MAAS, of Minnesota, the ranking Republican on that same committee, were the leading proponents of it.

About 5 weeks prior to that time—on January 20, to be exact—the President was asked about this proposed $5,000,000 item. I was present at that press conference, and I remember it very clearly, but let me quote to you the Associated Press news report story on that press and radio conference, which is corroborated by my own files of my broadcasts of that day, over this microphone. Here is the Associated Press account:

"The President said that the Guam project was one of many proposed by a Navy board to be carried out over a course of years. He said he personally was not taking sides on the long range program but was concerned only about appropriations necessary for the coming year.

"The pending bill was an authorization only—and the President said that many authorized projects are abandoned, that one Congress could not commit another to a project, and in passing authorization it merely means that one Congress hoped some future Congress would appropriate money for the authorization. In other words, he said, it was an expression of a pious hope, or a New Year's resolution."

Now, getting back to the debate in the House of Representatives, it was flatly stated by all representatives of the administration who spoke on that occasion, that the authorization was not for the fortification of Guam, but merely to dredge the harbor. It was stated that the then Secretary of the Navy, Charles Edison, had written to the Naval Affairs Committee, stating that fact unequivocally, and—well take this quote from Representative VINSON:

"Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The bill in the first place, does not call for any fortification whatsoever."

The Congressman who led the fight to strike the item out of the bill was not an opponent of the administration, but was a Democrat from New Jersey, Representative SUTPHIN, and under his leadership, the item was stricken out of the bill by the House. Not an item for the fortification of Guam—the greatest possible emphasis was placed, time and again, on the fact that there were no fortifications involved—but, rather, an authorization of $5,000,000 to simply dredge the harbor.

The following year another attempt was made, in 1940. And this time it was an effort to get an appropriation of $5,000,000, as part of the Navy Department appropriation bill. Again, the set-up in the House of Representatives was the same: The Republican Representative MAAS, of Minnesota, and the Democratic chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, Representative VINSON of Georgia, led the fight in favor of it. And again, all administration leaders, including Secretary of the Navy Edison, said it was strictly a matter of dredging the harbor. They were not asking for any fortifications. That time it was again defeated.

Finally, in March of 1941, it was passed—an appropriation of $5,000,000 to dredge that harbor at Guam—and all administration leaders, including Admiral Stark, who was then Chief of Naval Operations, and Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox, insisted flatly and vehemently that they still did not propose to fortify Guam and were not asking to fortify it, they had no plans to fortify it. They merely wanted this money to deepen the harbor.

That is the record. I'm very sure that Speaker RAYBURN, if he will look back, will find that to be accurate to the last detail. So there really is no question of opponents of the administration having prevented the fortification of Guam because the administration, as the record shows, never made the slightest attempt or proposal to fortify Guam, and was very loud in its insistence at the time that it was not proposing any such thing.

The American Badge of Freedom Is the Ballot

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Howard Fast, the author of Citizen Tom Paine, has written an appeal urging people to exercise their right of franchise. It is a very timely article, and in my judgment should have the thoughtful attention of every voter in America. I place it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my remarks, so that it may receive the wide distribution it deserves:

THE AMERICAN BADGE OF FREEDOM

(An appeal)

It used to be that election day was a day of shouting, bonfires, and foolish bets, but this coming election day is like a day of prayer, a day of thanksgiving.

It used to be that we took the ballot for granted, as we took the fresh air and the sunshine and the bread we ate for granted; but the enemy showed us that we can take nothing for granted.

We had the right to vote; we had always possessed that right, and we felt we would always possess it. For all of that, it was a casual act, and if we had nothing better to do, we voted; otherwise, we didn't.

And then we learned that there are no rights but those for which we pay in blood. And in blood we paid.

The price was high, but all good things come dearly; and if we never knew before what the ballot meant, surely we know now. Surely we were taught what the right to vote means. Surely, in all the history of this earth, there was never such a bitter, such a cruel and pointed lesson.

Let us not talk any more of the right to vote or the privilege. It is a duty. It is the first and foremost duty of a citizen of a democracy.

Only by use of the ballot can he justify the very word democracy. Only by use of the ballot can he exercise the freedom for which Americans are dying.

There are no excuses, neither forgetfulness nor slothfulness nor indifference. Each of us, as an individual, has it in his power to influence the future of this Nation and the course of history. Each of us may cast but one vote. With the ballot we are equal in the truest sense of the word. Each of us, on election day, no matter how he votes, stands forth as the protagonist and justification of democracy.

The future is in our hands. What is asked of us? Only the small matter of casting a secret ballot on that Tuesday in November * * * the small matter which is the best and proudest possession of freemen.

Let no one be absent from the polls. When that day comes, no cause is a greater cause than this. No need is a greater need. No duty is a higher duty.

We vote only because brave men have died for that right; but this democracy of ours, for which they fought, cannot endure unless we go forth to the polls on election day, fully conscious of our duty, our responsibility, and our necessity.

Above all things, the ballot is the badge of freedom Americans wear.

Government Agencies Versus Meat Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I insert into the RECORD a letter sent to Chester Bowles, the Director of the O. P. A., and to Marvin Jones, the Director of W. F. A.

Mr. Speaker, the farmers of the country have been anxious to get an answer to a $64 question, which is, "What will the price of hogs be on October 1?"

The O. P. A. and the W. F. A. have caused an unholy mess in the handling of not only pork but beef. The Government agencies have put into effect directives which have caused a forced liquidation of our meat supplies. There will be a famine of all types of good meat because of their unnecessary attempts to regulate the livestock industry.

The hog industry has been protected by extreme scarcity. The Government agencies have found it necessary to have the so-called set-aside orders for pork. Several months ago the agencies announced that there would be a reduction in the price of hogs on October 1. Unless this order is immediately changed it will cause a liquidation of the hogs of the country. It will mean a further scarcity of pork.

The cattle feeder has already been barred from feeding by O. P. A. ceilings and other Government regulations. We see the agencies trying to stampede the range cattle producers into liquidating their herds. We find much of the better beef going to the black markets.

The subsidy and roll-back program for beef cattle did not help the producer or the feeder. The Government agencies are penalizing quantity production of meat. There has been a gradual strangulation of the hog, cattle, and sheep markets. The policies adopted by the O. P. A. and the W. F. A. will not produce more meat or better meat. They do encourage the black market racketeers. Their policies break down and destroy the business of producing good meat.

AUGUST 25, 1944.

CHESTER BOWLES,

Director, Office of Price Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOWLES: There is a $64 question which the producers of hogs are asking. The question is, "What will the price of hogs be on October 1?" Your office made a statement some time ago that it would be $12.50 per hundred, Chicago basis. This would be a reduction of $1.25 from the present price. There now seems to be some doubt about your order going into effect.

In all fairness to the farmers and the producers of hogs they should know now what the several Government agencies intend to do about the price of hogs. It is impossible for the farmers to plan with any satisfaction when he does not know what to expect or can hardly venture a guess regarding the plans of either the Office of Price or the War Food Administration. If the price of hogs is to be reduced $1.25 it will mean a loss of approximately $200 a carload. This would be something over $200,000,000 on the year's crop of hogs.

Unless a decision can be made at once it is almost certain that there will be a widespread liquidation of light hogs and pigs before October 1. I believe the hog raisers are as much interested in the ceiling as they are in the floor, perhaps more so, because with a shortage of meat it is almost certain that good hogs will sell up to or through the ceiling.

In the past few weeks there has been the wildest upswing in the price of hogs. This is because there is not enough pork to fill the requirements. A few weeks ago there was a feast of hogs and now there is a famine. There has been too much confusion and a constant turmoil and one of the worst chaotic conditions which has ever existed all because the Government organizations have been so uncertain as to which way to move. This has caused extreme confusion. I believe it is caused by the ignorance of those assigned to the problem. Not only the packers but the farmers have had to look to Washington to ascertain if they were doing something which might eventually put them in jail. They have been forbidden to do many things which they have always done under the business of free enterprise. A few men in the Price Control Section have been directing the economy of this country. By artificial means a few men have had the power to destroy most any business they attempt to regulate. It has been only a few short weeks since the market was swamped by a record supply of hogs. Storage was bulging. The Government at the same time froze all the corn supply and forced the farmers to dump more hogs on a market already burdened with more than it could handle.

Government agencies have refused to take the advice of practical men who know the hog business. Individuals in your agencies have imposed rules and regulations upon the trade to which, if they adhered to, meant absolute ruin. There is no sense of making rules and regulations which cannot be enforced.

It would seem to me that if we must have floors and ceilings on hogs that there should be a floor under all hogs between 180 and 270 pounds. This floor should not be less than $14.75 per hundred Chicago base. The price should not be less than $14.50 for all weights. If we must have ceilings, then in fairness to the farmers it should be on all classes and weights of hogs and adjusted to meet the increased cost of production.

The farmers have been forced to take many losses on their hogs because a few might have been under weight, which caused the entire lot to be sold far below the floor. There must be strict enforcement of floor prices. I believe all subsidies to the packers should be withheld unless the packer buys the hogs within the floor and the ceiling price. When the subsidy is reduced it should reflect an increased price to the producers of pork. The $1.30 subsidy being paid the packers on all classes of hogs should go to the producers. The packer waxes fat at the expense of the producer and all because of your crazy subsidy idea.

I wish to call your attention to the Price Control Extension Act in which Congress made it mandatory that the prices to the producers be kept at parity or the highest level obtained during the first 9 months of 1943. A reduction of the hog support price to $12.50 which you have suggested would be a violation of this law.

Again I say it is imperative that you take prompt action relative to the price of hogs in order that the producers might have a clear idea of what to expect from their Government. This should be done now and not a few hours before the dead line of October 1. Unless it is done immediately there will be a further liquidation of light hogs which will mean additional shortages of pork next year. The farmers have a right to know what the Government intends to do.

Can you give me and the hog producers of the country an answer to the $64 question; namely, What will the price of hogs be October 1?

Very truly yours,

A. L. MILLER,
Member of Congress,
Fourth District, Nebraska.

Care of Judge Marvin Jones, War Food Administration; James F. Byrnes, Director, Office of War Mobilization.

Our Post-war Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a statement from War Food Administrator, Judge Marvin Jones, before a subcommittee of the House on August 25. Several members of the committee remarked at the hearing that it was one of the best statements they had ever heard in their long careers in Congress. I feel that it should be carefully read by every Member having the future of our agriculture at heart.

We remember the work of Congressman Marvin Jones when he was chairman of the Agriculture Committee of this body and that he was one of the most eloquent supporters of agricultural progress and one of the stanchest defenders of the farmers' interests to be found among our Membership. He has always believed in an economy of abundance and is working for full production on the farm as well as in the factory all over our country. He wants the wartime program of cooperation to continue after the war as it has during the war. No man appreciates more than he the interdependency of agriculture and industry in bringing about a united prosperity to contribute to the best welfare of our country.

As a westerner, I have been particularly interested in the stress that Marvin Jones lays upon conserving our soil and utilizing our water resources. He knows the vast possibilities of the West and he would not permit a drop of water to go to waste. He appreciates that full utilization of the water resources throughout the West not only conserves the soil in that section of the country, but keeps up the food production while enabling needed conservation to be practiced in the East. This statement is a vision of what our country may be after the war if we have but the wisdom to materialize it. The statement is as follows:

It is impossible to separate the problem of production, storage, and disposition of food from the problem of the land on which it is produced and the prices and income which farmers receive, or from the machinery, tools, and labor with which it is produced, or from the processing, storing, and handling as well as transportation. The basic problems of soil, price, and income will remain in peace as well as in war time.

The War Food Administration, while an independent agency reporting directly to the President, utilizes and has control of the action agencies of the Department of Agriculture as well as its own personal staff. In this way it is far less expensive than if it operated altogether with a complete new personnel of its own. In addition, it has the advantage of the experience of those who have heretofore been engaged in the same line of work.

We are therefore directly interested not only in guiding production and supporting prices, but also in the disposal of food as such, and in the disposition and handling of the land now owned by the Government, in rebuilding and maintaining the soil, in the use of water, in the disposition of equipment, machinery, and supplies owned by the Government that may be useful in connection with farming or with the soil, and with other questions that are intimately linked with the future of the farm and ranch.

The American farmers and ranchmen have done a magnificent production job since the beginning of the war. In spite of wartime handicaps they have produced more food than any nation in history ever produced in the same time. They have not only made it possible for us to have the best fed Army and Navy in the world, but have supplied all essential civilian needs and, at the same time, have made it possible for us to ship vast quantities of food to our fighting allies. The War Food Administration for the last year has purchased an average of more than $8,000,000 worth of food per day for shipment abroad for these purposes. Every pound of this food has brought results. It has made it possible for our fighting allies to continue their all-out war effort. The Allied Nations owe the American farmer a debt of gratitude. They have so expressed themselves.

This production is what we want. There is no place in America for a philosophy of scarcity. Ours is the heritage of abundance. It is our goal today and will continue to be our goal when the war is over. Out of the great resources with which nature has endowed our land, we have built a great nation. Abundance is the soundest of national policies. It is plain common sense to produce all that we can consume and export without injury to our soil and natural resources and at a reasonable profit to the producers.

This production can be continued only if we have all-out industrial production as well. There cannot be curtailment of industrial production and, at the same time, abundant agricultural production. The two furnish a market for each other and assure employment to labor. This abundant agricultural production was made possible by the support prices which Congress wisely provided. You are aware, of course, that to carry out this support program in accordance with the commitment, necessary funds and authority will have to be supplied by the Congress.

This problem involves disposition of Government-owned stocks of agricultural products which must be held in reserve for war needs. We will have surplus stocks of food just as we will have surplus airplanes, guns, and tanks. The only way to have assurance against a shortage of these essential needs of our armed forces is to have some reserve supplies. Some of these supplies will, of course, be needed for temporary relief abroad, but we will also need authority to dispose of surplus agricultural commodities and the products abroad at competitive world prices.

One of the most interesting movies I have seen recently portrayed the part that industry will play in the Nation's post-war rebuilding and development, and in furnishing jobs after the war has ended.

The picture was well done and in every way worthy of praise. However, it left out one great wing of development; that is, the rural areas, the Nation's farms, ranches, and natural resources.

I hope some enterprising producer will make another movie depicting the possibilities of rebuilding, the opportunities for development, and furnishing of employment in the rural sections of this country.

Agriculture and industry are the twin evangels of modern civilization. Neither can prosper without the other. If one languishes, sooner or later the other will feel the effect. The farmer and livestock producer furnish the raw material, and in turn, if prosperous, help furnish a wider market for the finished article. At the same time, if the factory wheels are turning, they afford a market for the products of agriculture. Labor is vitally affected by any adverse effects that touch either wing of our national effort.

I was thrilled at the screen picture that I saw of the vast new efforts of industry: The busy spindles, the blazing furnaces, the new products made possible by man's inventive genius, the great wealth of useful things that industry can produce for the happiness of mankind.

But after all, the vital spark is lit back in the far stretches of this broad, big country.

We grow accustomed to the precious things of life, and they seem commonplace. We take them for granted—the air we breathe, the water we drink, and, in this very fortunate and productive country, the food we eat. We sometimes lose sight of the hard work that is involved in the production of that food, as well as the fiber which goes into the clothing and shelter of our people.

The opportunities we shall have after the war for developing our vast resources of land and water could be fashioned into a story more thrilling and romantic than any that has yet been shown on the screen—one by which the imagination of the people can be stirred along practical lines and one that can set our entire country athrill. If I were a movie producer, I would tell a screen story that would make the following points:

1. The first point would be soil conservation. The capital stock of the Nation is its soil resources. No business can stand a continual drain on its capital; likewise, no nation can endure for long, excessive drains on its capital resources.

What are soil resources? They are food and clothing locked up in nature's warehouses against the time when man, through his efforts, takes them out and uses them. Our great soil resources in this country have enabled us to develop a great race of people. History shows that the character and strength of a nation always go up and down with its soil.

H. H. Bennett, Chief of the Soil Conservation Service, who has spent more than an average lifetime in a study of the soils, is authority for the statement that we have ruined more land in less time than any other nation in history, and that more than 50,000,000 acres of land in the United States, once cultivated and fertile, no longer produce crops. That was nearly as much as our entire wheat acreage last year. And the best topsoil has been washed away from an additional acreage more than twice as large as that. Fortunately, we are learning of this growing danger before it is too late. The soil-conservation and soil-building practices of the last few years have increased the acreage yields of our major crops by more than 20 percent.

There are now more than 1,100 soil-conservation districts organized under the laws of various States receiving Federal assistance. Track-type tractors, bulldozers, ditching and other machinery and equipment would greatly increase the effectiveness of personnel already available and serving farms in the conservation of soil resources. Such surplus war equipment as is suitable for the purpose should be made available for these programs to expand the work of constructing terraces, drainage and irrigation ditches, stock-watering ponds, and other conservation developments.

Once made available, farmers themselves would pay for the operation and maintenance of the equipment. Because of the shortage of equipment, farmers have been unable to go ahead with the work planned. Additional equipment will result in greater efficiency and more work.

I have mentioned soil conservation first, but starting with the soil, other developments naturally flow from and become part and parcel of the undertaking. These include the proper use of water; the construction of large and small dams; rural electrification; decentralized industrial development; highways, and other forms of transportation; and individual home ownership. They are all closely linked.

2. I mentioned water use. Rainfall should be used on the plains and hillsides where it falls, through soil treatment, contour plowing, cover cropping, and strip planting, instead of letting it run off in waste to the sea, taking the soil with it. The building of ponds, check dams, and other small dams on the tributaries and small streams and in pastures and fields are all closely related to the conservation and rebuilding of the soil and furnish a vast field for adding to the wealth of our country and to the full employment of our people.

What is known as the Mississippi Valley, and I mean by that the whole great area between the Alleghenies and the Rockies, is the greatest food-producing area on earth. It all forms one great integrated river system. Properly used, it can for centuries to come not only supply our own people, but can help supply others with its products and bring back in trade additional goods for us to use and enjoy.

In dealing with nature's resources in any land and in any country, there is always a conserving use and a wasteful use. The choice lies with the people who control those resources. In the past we have exploited our good earth with a prodigal disregard of its value to our enduring life as a nation. We have sent the export crops down to the sea in ships and the soil down to the sea in mud. When the Mississippi overflowed toward its mouth we built levees. We tried to reverse nature and when nature fought back, as she always does under those conditions, we built even higher levees. Instead of using the water all along the line we tried to get it into the sea as fast as we could.

We are learning at last that the path of wisdom is to go back where the water falls as rain and work with nature instead of against her to utilize water at the source, thus treating it as a blessing instead of a curse. The development of a system of use that will retain that water and soil is worth any national effort however great. Far out in our great dry land areas not a single gallon of unused water should be permitted to reach the sea. All should be used on the land.

In other areas where it is abundant, it can be channeled and utilized for power, for additional wealth.

What has been said about the Mississippi Valley is true of our numerous other valleys and river systems throughout our great land.

After the war our people will turn eagerly from destruction in war to the constructive activities of peace. Our engineering and technical genius will gladly turn from its prodigious feats in jungle and desert areas to the worth-while and useful challenge that awaits them here at home.

The Congress, with farsighted vision, has established a Soil Conservation Service and made provisions for carrying out an extended program of preserving our greatest natural source of wealth. It has also made provision for a wiser use of water. Millions of acres of land are being protected and rebuilt under programs that have been vast. These efforts and provisions will need to be greatly enlarged.

3. This leads to the construction of large dams for irrigation, flood control, and hydroelectric power. The value of these great projects does not need to be argued. A visit to any one of them is visual and confirming evidence of their great worth. Nearly every great country on earth has natural wealth that only needs the touch of the genius and industry of man to be harnessed for human use.

4. Closely related to this is rural electrification. One of the great advantages of the construction of large dams is the possibility of using them for the production of electric power not only for the cities but flowing out to the countryside to the millions of farm homes that need it to lift the drudgery and burdens that are connected with the production of food. Produced and distributed in volume, electricity is one of the cheapest of commodities. It is one of the most useful. It affords an opportunity not only for making life easier and less burdensome, but also for bringing about a better balanced condition for making our entire country a productive commonwealth. Some of our surplus war materials could well be used for expanding the rural-electrification program.

5. I mentioned decentralized industrial developments. If we develop a vast network of soil treatment, check damming, and hydroelectric power dams on the various streams flowing through every nook and corner of the United States, it will naturally make possible, in fact will make inevitable, a decentralized development of industry in all parts of the country. This will bring our raw materials close to the heart of the business community and the interests of agriculture and industry can be thus dovetailed together.

Bringing the products of the farm as well as articles of industry closer to the markets of each will bring about a better understanding between agriculture and industry, which are natural partners, and will help solve many of the problems of both capital and labor.

6. Highways are another part of this chain of development. There should be a greatly expanded and suitable network of highways in order to facilitate the exchange of the products of factory and farm. This should not stop with highways. We will need all forms of transportation: Railway, air line and newer forms that may be developed when the war is over. I have no doubt that through the use of airplane transportation, and with the advantages of improved forms of refrigeration, fresh vegetables can be carried in a few hours from the point of production to any market in this country. The same is true of many other perishable commodities. If in this way an expanded production for expanded use can be developed, not only will both agriculture and industry gain advantages therefrom, but every form of transportation in its fullest development will be needed, and any man who is willing to work will be able to find a place in it. This possibility is a challenge to the best minds and the best thought that this Nation can produce.

All discrimination in freight rates as between different sections or areas of the country should be eliminated as to all forms of transportation.

7. Home ownership fits squarely into this picture. The financing of home purchase of family-sized farms, with special provision for returning soldiers who may desire to purchase and live on a farm, can contribute much to the stability of our country. The same is true of the financing of home purchasing in the towns and cities. Our laws, both State and national, should be so fashioned as to encourage the ownership and maintenance of family-sized farms in the country and comfortable homes in the towns and cities. It will be difficult for any "ism" or wild scheme or movement to gain any appreciable foothold among a home-owning people.

A great variety of agricultural land, ranging all the way from submarginal to some of our very best farm land, was acquired for various war purposes. We believe that this land should be disposed of in accordance with agricultural policies which have been established by Congress over a period of years. The agricultural land which is declared surplus should be surveyed to determine its proper use on a long-time basis. Following this, the submarginal land should be assigned to the proper State or Federal Government agency depending upon location and the use to which it might be put. For example, some of the land might be included in soil conservation, erosion control, and forestry programs of the Department of Agriculture or appropriate programs of other Government agencies. Such disposition of submarginal land not only would be wise from the standpoint of good land use, but would be economical in the long run. In our judgment it would be unfair to sell submarginal land to individuals for farming purposes.

The land which is determined to be suitable for farming should be divided into family-size units and sold to persons who intend to live on the unit and operate it for a livelihood.

Lands that are suitable only for range purpose should, of course, be sold in larger tracts consistent with that use.

The former owners should be given a reasonable period of about 90 days in which to repurchase the land formerly owned by them at a price not exceeding the price which the Government paid for the land, after taking into consideration any damage to the property, and also the usable advantage, if any, of any improvements that may have been placed thereon by the Government. Subject only to the former owner's right to purchase, war veterans, who have had experience in farming and who desire to do so, should first be given an opportunity to secure a farming unit. In our opinion it would be inconsistent with sound public policy to permit this land to fall into the hands of those who do not need it for homes when so many former owners and servicemen will find it impossible to get a farm at reasonable prices and terms.

It is our earnest hope that Congress will make sure that the good farm land to be released by the Government is used for encouraging the family-sized, family-operated farm ideal of America, which has been the foundation rock not only of our agriculture but our entire Nation.

But whatever is done, whatever plans we may make, or whatever genius we may possess, our Nation must perish unless we take care of the soil. The soil is our natural heritage. Wisely used, its value, its life-giving strength, its productivity are ageless.

The children of the future have a stake in this our greatest natural resource. We have a right to use the soil and other natural resources. We have no right to abuse them. They can be made to grow stronger and more productive and be left to coming generations in richer and better form than when they came to us.

We want to keep this Nation a land of abundance and opportunity.

Philadelphia Bulletin Poll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. MURPHY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Philadelphia Bulletin of August 22, 1944:

THE BULLETIN POLL—53 PERCENT OF VOTERS IN THIS CITY PREFER ROOSEVELT NOW—24 SUPPORT DEWEY, AND 20 PERCENT SAY THEY HAVEN'T MADE UP MINDS YET

(By Paul Trescott)

If the Presidential election were being held today, President Roosevelt would get 53 percent of Philadelphia's vote.

That is the result of interviews with a carefully selected cross section of Philadelphia adults by representatives of the Bulletin poll. Twenty-four percent of the voters expressed a preference for Governor Dewey, and 20 percent declared they hadn't made up their minds.

In the 1940 Presidential election, President Roosevelt polled approximately 60 percent of the city vote, and Philadelphia supplied about two-thirds of the margin by which he carried Pennsylvania. Since then many thousands of Philadelphians have entered the armed services, and how they will vote—if they do—is anybody's guess.

Eighteen percent of those interviewed reported they were too young to vote 4 years ago, and most of the group said they hadn't made up their minds how to vote this year. Among those who did vote 4 years ago, 7 percent of those who voted Democratic said they intended to vote for Governor Dewey this time. On the other hand, 13 percent of those who voted Republican in 1940 expressed the intention of voting for Mr. Roosevelt this year.

SHIFTS ARE A FACTOR

Such shifts take place in every election and at times completely upset forecasters. Incidentally, the results of this poll are not a forecast but a report of sentiment as it exists today.

The undecided vote is abnormally large and is a completely unpredictable factor. It may include a considerable number of those who do not vote, as well as those who fully intend to visit the polls but are awaiting clarification of some campaign issue before making up their minds.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS IN ELECTION POLL

Interviewers for the Bulletin poll asked Philadelphia adults this question:

"If the Presidential election were being held today, for whom would you vote—Dewey or Roosevelt?"

The result:

	Percent
Roosevelt	53
Dewey	24
Others	1
Undecided	20
Declined to answer	2

As between men and women, the result was—

	Percent
	Men	Women
Roosevelt	50	55
Dewey	29	21
Others	1	--

Peace Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RANULF COMPTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a brief and comprehensive outline of several important phases of an international peace plan, just made public by Mr. R. Walter Bishop, of Guilford, Conn.:

A PROPOSAL FOR PERMANENT WORLD SECURITY WITH SUGGESTED METHODS FOR ITS APPLICATION

A PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

Thoughtful people everywhere recognize the fact that the world cannot continue to live in a state of anarchy. If there is to be international security and peace, there must be law and order.

To enable mankind to live in security and peace, under a condition of law and order, there must be some form of international organization such as a continuation of the present functioning United Nations. The name of such international organization is immaterial—it is the substance of effective world organization that is essential.

This world organization will necessarily require executive authority to carry into effect the recommendations decided upon by all sovereign nations assembled at regular or special sessions. A world court will decide disputes of international character. And united world military power, operating under, and directed by the world executive authority and the world general staff, will be prepared to use force if necessary to uphold law and order in the world community.

The following plan for permanent world security, to be developed in two stages, is definitely not intended to take the place of a world organization having executive, policy-making, and judicial branches. Obviously a practical use of force, if necessary, must support the peaceful purposes of a world organization. It is entirely possible that the success or failure of world organization—and the issue of future peace or war—may depend to a large extent on how the military force of the world is organized to implement and support the peaceful purposes of a united world.

The united military power of the world will consist of air, naval, and land forces, each sharing in the responsibility of keeping order and upholding justice under the executive authority of the world organization and operating through a general staff somewhat expanded. These divisions of military power will be coordinated to work together in the enforcement of law and order throughout the world.

Because the average citizen at the present time is likely to understand the strategic location of world naval bases better than the location of land and air bases, and because the united control of naval bases will necessarily play a large part in any coordinated military support of world peace, on account of the use of oceans as highways for much of the world's heavy trade, this proposal will deal with the organization of world naval power as an illustration of the formula, but the formula proposed for the organization of naval power can be and should be applied to both air and land forces in a coordinated system of military power, operating under the executive authority and general staff of a world organization.

THE IMPORTANCE OF AIR POWER UNDER THIS FORMULA

World air power, under stage No. 2 of this proposal, would be organized under exactly the same formula as world naval power, with bases located at other strategic points throughout the world. If both air and naval power were organized under the proposed formula, it is probable that it would not be necessary to maintain extensive armies under stage No. 2, but such land forces as may be considered essential could be organized under the same formula—all three branches coordinated in one integrated system of military power under the executive authority and general staff, carrying out the policies of the community of sovereign nations.

Because of the highly competitive nature of the aircraft industries of the three leading world powers, it is particularly important that this impartial formula for permanent world security be adopted as soon as possible in order to protect each of these nations, as well as all nations, from the insecurity that would result from unrestrained competition of these powers for the world military control of the air.

PERMANENT WORLD SECURITY IN TWO STAGES

In order to be successful any plan for permanent world security must be practical and realistic. One cannot expect to jump from a world organized for war to one organized for peace and security without months of planning and adjustment during this transitionary stage. By keeping our feet on the ground of practical reality under the preliminary stage of the plan, and by keeping our eyes on the goal of permanent world security under stage No. 2, the problems of transition from one stage to the other can be solved successfully.

These two stages are part of the same plan. If only the first stage of this plan were carried out, the world would very likely degenerate into several competing imperialisms, with only an armed peace to stave off the inevitable clash of rival interests. By preparing for permanent stage No. 2 during preliminary stage No. 1, the transition could be made smoothly, safely, and successfully.

STAGE NO. 1. PRELIMINARY OR TRANSITION STAGE

(Lasting from 2 to 5 years after end of war)

The first need of the world immediately following the cessation of hostilities will be stability in order to give the forces of reconstruction the best chance to get started. Obviously, the security of the world, during this unsettled period, depends on the continued employment of as much existing military power as may be needed to maintain stability and order, under the General Staff of the United Nations. The advantages would be as follows:

1. There would not be time to organize anything different. Stability must be maintained with the forces at hand.

2. The existing United Nations power would be large enough for immediate world security. The United States would be strong on land, air, and sea; Russia in land and air power; Great Britain in air and sea power, and China (possibly) in land forces, and other nations as during the war. Surplus power not needed for maintaining stability could be demobilized.

3. The General Staff as now organized could continue, with perhaps some additions, during the transition period from stage 1 to stage 2. This would be the logical directing military staff, under World Executive Authority of stage No. 2.

4. Naval and air bases throughout the world acquired during the war should be held in trust by the continuing United Nations General Staff while the rotary-command system of stage No. 2 was being organized. All nations would be more willing to cede these bases to the United Nations than to any individual nation, bebecause all nations would use these bases jointly for their mutual security during stage No. 2.

5. There would be time, under stage No. 1 to adjust the military power of the world to actual requirements. During stage No. 1 it is probable that land power, as an occupying force in world trouble spots, would play the major part. But during stage No. 2 air and sea power would be the chief needs, since—aside from domestic police in each country—it should be possible for a combination of air and sea power, integrated in one system, to maintain world security on a permanent basis.

6. The large amount of existing equipment produced by a few of the major powers would be more useful for the stage No. 2, since each of the nations, under Stage No. 2 could take over and maintain its share of this equipment, thus reducing the cost, providing a use, and resulting in greater uniformity of a united world military power. This would make stage No. 2 easier to organise than if the equipment varied too much in design and operation.

STAGE NO. 2. PERMANENT WORLD SECURITY

(Commencing at end of Stage No. 1)

A practical formula is the basis of success in solving the problem of permanent world security

It is obvious that in order to succeed in solving the knotty problems of permanent world security, a formula must be found that commends itself to all mankind for—

1. Its absolute fairness and impartiality to every nation.
2. Its practicability.
3. Its economy.

A study of international conferences has shown the difficulty of finding a formula that would satisfy every nation. In order to succeed, a formula must be found this time that does command the respect of mankind because it is manifestly just and impartial to every nation. The formula proposed here does seem to have the above qualifications and is offered in the hope that it may help a little in bringing peace and security to mankind.

A brief outline of the plan or formula

This plan is designed to give to every nation in the world equal security, without the risk that any one nation can or will threaten the security of the others. (This illustration applies to naval power but the same formula would be used for air and land power, particularly air power which will share equal importance with naval power in maintaining world order and security.)

1. This purpose is accomplished by the establishment of 12 world naval bases at strategic points on the highways of the world's ocean trade. Each of these naval bases shall be manned by 12 "units of power." These units of power shall be defined, as explained in another paragraph, by a body of naval experts representing all 12 nations, and shall be suitable for the needs of keeping order in any given area.

2. Each naval base shall be in command of a supreme commander, operating under, and upholding the policies of a world organization of sovereign nations. Operating under the supreme commander at each base shall be 12 subcommanders, one for each nation to command the unit of power furnished by that nation.

3. The office of supreme commander at each world naval base shall be rotated from year to year, and the new supreme commander each year (or each 2 years if a biennial method is considered more feasible) shall be chosen by one of the nations furnishing a unit of naval power for that base. If the term of office of the supreme commander was 1 year, it would take 12 years for the command of the base to rotate among the 12 nations manning the base. If the term of office was 2 years, then it would take 24 years for each of the 12 nations to have its turn at furnishing the supreme commander for each of the world naval bases.

4. This plan of rotating supreme commanders, annually or biennially, at any given naval base shall apply to all of the 12 naval bases located in all parts of the world with the following important provision: That the permanent schedule adopted for the whole world shall be so devised that no single nation will furnish supreme commanders for more than one of the 12 world naval bases during the same period of time.

A suggested schedule accompanies this proposal which may help to explain with greater clarity just how the rotation of commands would work out in actual operation.

5. For practical purposes, the 12 larger nations are assigned places at each world naval base, mainly because the larger nations should be better able to assume the financial responsibility of furnishing more units of power than the smaller nations, but if the smaller nations wish to join together and furnish between them 1 unit of power for each base, these smaller nations can rotate the command of their own units and when it becomes the turn of this composite unit to furnish the supreme commander for the naval base, one of their own number can be chosen for the honor. But if the number of units of power at each naval base is increased from 12 to 13, then there should be 13 world naval bases in all parts of the world in order to have the rotation plan work successfully.

Advantages of the permanent plan (known as stage No. 2)

Any plan for a coordinated world military power must necessarily have many unquestionable advantages if it is to command the attention and respect of mankind, and if it is to secure the widespread approval of all nations to make it a definite success. The chief advantages of this proposed plan are as follows:

1. It would be just and impartial to all nations. An impartial system with short-term rotation of commands would make it less possible, if not altogether impossible, for nationalistic rivalries to develop within the system.

2. Because it is plainly a just plan, it would eliminate the opportunity for selfish armament interests in any or all countries to arouse national jealousies and rivalries by false propaganda and chicanery.

3. By a system of checks and balances, this plan insures absolute security to all peoples. The rotation of all commanders each year, or each 2 years, with no more than one base in the world under the command of any one nation at the same time would protect the interests of each nation equally.

Even nations considered present enemy countries, after they are reconstituted could be admitted to such military system without undue risk, and it would be psychologically sound to admit them to the system as soon as possible after the conclusion of the present conflict. The automatic system of checks and balances would protect every nation. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for any one nation to stir up international trouble within the world system.

4. The successful operation of this plan would result in great economies in the amount of money spent by all nations for naval armament. Such economy would be an important consideration after the present conflict when most if not all nations will carry a heavy load of debt which must be liquidated in due time. The money saved on new naval armament could go into steel and other products for the general reconstruction of the world.

5. It would help lay the basis for wide development of international trade freely moving between nations without fear of disturbance. A coordinated naval power, as proposed, would contribute to the freedom of the seas—safeguarding the interests of all nations and peoples equally.

6. It would be a practical plan for administrative purposes. Since naval craft are, for the most part, designed to operate within limited areas not too far from regular naval bases, this plan of having the naval power of the world operating in 12 defined zones adjacent to the 12 world naval bases would be practical from the administrative standpoint.

7. The plan would be psychologically sound because it would be recognized as a just plan that would treat all nations fairly. It would help to give mankind the sense of security that is the basis for international stability and peace.

8. Because the military power of the world, organized under this formula, would be in actual balance at all times, the question of progressive disarmament would be solved automatically and safely by reducing, periodically, the size of the units of power at each or any world base in accordance with the growing security and stability of that particular area.

TECHNICAL PROBLEMS MADE EASIER BY AN IMPARTIAL PLAN

One of the chief difficulties at previous peace and arms limitations conferences has been the intrusion of conflicting national interests in deciding technical questions. There have been so many national, geographic, economic, and political considerations to be introduced, that it has been most difficult in the past to bring to all nations the security which each one desired. The use of an impartial formula would eliminate at once the conflicting interests, since it would be to the mutual advantage of every nation to cooperate in making the united military power of the world one of the greatest efficiency. Because all nations are treated equally, it would not be difficult for a body of naval experts to decide just what types of naval craft are necessary for each strategically located naval base for the purposes of giving adequate protection to the interests of all nations served by that area.

Among the technical problems to be decided would be—

1. The location of 12 world naval bases on the highways of the world's ocean trade, strategically located to give the greatest protection to the interests of all nations.

2. The composition of each unit of power provided by the different nations for each base. Each unit of power would probably be measured by weight, by cost, by gun power, by speed, and by its general efficiency for the purposes of policing the ocean highways. Some nations would probably furnish a unit of power composed of craft of a certain category. Other nations, furnishing units of equivalent value, might furnish from a different type. The purpose would be to have there units of power fairly balance each other so that each nation would bear its fair share of the responsibility and cost of naval duty. However, the requirements may not be the same for each of the 12 nations on account of geographical or political considerations in any area. Consequently, the unit value may be raised or lowered for any particular base in order to secure the greatest efficiency and economy. But since each of the 12 nations furnishes one unit of power for each base, the whole system would be maintained in practical balance, and it should not be difficult for a group of the world's ablest technicians to devise an arrangement that would be fair to all nations.

3. The coordination of the different units of power at each base would constitute the most difficult problem, but since it is inevitable that mankind must learn to work together, if there is to be any security for anyone anywhere in the world, nations might just as well get down to the business of working together now as to defer this manifest duty to an indefinite future. After all, the problems of peaceful organization are no greater than the tremendous problems of organization required in any war on a world scale. A difference in language, in type of equipment, and methods might cause some difficulties in the first years, with 12 units of power at each base, but these problems would be overcome in due time.

4. The efficient use of naval power at the conclusion of stage No. 7 would make it advisable for some of the nations without sufficient naval equipment of the right sort to man their 12 units of power to purchase such naval equipment from nations that will be oversupplied at the end of stage No. 1, thereby reducing the total amount of any additional equipment necessary to put a permanent world security system (stage No. 2) into efficient operation.

DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION

Since there is a growing desire and recognition throughout the world that all peoples must work together if there is to be continuing advance of civilization, the foregoing plan is devised to give to all nations and peoples a sound basis for cooperation. There should develop at each world naval base an esprit de corps. Each Supreme Commander, as it became his turn to command the naval base for a period of 1 or 2 years, would naturally do his best to give his station the most efficient service. It would be a matter of personal satisfaction and national honor to serve well the common purposes of mankind.

The growth of international sports at each naval base would contribute to international sportsmanship.

CONCLUSION

The foregoing proposal is submitted for consideration at the present time, in memory of those who have struggled for the freedom of the world and in the hope that it may help in bringing peace and security to all nations.

SCHEDULE NO. 1. A SUGGESTED SCHEDULE FOR THE ROTATION OF SUPREME COMMANDERS AT WORLD NAVAL BASES

(A) A 1- or 2-year rotation. The schedule is made out for a 1-year rotation, but this could be changed to a 2-year rotation by changing the dates accordingly at the top of each column.

(B) No more than one Supreme Commander at any time furnished by one nation anywhere in the world.

(C) If there are several smaller nations that desire to have a part in helping to maintain world order, they can combine to supply one unit of power for each of the naval bases, but if there are 13 units of power at each naval base there should be 13 naval bases to make the rotation of commands possible.

[1] Taken by United States, England, and Russia until reconstituted.

NOTE.—Repeat rotation after 1961.

SCHEDULE NO. 2. SUGGESTED ORGANIZATION OF EACH WORLD NAVAL BASE—BASED ON 12 UNITS OF POWER FOR EACH BASE

The component parts of each unit (which are noncompetitive) can be decided upon by naval experts of all nations. Each unit of power shall be of relative value for any base. But some naval bases may require a greater amount of power for naval duty than other naval bases, in which case, each of the 12 units of power shall be relatively stronger than the units of power for bases which require less power.

If a number of smaller nations desired to have a part of this responsibility, they could furnish a total of one unit of power for each of the naval bases, with the expense divided between them. In case this is done, there should be 13 world naval bases instead of the proposed 12, to make the rotation plan work.

If Germany, Italy, and Japan were not to be admitted at the end of stage No. 1 on account of the unsettled international mind as an aftermath of the conflict, then England, the United States and Russia should each accept the added obligation of one extra unit each until such time as they can be taken care of by the former enemy countries. However, since it would not be conducive to the future peace and unity of mankind to have any large nation ignored in setting up a permanent world security system, and since the restrictions which this type of organization places upon any nation to cause trouble, it would be psychologically sound and conducive to international solidarity and progress to have each nation capable of helping to support this united world military power to have their fair share in it from the beginning of stage No. 2.

A proposed list of units of power for each world naval base is as follows:

	Units
England	1
United States	1
Russia	1
France	1
China	1
Netherlands	1
Germany [1]	1
Italy [1]	1
Japan [1]	1
Brazil	1
Argentina	1
Chile	1
Total	12

[1] See note at foot of previous table.

SCHEDULE NO. 3. 12 SUGGESTED WORLD NAVAL BASES

(To be finally decided by international political and naval experts)

These are not arranged, necessarily, in the order from No. 1 to No. 12, but may be arranged by experts in any order which will then become permanent, to secure the most practical operation of the rotating plan from the beginning.

Panama Canal (or some point in Caribbean such as Cuba or Puerto Rico).

San Francisco, Calif. (or Dutch Harbor, Alaska).

Santiago, Chile.

Belem, Brazil.

Dakar, West Africa.

Gibraltar.

Cape Town, South Africa (or Madagascar).

Suez.

Southampton, England (or Scapa Flow).

Singapore.

Some base in the Solomon or Marianas Group of southwest Pacific.

Pearl Harbor.

Total, 12 bases.

The Recall of Mr. Phillips

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY M. JACKSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Post of August 28, 1944:

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND

(By Drew Pearson)

United States and foreign diplomats have been in a backstage ferment over the ousting of Ambassador William Phillips from London as political adviser to General Eisenhower.

Officially, Phillips came home for personal reasons. Actually, however, he was asked to leave London because, last year, he wrote a letter to President Roosevelt criticizing British policy in India and recommending Indian independence.

The Phillips letter, published in this column on July 25, has caused the cables to burn up between Washington and London ever since. The British first demanded an official explanation from the State Department. Later, Foreign Minister Eden personally demanded Phillips recall.

In addition, the British demanded the recall of George Merrell from New Delhi. Merrell, a career man of long standing, has been acting chief of the United States mission in India during Phillips absence, and was sympathetic toward Indian independence. He has resigned and will return home shortly.

Phillips technically is still the President's special Ambassador to India, though for the last few months he has been attached to Eisenhower's personal staff in London to advise on French, Belgian, and other European problems. Since Phillips was on Eisenhower's staff, not accredited to the British Government, his recall is considered highly unusual, almost without precedent.

In effect, the British objected to the fact that Phillips made a report to his chief, the President of the United States, regarding India. Members of the Diplomatic Corps point out that, in 1888, the United States asked British Ambassador Lionel Sackville-West to leave Washington because he wrote to a private United States citizen advocating the election of Grover Cleveland. However, in this case, Ambassador Phillips expressed his views, not to a private citizen, but to his chief in the White House. President Roosevelt had asked him to report on India, and Phillips carried out instructions.

BRITISH OBJECTIONS

What the British are reported to have objected to in the Phillips report was his argument that India was of great concern to us on account of the Japanese war. He told F. D. R. that we could not "accept the British point of view that conditions in India are none of our business."

"It is not right for the British to say this is none of your business when we alone presumably will have the major part to play in the struggle with Japan," Phillips said.

He also used plain, hard-boiled language regarding the failure of the Indian Army to fight.

"The present Indian Army," he told F. D. R., "is purely mercenary. General Stilwell has expressed his concern over the situation and in particular over the poor morale of the Indian officers. The attitude of the general public toward the war is even worse."

He concluded, "It is time for the British to act. This they can do by a solemn declaration from the King-Emperor that India will achieve her independence at a specific date after the war."

PROTEST TO STATE DEPARTMENT

Following Washington Merry-Go-Round publication of the Phillips letter, Foreign Minister Anthony Eden cabled Sir Ronald Campbell, British Chargé d'Affaires in Washington, stating that he and Prime Minister Churchill were greatly perturbed and instructing the British Embassy to approach the State Department with a formal demand for an investigation. Sir Ronald then called on Secretary Hull and informed him that the British Government viewed the matter seriously and wanted a full explanation.

Secretary Hull informed Sir Ronald that the Phillips letter had undoubtedly leaked out through former Under Secretary Sumner Welles—which the British, of course, knew was not the case.

Secretary Hull then went on his vacation, and Eden cabled the British Embassy ordering Sir Ronald Campbell to approach the State Department again and demand a public statement disassociating the Roosevelt administration from the views expressed by Ambassador Phillips.

Sir Ronald saw both Acting Secretary Stettinius and Assistant Secretary Berle, both of whom stalled, offering no encouragement. Berle said they had a suspicion regarding the news leak but were not prepared to reveal it at that time.

In London, meanwhile, both Churchill and Eden had put the heat on United States Ambassador John Winant, telling him how bitterly they resented Phillips' views. They also had a Foreign Office official ask Phillips if he still held the same views he had expressed to the President.

Phillips replied that he most certainly did and was more convinced than ever that he was right. However, he added that he was sorry his letter had been published, and said:

"I hope that my other reports, which were even stronger, will not leak out."

At this point Foreign Minister Eden cabled the British Embassy to inform the State Department that Phillips was persona non grata in London. In the cable he said: "India is more important than a thousand Phillips."

Simultaneously, the Embassy was instructed to tell the State Department that Phillips could never go back to India as Ambassador.

(NOTE.—Phillips has been Under Secretary of State, Assistant Secretary, Minister to Canada, Ambassador to Belgium and Italy. George Merrell, now recalled from New Delhi, has held posts in Peiping, Amoy, Calcutta, Harbin, and many other places in the Orient.)

Washington Conversations on International Organization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of August 29, 1944, by the heads of the American, British, and Soviet delegations at the informal conversations at Dumbarton Oaks:

After a week of discussion, the three heads of delegations are happy to announce that there is general agreement among them to recommend that the proposed international organization for peace and security should provide for:

1. An assembly composed of representatives of all peace-loving nations based on the principle of sovereign equality.

2. A council composed of a smaller number of members in which the principal states will be joined by a number of other states to be elected periodically.

3. Effective means for the peaceful settlement of disputes, including an international court of justice for the adjudication of justiciable questions, and also the application of such other means as may be necessary for maintenance of peace and security.

The delegations are continuing to discuss the structure and jurisdiction of the various organs and methods of procedure. These topics require a great deal of consideration, and a number of proposals are now being submitted to examination. Different proposals from the different countries do not necessarily indicate disagreement or conflicting points of view but stem from varied approaches to the common objective. After our work has advanced to a stage at which our fully considered recommendations have been formulated and our conclusions have been presented, our respective Governments will decide the appropriate moment for publication.

This Is Poor Sportsmanship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer of August 28, 1944:

THIS IS POOR SPORTSMANSHIP

It was a close shave.

For a few hours on Friday it looked as though the cherished New Deal strategy giving President Roosevelt unlimited facilities for delivering campaign speeches to the men overseas, while depriving his opponents of equal opportunities, had been wrecked.

Making the blow even harder to take was the fact that it came from within the family circle—from the War Department—in a memorandum agreeing that the Roosevelt address at the Puget Sound Navy Yard on August 12 was political and granting the Socialist Party's request for equal radio time for an overseas broadcast. This to apply, presumably, to the Republican and other parties also.

If that order had stood, the consequences would have been too ghastly for the Democrats to contemplate. It would have meant that the camouflage picturing the President's campaign talks and actions as piously nonpartisan, permitting him to make use of War and Navy Department facilities at will to "report" to the men and women in uniform, would be ripped off, and that those running against Mr. Roosevelt for the Presidency would not be forced to continue at an unfair and un-American disadvantage.

The perturbation that must have filled the heaving breasts of the New Dealers when the order was issued was, however, quickly abated. General Headquarters went into high gear. There could have been no speedier action on the part of the higher-ups if the Germans had been at the Potomac.

To the ramparts rushed the Acting Secretary of War, John J. McCloy, fortified, one may imagine, by word from the White House. He countermanded the ruling in tones of lofty arrogance that only a New Deal stooge could be expected to muster.

"It has just been called to my attention," he stated, "that a decision was made by an Army agency to grant time to the Socialist Party for an overseas rebroadcast to troops on the basis of that party's contention the President's report at Bremerton was a 'political address' within the meaning of title V of Public Law 277. I have reconsidered this decision."

Note that perpendicular pronoun. Not the War Department, but "I," Mr. Roosevelt's man temporarily occupying the Secretary's seat, reverses the decision. Note also that the President's speech at the Navy Yard is carefully termed a report and not a speech at all.

The McCloy statement is typical New Deal mailed-fist stuff, delivered in characteristically arrogant New Deal fashion.

The Commander in Chief, in effect, has ruled that his own speech was not political. How convenient.

As the Bremerton speech, with its carefully prepared stage setting, is now officially held to be nonpolitical, all future addresses delivered by Mr. Roosevelt of a similar nature—and with the same trappings of warships, naval guns, military escorts, and so on—presumably, can be considered nonpolitical.

If his opponents are to be denied equal use of broadcast facilities, there seems very little chance for the troops oversea to hear any voice but the President's—as Commander in Chief, of course.

This seems to us the worst kind of poor sportsmanship. Mr. Roosevelt as a candidate can talk where and when he pleases and drum up votes to his heart's content. But it is not fair to cloak his campaign speech making in the official garment of nonpartisanship, while those opposing him are deprived of equal facilities to reach our service people.

The New Dealers may be rubbing their hands in glee at the reversed ruling, but it is one—if they would only consider for a moment the devotion of the American people to fair play—that is likely to plague them to the end of this campaign.

The Bob-Tailed Ballot and Pensions for Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the question involved in discussing the bob-tailed ballot and the State ballot is whether one believes that the servicemen are entitled to vote for the county, State, and National tickets or whether the servicemen are to be allowed to vote only for Federal officers; that is, President and Members of Congress.

When the so-called Congressman's pension bill, which was sponsored by the same administration and slipped through the House by the present administration, became law after the President's signature, the people justly rose up and objected to the congressional pension plan because it was legislation for the few at the expense of the many. The people would not accept this legislation and compelled the Congress to repeal it. If the New Deal congressional-pension plan had included State and county officeholders, and the general public, including the aged, getting from $9 to $12 per month at the present time, it might not have received quite as much public disapproval. Although the President was to get some $37,000 per year for life and although many Members of Congress had not been Members long enough to even come under the bill, many Members of the New Deal smear brigade tried to use this legislation against Congressmen even after the New Deal bigwigs had put it through in the first place. This New Deal cunning did not fool the people in 1942. This same group are trying to criticize Members of Congress for not supporting the bob-tailed ballot.

The opposition to the bob-tailed Federal vote ballot was based on position that a serviceman not only had a right to vote for Federal office seekers but also for the State and county office seekers as well. He was and is entitled to a full voting franchise—and not one-third of a voting privilege or only the opportunity to vote for the Federal office seekers. The congressional pension New Deal plan was for Federal officers the same as the bob-tailed ballot was for the benefit of Federal office seekers.

No fair minded man would or should expect anyone to support a bill that would give the serviceman or any other group the opportunity to vote only for himself. The State legislatures have had special sessions and made arrangements so that the servicemen cannot only vote for Federal offices but also State and county offices. The P. A. C.'ers will not deceive the people on this subject any more than they are going to deceive them on many other subjects.

This administration can praise the bob-tailed ballot all they may desire, but when the servicemen find they are paying 4 percent on loans, and the New Deal darlings are paying only 3 percent on more generous loans, they may figure the bob-tailed ballot approach was not entirely supported for the benefit of the servicemen. With all this talk about the bob-tailed ballot, just ask a New Dealer why this administration charges the veteran one-third more interest than the nonveteran pays on a less sound loan. Let them explain why the veteran will pay $240 annually on his loan and the New Deal darlings pay only $180 on a loan of the same amount that is less sound besides.

Oklahoma Agriculture Faces the Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following talk given by Dr. Henry G. Bennett, president, Oklahoma A. and M. College, on the WKY farm program, Tuesday, August 8, 1944, Oklahoma City, Okla.:

Oklahoma is honored to have as its guest on this occasion the distinguished Assistant Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, and we are deeply appreciative of the thoughtful and stimulating address which he has given us today. I am glad to be here and to have a small part in this significant inauguration of a public-service program by this great radio outlet. All citizens of Oklahoma should appreciate this new venture of WKY for the benefit of Oklahoma farmers.

As one whose privilege it has been to serve Oklahoma agriculture for many years, I should like to discuss with you for a few minutes the subject Oklahoma Agriculture Faces the Future.

Before attempting to sketch the broad outlines of what the future can be for agriculture in Oklahoma as I visualize it, I deem it essential that we take stock of the present—to find in the living accomplishments of agriculture today the pattern of things we may reasonably expect to fashion together in the years which are ahead.

Oklahoma farmers have met the challenge of world conflict and national emergency in a magnificent manner. In spite of hardships, in spite of manpower shortages and critical scarcity of vital machinery and materials, and notwithstanding gloomy prophecies of failure, Oklahoma agriculture has not only met but exceeded every quota and goal set for it. The war on the Oklahoma farm front from the days of Pearl Harbor until now has gone well and will continue to go well until complete victory is achieved.

Let us look at the record of achievement written by Oklahoma farmers and their families in the year 1943.

In beef production the record shows that the total weight of cattle marketed was in excess of 946,000,000 pounds. Exclusive of requirements of Oklahoma's two and a quarter million civilians, we produced a surplus sufficient to feed more than 4,000,000 soldiers, allowing 130 pounds per soldier.

A like study of pork production shows that Oklahoma produced a pork surplus sufficient to feed 6,457,000 soldiers for a year.

Oklahoma's poultry flocks in 1943 produced nearly 126,000,000 dozens of eggs, a quantity large enough to supply the needs of our civilian population, and in addition, sufficient to supply the needs of 1,880,000 soldiers for a year at a rate of 35 dozen for each soldier.

Poultry production in Oklahoma for the same period provided a surplus of meat sufficient to feed 391,000 soldiers for a year, at a rate of 60 pounds per soldier.

In the matter of wheat I have the estimated figures for 1944 which disclose that we may reasonably expect to provide enough wheat flour to care for our two and a quarter million civilian population, and in addition have a surplus sufficient to provide a loaf of bread per day for 365 days for 8,984,000 soldiers.

Our State cotton acreage reported July 1 this year was 1,600,000 acres. Indications are that our production will be 750,000 bales. It has been calculated that we may expect 285,000 bales of cotton above State needs. This surplus cotton will supply 2,856,000 soldiers at a rate of 50 pounds per man.

In dairy production the records disclose that in 1943 the total production of milk on Oklahoma farms was 2,693,000,000 pounds. The surplus for the State above civilian requirements was 1,012,000,000 pounds, or 128,500,000 gallons. This surplus was sufficient to supply 1,713,000 soldiers for a year at a rate of 75 gallons per man.

I think these figures amply attest the wartime achievements of our Oklahoma farmers.

Never in history has the civilized world been so dependent on American food. Only hard, unremitting toil produces food. There is no other way. The record of American agricultural production in the war years is a magnificent tribute to the American farmer and livestock producer and in this winning effort Oklahoma has played its full and proud part. We can never discharge the debt of gratitude we owe to the farmers of America and of Oklahoma and their families. I think no one will dispute that they have worked longer hours, in fair weather and foul, than any other group of our citizens.

So much for the present and its accomplishment. What of the future and its promise? What policies can we reasonably and confidently set up for agriculture in Oklahoma in the post-war years? What goals are desirable and possible of attainment?

We hear a great deal these days of post-war planning. The uppermost thought in the minds of all thinking persons is the victory we shall surely achieve in the great conflict in which we are now engaged and then what is going to happen when war ends.

I am of the belief that in planning the future of agriculture we cannot limit ourselves to a consideration alone of agriculture's specific problems but we must embrace the larger issues as well. The troubles of agriculture must be attacked in relation to our total national and international economy. The future prosperity and progress of agriculture depends on how successfully we resolve broad national and international problems.

More specifically, I do not believe that agriculture can prosper unless we see to it that in post-war America and in post-war Oklahoma there shall be work at fair wages for all who want it. It is estimated that between fifty-five and sixty million employable men and women will want jobs after the war. This is a tremendous challenge to our economy, our form of government, and our way of life, but I have complete faith that we will successfully meet the challenge. The problem of employment will not be a temporary one—for a year or 2 years following the cessation of hostilities. Our plan must be to keep our people employed at progressively higher levels of living.

We have seen demonstrated, and the figures I have earlier quoted, attest what Oklahoma can do in an economy geared for war. We have likewise seen demonstrated what our people will purchase and consume when purchasing power is present. Full production and full purchasing power must be our uncomprising determination and goal for post-war achievement.

War has demonstrated that it is physically possible to employ all of our employables in this country and in this State. In commenting on this fact, Stuart Chase says: "If it is physically possible it's financially possible." In this opinion I concur, and I believe it can be done within the present framework of our economy and under our form of government.

How can we in Oklahoma guarantee a continuance of our wartime purchasing power by all our people when the war ends? Agencies of the Federal Government will no doubt take steps to aid in universal employment, but there are certain things which we can and must do in Oklahoma if we are to maintain our present population and provide for future expansion.

It is within the knowledge of all of us that Oklahoma in past years has been a producer of raw products largely for export. Cotton, which has been our major crop, is almost entirely exported from the State. The same has been true of wheat, beef cattle, and most of our agricultural products. In the main the profit-taking from the fruits of our labor and soil has not been taken by Oklahomans.

Our raw cotton, for example, has been shipped to the southeastern and New England mills, there to be fabricated into usable goods and shipped back to the Oklahoma retail market to be sold at a price which contains a handsome profit for the enterprisers of other States and which pays the wages of laborers of other States. Unquestionably these benefits should inure to Oklahoma citizens.

With the exception of the products of one Oklahoma cotton mill, not a towel, not a yard of shirting, domestic linens, or even the coarsest type of denim for work garments comes from Oklahoma spindles or looms. Yet, this one cotton mill located at Sand Springs, Okla., has been an outstanding success.

The same is true with the wood produced in Oklahoma, and with hides and the like. We ship our leather to St. Louis in the form of raw hides at the lowest price and import them as finished products. The profit from Oklahoma hides is taken in the main by the manufacturers of leather goods in Missouri, Illinois, and other States. The employment created by the manufacture of these goods is made available, not to employable citizens of Oklahoma, but to those of other States.

Oklahoma has a favorable climate for manufacturing. It has available raw products. It has vast reserves of power—oil, gas, coal, and water. It has capital. It will have in the post-war years an ample reserve of labor at all levels of essential skills.

Let us plan to bring to Oklahoma an industrial expansion which will balance and go hand in hand with our great basic industry, agriculture. This balance between agriculture and industry will guarantee a market for our raw products, employment of our labor, profitable use of our capital and will give us a healthy and prosperous economy. The solution of our economic problems is largely in our own hands.

Much of our thought and work for the future in Oklahoma agriculture must of necessity be concerned with Oklahoma problems, Oklahoma farms, and Oklahoma citizens. But we cannot afford to be disinterested in the relation between international economy and agriculture.

I believe there should be international cooperation in matters economic for the mutual benefit of all. I believe there should be more international trade. This would entail a diminution of trade barriers and tariff walls. It would entail a conception of strong, economically self-sufficient nations, producing the things and rendering the services inherent in their lands, their locations, their climates, their resources, and their peoples. It would comprehend a trade in surpluses among the neighbors of the world community. Let us not forget that if we wish to export our surpluses we must be willing to accept imports of other commodities to pay for them. Our policies on international trade will affect our acreages of cotton, wheat, and tobacco as we produce more of these than we can consume. The effect of expanded international trade will stimulate industry, and this has a direct impact on what happens on our farms—by the increase in employment and other factors supporting and strengthening the farmers' market.

With a sound and prosperous national and international economy we can view the future of Oklahoma agriculture with confidence. Before concluding my remarks here I would like to make a few suggestions for Oklahoma agriculture in the future.

First is the matter of the conservation of our soil. Oklahoma, in common with all American States, has permitted her soils to be depleted somewhat by an unwise land-use program and cropping system. But an intelligent citizenship has discovered this evil in time and set about plans for correcting the mistakes of the past. Oklahoma farmers and those who work with them now have the deep conviction that our agricultural lands are not properties to be mined but are priceless resources to be cherished and protected into perpetuity.

Some people who should know better have advertised the State unfavorably and intimated that the fertility of Oklahoma soil has gone forevermore. The record of production in Oklahoma in the current year 1944 is the best answer to such detractors. More than 85,000,000 bushels of wheat of the highest quality, an all-time record for the State; the best corn crop and forage crop in 10 years now awaits the harvest; a cotton crop which bids fair to be a new record for production per acre is now beginning to mature. You can't speak of production this year in Oklahoma without speaking in superlatives. Will Rogers once said that you could be safe in exaggerating about Oklahoma because if anything wasn't true today it would be tomorrow.

The citizens of no State in the Union are taking the problems of soil conservation more seriously than in Oklahoma. The greatest soil-conservation clinic ever held in America was held in Oklahoma City this spring. Its results are being felt in every nook and corner of the State. Soil-conservation meetings are being held in practically every county and are being attended by farmers, businessmen, and landowners in large numbers. More than 60 soil-conservation districts are now in operation and others are in process of organization. Hundreds of thousands of acres of land are being put under the best-known soil-conservation practices.

I think that within less than 25 years from today Oklahoma will be a model for the United States and the world of what citizens cooperating can do to build up, conserve, and properly use the lands of the State. We are on the way. Bankers, businessmen, newspapermen, the radio stations, everybody working together have made this progress possible.

An editorial in the Oklahoma City Times a few days ago told of an Oklahoma editor who had bought a poor farm in his county with the plan of bringing it back to fertility and use. I wonder if 10 men in every county in Oklahoma would band themselves together for the purpose of each buying a farm consisting of approximately 160 acres of the poorest and most eroded land that can be found in their respective counties. The purpose would be to rebuild and restore them to use through the best-known conservation measures. A joint farm manager could be employed, and I am making bold to pledge to any such group of patriotic Oklahomans the wholehearted cooperation of every farm agency at our disposal. A relatively small investment would not only bring good dividends but in the long run restore to use land for future generations untold.

In our plan for Oklahoma agriculture we must see to it that farm income is brought to a level where the rural standard of living will more nearly be equivalent to that enjoyed by persons living in town and engaged in other occupations. The real goal of a farm family should be not a parity of prices only but a parity of income as well.

Our plan should be designed to remove many of the unnecessary discomforts of farm life. Agriculture which is, year by year, being made more attractive to the young people of our State through the Future Farmers of America, the Future Home Makers of America, and 4-H Club activities must be made more attractive still so that farming as a way of life will appeal to more and more of the farm youth of our State.

The movement for bringing the benefits of electricity to the farms of Oklahoma must be encouraged until the most isolated farm has been reached.

The development of rural schools in Oklahoma has been marvelous, but they must be made better still. There must be no discrim-mation in rural grade and high schools. We must work for a continuing improvement until the children of rural Oklahoma have real equity of chance with their neighbors in the cities.

We must see that medical and hospital service for the rural citizens of Oklahoma shall be as adequate as it is at present for our largest cities. The domestic form of government finds any other arrangement intolerable.

Year-round roads must be provided for every farm community making day-to-day farm-to-market travel possible. Much has been done in this direction and much can be done in the near future.

Building codes for farm housing and sanitation are as necessary as for our largest cities and must be encouraged. The rural and city slums alike must be eliminated.

The cooperative marketing of all crops and products should be encouraged in the years ahead because this means a better character of product at a fairer price to consumer and producer alike.

Mechanized machinery in the years ahead will banish from the farms the exploitation of family labor and grant to farmers and their families more educational, social, and recreational activities.

Farming is a way of life and the family-size farm must continue to be in the majority. No nation can long continue to be great which has made it impossible for ambitious young men and women to own and operate their own farms. A nation is no greater than its agrarian policy and we must have a contented and prosperous farm people, and they cannot be contented unless they see a possibility of home ownership for themselves and their children.

We must seek a continuing improvement of land-tenure conditions and a strengthening of the position of agricultural laborers.

The Social Security Act should be amended so that the benefits of old-age and survivors' insurance and all social-security benefits will be made available to all agricultural people, including the self-employed.

The war has demonstrated to America anew that agriculture can increase production in almost any category. In the past the vast production from the farms of America has been used almost entirely for food, feed, and clothing. The problem of the future is to find new uses for agricultural products, surpluses, and wastes. This problem has been attacked by the farm chemists of America and already modern miracles have been performed. To enumerate some of these is but to suggest what is within the knowledge of everyone. Alcohol from citrus waste and small grains; rubber from grain alcohol; plastics of unbelievable varieties and strengths from agricultural residues; starch and carotene from sweetpotatoes; the replacing of imported oils with modified domestic oils from peanuts and soybeans; industrial products from milk proteins; the development of penicillin. This is to mention but a few of the recent and current achievements of agricultural science. This is only the beginning. Those who attended the farm chemurgic clinic for the Southwestern States held in Oklahoma City this year saw first hand many of these miracles and saw ahead a vision of things that are yet to be.

One of the most recent discoveries of chemurgy, and one of the most significant for Oklahoma agriculture is by a group of scientists who predict that sugar shortages in the future will be no longer possible in America because of the feasibility of crystallizing sugar from the juices of the sweet sorghum which is grown all over the country south of Illinois.

In the realization of our plan for the future all groups and agencies, institutions, and organizations must work together. The farm hour inaugurated here today by WKY will be of incalculable value in the campaign. Its function will be to challenge, to encourage, and to inform. All Oklahoma should be grateful to this great facility for the conception and effectuation of this splendid public service.

When Labor Does It, They Call It a Strike

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the following article from the August 17, 1944, Washington Post indicates several facts:

SENATOR BANKHEAD URGES COTTON SALE HOLIDAY

In one of a series of moves intended to force cotton prices upward, Senator BANKHEAD (Democrat, Alabama) urged producers yesterday to hold their crop off the market until parity had been reached.

Telegrams to governors, commissioners, and farm bureau presidents, enlisting their aid, followed a call by BANKHEAD and cotton manufacturers on War Mobilization Director James F. Byrnes.

"Justice Byrnes assured the full cooperation of his office in carrying out the directive in the so-called Bankhead-Brown cotton amendment that cotton prices and other farm prices be raised to parity," BANKHEAD said in a statement.

At an earlier conference with a group of cotton manufacturers, BANKHEAD said a number of specific steps intended to raise cotton prices were considered, including the use of 97½ to 100 percent of parity loans in the event that other action contemplated does not accomplish the result.

It was agreed, he said, that the O. P. A. should finish the task of revising and establishing adequate textile ceilings under the Bankhead-Brown amendment as soon as possible. There is no question that this would remove a factor which has had a depressing effect upon the cotton market.

BANKHEAD added he would meet next week with representatives of the cotton merchants looking to their cooperation in an over-all program.

He said he was requesting the Governors and other southern leaders to urge producers to keep their cotton off the market "until prices approximate parity, which is from $6 to $8 per bale above the new 1944 loan rates."

BANKHEAD said the mill representatives were "in full accord" with the proposals.

Mr. Speaker, the first fact brought to mind is that if the cotton farmers follow the advice to hold their crop off the market they will be doing exactly what they have been criticizing the labor groups for doing.

The second fact is that after all the vociferous outbursts at the National Democratic Convention, at which the Republicans were accused of ruining the Price Control Act, it is apparent that the only concession made in the name of agriculture was to the cotton block. This is one more sop to the South. The American people are to pay one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty million dollars more a year for cotton clothes due to this amendment.

Third, it was heartening to read that Justice Byrnes assured the full cooperation of his office in carrying out the directive in the so-called Bankhead-Brown cotton amendment. This is more than Mr. Byrnes has done so far as pork products are concerned as he has allowed the porkers to sell at 50 to 60 percent of parity even though the same act has provided a 90 percent parity floor. The fact that eggs sold day after day for 10 cents per dozen below the legal price evidently did not receive his personal attention either.

Fourth, the Wisconsin dairyman continues to milk his cows and maintain his milk production although his southern friends get a 50 percent to 80 percent greater subsidy than the Wisconsin farmer. The Wisconsin dairyman maintains his milk production even though the Plymouth-plus provides 2 cents per pound less for his cheese than given Texas and California farmers. In fact he has a 5 cents per pound lower price due to 3 cents less on subsidy and 2 cents per pound less on the freight set-up, than that provided in some other States, and yet no one in Wisconsin, in or out of Congress, has asked them to keep their products off the market. The fact is the cheese men have been given orders as to just how much of their product is to be turned over for Government uses and is 70 percent of the make.

The fixed price of cheese is 21¼ cents per pound, though some of these other States with over a 5 cents per pound advantage, do not keep those Wisconsin dairymen from making every effort to furnish the food needed for the war.

No one has yet answered the question as to why more feed subsidy is paid in one State than is paid in another. No one will be deceived by the P. A. C.'ers into believing that the Republicans ever tried to ruin the Price Control Act. Many members of both parties have tried to get the O. P. A. and W. F. A. to follow the printed word of the law, and the spirit of the legislation in order that the war effort would be benefited. If these agencies would have followed this course, they would have made a greater contribution to the war.

In the meantime figure out why cotton is provided a 97½ to 100 percent of parity loans when wheat and corn and other so-called basic commodities are entitled to only a 90 percent parity loan. Incidentally explain why the production of cotton is being subsidized at the same time the administration is selling cotton so that the makers of insulating material buy it in 1944 for over $6,000,000 less than it is worth on the market.

Figure out or find out why under the guise of a drought, Virginia farmers in 1943 received two milk subsidies, and in addition received over $1,100,000 worth of free hay. This hay was given to the greedy as well as to the needy and the War Food Administration doesn't know whose cows ate the hay. Western and central United States farmers are still being pounded on the back for payments for the feed distributed on the basis of need during the drought years of 1932 to 1939.

While we may hear ranting against the New Deal, you can be assured that so long as these southern groups can ride the gravy train they will continue to do so. It is hoped that this gravy train hits an open switch on November 7. They may talk against the New Deal but patronage and pap keep them pretty well in line.

Many of these groups must figure that Governor Dewey is going to be elected President or they wouldn't be figuring out scheme after scheme during wartime to make more and bigger extractions from the United States Treasury.

The George Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted, I am inserting in the RECORD a letter to me and a letter to the editor of the Burlington Free Press written by Mr. Harris W. Soule, of Burlington, Vt., relative to the so-called George bill:

BURLINGTON, VT., August 24, 1944.

Hon. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PLUMLEY: I noticed on page A3649 of the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that you have caused to have printed Senator AUSTIN'S views on the so-called George bill.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter which I sent to the Burlington Free Press and which was printed in the Monday, August 21, issue, expressing a viewpoint contrary to Senator AUSTIN'S and yet one which is subscribed to by a large number of Vermont farm and labor leaders.

Very truly yours,

HARRIS SOULE.

BURLINGTON, VT., August 17, 1944.

To the EDITOR OF THE BURLINGTON FREE PRESS:

In Wednesday's Burlington Free Press an article quoted Senator AUSTIN as saying that the George bill (S. 2051) was a victory over the forces which would throw this country into national socialism.

One of the objectives of the bill is "to achieve full employment, rising standards of living, and effective utilization of the Nation's resources during the period of transition from war to peace and thereafter." After stating this worthy objective, most of the bill is set up to deal with the problem of unemployment on a State basis. There is very little in the bill which would indicate that the authors had any idea of promoting full employment at adequate wages. Shouldn't we concentrate our efforts to bring about full employment rather than to be planning on unemployment and trying to set up a more efficient W. P. A.? If there is any one factor which will throw our country into national socialism or some other "ism," it will be widespread unemployment resulting in a depression which will make the last one look like a Sunday-school picnic.

In discussing the bill before passage, Senator DOWNEY, of California, made a significant statement. I quote: "We are tremendously worried here at the idea of paying out $20 or $25 or $30 or $35 unemployment compensation. We had better accustom ourselves to paying the incomes in this Nation to all classes by which the aggregate income will be sufficient to take off the market the total products of employment." If the Senate had concentrated on ways and means of doing this, the result of their efforts would have been much more constructive.

In rushing through the passage of the George bill, the Senate did not consider the reconversion of agriculture. The production of food has been expanded to meet wartime demands just the same as iron and steel. If this country is going on a program of scarcity rather than full production, we'd better be making our plans to kill some more pretty little white pigs.

It would seem that certain special interests were in the saddle and riding hell-bent for passage of the bill before it could be thoroughly considered. Several Senators considered the bill inadequate and inadvisable and tried to get it recommitted in order that a more acceptable bill could be drawn, but evidently the "big boys" had ordered passage and so we see an important piece of legislation, which will vitally affect our post-war economic policies, railroaded through the Senate.

The bill is now before the House and unless freely amended, it will be totally inadequate to provide for reconversion from war to peace with abundance the goal, rather than scarcity.

Very truly yours,

HARRIS W. SOULE.

There's a New Deal Joker in This Set-up, Too

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer of August 29, 1944:

THERE'S A NEW DEAL JOKER IN THIS SET-UP, TOO

That the War Department's reverse play of last week, depriving President Roosevelt's opponents of equal facilities for addressing overseas troops during the campaign, would live to plague the New Deal crowd that instigated it, was predicted by this newspaper.

Quick confirmation of that view has been given by further War Department moves that indicate frenzied week-end attempts to cover up Friday's bad boner.

More of the same harassment is in prospect for the New Dealers, torn between their intention to give their candidate every advantage possible in his appeals for votes, and their fear that such an unsportsmanlike policy might react against them.

The latest ruling—always subject to reversal by the higher-ups—purports to grant equal radio time for political broadcasts to the forces abroad to the five major parties, including, of course, the Democrats.

The joker in the deal is the prior decision, made by Acting Secretary of War McCloy in his letter-perfect role of New Deal stooge, that Mr. Roosevelt's address at Bremerton on August 12 was not political.

On the basis of that edict, similar broadcasts by the President may be held nonpolitical and thus beyond the scope of the new regulation. Each of the parties may deliver their addresses to the servicemen once a week, but, in addition, the President in his cherished role of Commander in Chief, may make broadcasts of his own as often as he sees fit and with no similar oppportunity given the Republicans, Socialists, or others.

Obviously such a set-up does not dispel the present disadvantages afflicting those who are campaigning against Mr. Roosevelt.

It is contrary to all American concepts of fair play. No War Department cover-ups can make it anything else.

American Workers Can Neither Be Bought Nor Sold—It Has Been Tried Before

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, years ago some employers tried to tell those who worked for them how to vote. The result was a demonstration of American independence that wrecked the political future of many a candidate who was backed by the boss. When the boss went through the shop and told the men to vote for Jim White, they voted, if they voted at all, for Jim Black—sometimes not because they knew or supported him, but because they did not propose to have anyone tell them for whom they should vote.

Today, Sidney Hillman, still clinging to his foreign "isms" and his P. A. C., with a huge campaign fund at their command, which they have collected from workers through the check-off and other means, propose to buy an election by selling the votes of American workers to the New Deal.

By false statements as to their purpose, by false charges against candidates, Hillman and his outfit seek control of the Government. They never gave anyone a job in industry; they never met a factory pay roll. Yet, they propose to tell every man or corporation operating a factory, a business, just what he or it shall do, although they never have even suggested where the money to meet their demands is to be found.

Many good union men and women are getting onto Sidney and his schemes and will not be led around by the nose. That such is the fact is shown in one instance by an article from the August 1944 issue of the official publication of the Railroad Yardmasters of North America, Inc., which is as follows:

SOLD, BUT CAN'T BE DELIVERED

Now that the national political campaign is well under way, it may be well for all of us to face the facts, and one of these facts is that the American workman, particularly the union workman, is not an ignoramus. He is a man with a mind of his own, capable of looking out for himself. He does not need nor desire anyone, including labor leaders, to treat him as being just one of a herd. He resents the propaganda that the labor leader is going to deliver his vote. This is especially true today because the American workman is a far different citizen and voter than he was even 4 years ago. At that time it didn't make much difference to him who was President of the United States, Governor of his State, or even mayor of his city. Generally speaking he was out of work, which placed him in an irresponsible position. He was more or less socialistically inclined. He had nothing and, like all socialistically minded people, was willing to share it with everyone.

Today the American workman is employed, making big money, which automatically places him in a more conservative position than 4 years ago. He is now capitalistically inclined. He is a stockholder in the corporation known as America, through the purchase of War bonds. He is also a taxpayer for this corporation, through the payment of withholding tax. He realizes now more than ever before that the man who is President, governor, or mayor does have a lot to do with his well-being, and he is not going to place that responsibility into the hands of anyone but himself. Today he does have something to lose.

The present political campaign seems to be running true to form. Some of our labor leaders are again making deals with some of our politicians to deliver the vote of the rank and file of their unions. And true to form, some of our politicians are just fish enough to swallow this bait. But let me remind these politicians of a fact they may well remember. If these so-called labor leaders could deliver the vote of the rank and file, lock, stock, and barrel, as some of them claim they can do, a most dastardly condition would exist, as for instance: If the head of the C. I. O. could deliver the 6,000,000 votes of his organization to, we'll say, the Democratic Party, just because this party at the moment seems inclined to go along with the wishes of the leaders, then imagine what would happen at a future date if this mammoth vote could be delivered to a political party designed toward the overthrow of our Government.

Now let us look at it from another angle which also warrants consideration. The A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. are evenly matched numerically, each having around 6,000,000 members. If these two labor organizations take sides, one with the Republican Party and one with the Democratic Party, and we will say just for the sake of argument that each of them could deliver the vote of their rank and file to the party of their choice, they automatically become useless even to themselves politically. They are as useless politically as the man who is a Republican and his wife a Democrat. They both cast their votes for opposite candidates and place themselves in a position whereby they might just as well have stayed at home and not voted.

The average person when speaking of labor is inclined to think in terms of a few individual leaders. Labor is a great mass of working people in this country, organized and unorganized. These people are white and black. They are Catholics, Protestants, and Jews. They are Masons, Elks, and Knights of Columbus. They are fathers and mothers, bachelors and spinsters. They contribute to the Red Cross and community chest. They are of fifty-odd nationalities and have interests in the welfare of people in many parts of the world. They are nationalists and internationalists. In a word, they are American individuals with minds of their own. The fact that they or their forefathers migrated to this country to further their objective of individualism should be conclusive proof that there is enough intelligence in every workingman in this country to function individually without dictation by Sidney Hillman or any other labor leader.

It is an absolute insult to the intellect and independence of the American workman, whether unionized or not, to be treated as though he were a slave; something to be bought and sold at a price. The price that the labor leaders have for this "bill of goods" is patronage, not mainly for the rank and file, but patronage for these politically minded labor leaders. Proof of this statement is backed up by the fact that these labor leaders, who have been playing politics, especially for the past 12 years, have received some very fine political appointments. The reward to the rank and file for this political activity has been a complete split of organized labor, a condition of one union fighting another, not only politically but economically, which, to my mind, is a fine how-do-you-do.

When an economic group organizes politically, it forces those whom they oppose in a particular election to develop a policy in self-defense which may permanently be antagonistic to the best interest not only of the group, which in this case is labor, but of the country. Samuel Gompers understood this and pursued a policy which strengthened the labor movement, but at the same time preserved its American characteristics. He did not commit the A. F. of L. to any political party. Therefore, it is obvious that the vote of the worker, whether organized or not, carries more power when not committed to any political party but when exercised in accordance with the political desire of the individual worker.

American labor is not class conscious. It is country conscious. No American worker sacrifices his constitutional right to individual judgment just because he joins a labor union. The worker knows his interests and realizes that politicians are long on promises and short on performance. Rather than depend on an over-all selection of a political party by his union leader, he prefers to make his choice on a basis of known achievements. And he definitely resents any infringement on this American heritage—the right to vote in accordance with individual conscience and desire. Therefore, it should be quite obvious to all politicians that when any labor leader makes the assertion of being able to deliver the vote of his rank and file, just another "bill of goods" is being sold but can't be delivered.

Frankly yours,

MAURICE R. FRANKS,
Editor.

Hillman Takes Over New Deal—Farmers, Labor, and Business Must Meet This Issue

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, gradually the people of this country are becoming aware of the danger that exists in the pernicious activities of Hillman, Browder, and the Political Action Committee. The tie-up between them and the New Deal is obvious and the ultimate goal sought by Hillman and Browder is political power as a means to control our economic system.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to include therein a timely editorial that appeared in the September issue of the Farm Journal and Farmers' Wife dealing with this subject:

ONLY ONE MORE STEP

For long years people have heard and talked about the Red menace of communism. Most of us have had a vague sort of an idea as to what it was all about. Soap-box speeches in Union Square, minor riots in some distant city, a "pink" now and then in the public eye, were hardly enough to worry about.

It was not easy for an American to be disturbed, even when he was told that there are more Communists in this country now than were in Russia when the Red revolution seized power over that nation's 180,000,000 people. One could not believe that such a little minority could take over the United States Government.

Then everybody hears that Russia lately has been veering away from the Communist doctrines. Forgotten have been the wholesale killing and uprooting of the thrifty "Kulak" families who wanted to stay on their farms. Forgotten have been the wholesale murders of those who disagreed with the Communist dictatorship. Our minds have been more occupied with admiration for the gallant fighting Russians who have beaten down the German might in the East.

Meanwhile Red radicals, far from the war fronts, have been steadily penetrating into places of power in the United States. They have pushed into controlling offices of many labor unions, notably in the C. I. O. From behind respectable fronts they have erected propaganda organizations to befuddle and confuse the natural loyalties of Americans to American principles of freedom. Their key men have pushed into the radio and movies. Their writers review our books and distort the meaning of our news. They have sought particularly to prevent the foreign-born in the city masses from acquiring the Americanism which most of us absorbed at home and at school.

Steadily the Red and radical push has advanced in America. Some time back the F. B. I. submitted to Federal department heads the names of 1,597 Government employees who had been identified with Communist-front organizations. A few were fired; most are still holding positions. They will be found classified as chief economists, senior editors, senior attorneys, and on down. Further up they have sympathizers and collaborators.

These supporters of alien ideas are no small power in national politics. In New York they organized the American Labor Party. In 1940 this radical party cast 417,000 votes for its nominee, Franklin D. Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt's plurality in New York was 224,000; the radical front gave him the electoral vote of that often decisive State.

Now the United States discovers that a Russian-born radical, 20 years old before he came to this country, has become the outstanding political boss. Known as Sidney Hillman, this ruthless labor czar heads the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. At his command is a campaign fund of five or six million dollars, more than either national party organization will have.

Sitting in a rich suite atop a Chicago hotel during the Democratic convention, Sidney Hillman saw the Vice President of the Nation, Cabinet members, and Senators come to consult his wishes. Despite his outward support, he is generally credited with having helped the President to plow Mr. WALLACE under. Certain it is that Hillman vetoed the President himself on Mr. Roosevelt's second choice for a running mate, former Justice Byrnes, and compelled the convention to accept TRUMAN, the Pendergast protégé.

Will Sidney Hillman's Red minority become the dominant power in American affairs? They have but one more step to take—on November 7. Will farmers and business people, as well as labor, take their orders the next 4 years from these alien-rooted groups?

The corrupt machine bosses of the big cities are joined with Hillman in his drive for supreme power. The honest, independent Democrats of America are left without a party.

The deepest issue of the campaign is clear. Will Americans run America?

A Study in Stature

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me other Station WEVD, Wednesday, August 23, 1944:

The tides of history are rushing in upon us with bewildering urgency. Each hour, each moment is pregnant with the fate of nations, culminating either in a world sturdy in safety or consumed in chaos. At just such a time, the electorate of the United States is asked to choose its leader. Our country has grown in maturity, ready to take its share in world responsibility, deliberative and reflective. History is challenging and we will accept the challenge, in a manner worthy of the dead and the maimed who in fighting and dying have shown us the way. I repeat—and it is at just such a time—the electorate of the United States is asked to choose its leader.

It is significant to state that if our great allies, Russia, China, and England, were to hold elections now, the present leaders of those countries, Stalin, Chiang Kai-shek, and Churchill would be retained in office by overwhelming votes. As Quentin Reynolds puts it, they "may not know the game of base ball very well, but they know it well enough to follow the cardinal rules of the game which is—never remove a pitcher while he is pitching a winning game." Franklin D. Roosevelt is pitching a winning game.

We know the qualities we demand for the office of President—vision, imagination, courage, concern for humanity, humility. We want a man quick, and keen, and clean in thought and deed. We demand a man respected among his peers, a man at home in the White House and at home in the world.

We are asked to choose between President Roosevelt and Governor Dewey, to lead us from war to peace, from the manufacture of guns to the manufacture of consumers' goods, from induction into the armed services of our men and women to the orderly procession of civilian jobs for all who seek employment. We are asked to choose between President Roosevelt and Governor Dewey for the supreme posts of Chief of State, Chief of Foreign Relations, Chief Executive, and Commander in Chief. We are asked to choose between President Roosevelt and Governor Dewey to guide us in the intricacies of the international maze and to help us achieve our aspirations of a durable peace through world cooperation.

Let's measure the men, one of whom will occupy the highest elective office we the people offer. What sagacity, what breadth of knowledge, what leadership has Governor Dewey displayed? His most common comment has been "no comment." With Tom Dewey it is the case of "silence is the best resolve for him who distrusts himself."

We are asked to commit ourselves to the leadership of a man whose unhealthy fear of exposure restrains every public utterance. If he has a spontaneous thought or a devotion to a principle of government, he does not trust us to examine it. His form of wit descends to labelling the Commander in Chief's conference with General MacArthur "the President's holiday." His heavy-handedness in dealing with international affairs is painfully apparent when he lifted unsavory rumors about the Dumbarton Oaks Conferences and tried to give them the semblance of factual reporting, compelling Secretary of State Hull to make a categorical denial to clear the atmosphere of distrust Dewey created. He tried to inject a partisan note which was wholly uncalled for. He was cracked over the knuckles by Willkie who washes his hands of any obstructive Dewey tactics. Dewey masked his concern by speaking of "recent reports." A New York Times editorial said it was incumbent upon him to put his cards on the table and identify the recent reports. Of course, Dewey could not do so. His concern was a figment of his imagination.

I question also the clarity of his vision when I point to his previous noninterventionism. On the last occasion when he sought the Presidency, he said "nearly all of us are agreed that this country will not send men to fight in Europe"; "We must keep out of the war in Europe"; "The Republican Party is firmly opposed to our participation in this war." Apparently, Dewey's memory is very short-lived.

The job of President is too big for the man in the blue serge suit. He could have risen above politics in the soldier's vote issue. He could have helped 800,000 New York State service men and women—in addition to merchant marine men and Red Cross workers abroad—to cast their votes, but he feared a maximum vote and so preferred the obstructive soldiers' vote law to the simplicity of the Federal ballot.

What is the impress of his personality upon the people of the Nation? Have we felt that he seeks the Presidency because of any compulsion to serve? Has he made us feel that the needs of the man of the streets are his concern? Is he alive? Is he warm? Is he responsive? Does he inspire confidence? Does he compel attention? What forcefulness is his?

Do our times call for the dun-colored, burrowing, small-paced movement of a Dewey, intent upon his own protective coloring or for the stride, the tested vision, the resourceful leadership of President Roosevelt?

In word and execution, President Roosevelt stirred and challenged the people. He has vision. He has compassion. He could not operate in vacuum. He stated his theory of government so that each man, woman, and child could understand it. He said, when the whole country looked to him for salvation in the throes of its most desperate depression, "I see millions of families trying to live on incomes so meager that the pall of family disaster hangs over them day by day. I see millions whose daily lives in city and on farm continue under conditions labeled indecent by a so-called polite society half a century ago. I see millions denied education, recreation, and the opportunity to better their lot and the lot of their children. I see millions lacking the means to buy the products of farm and factory and by their poverty denying work and productiveness to many other millions. * * * It is not in despair that I paint you that picture. I paint it for you in hope because the Nation, seeing and understanding the injustice in it, proposes to paint it out. We are determined to make every American citizen the subject of his country's interest and concern, and we will never regard any faithful law-abiding group within our borders as superfluous. * * * If I know aught of the spirit and purpose of our Nation, we will not listen to comfort, opportunism, and timidity. We will carry on." The spirit and the purpose and the enthusiasm were there. They were translated into actualities by such measures as the bank holiday, the Securities and Exchange Act, the Wagner Labor Relations Act, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Frazier-Lemke law for debt-burdened farmers, the National Housing Authority, the social-security law, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which guarantees your savings and mine. The domestic crises that threatened to overwhelm a people is not easily forgotten nor is the man who dared to act.

Within the country Roosevelt worked to repair a shattered economy while from without reverberated the thunder of guns. With the Nation, divided and uncertain, half-aware of the danger yet clinging to the "splendid isolation," the President saw that danger clearly. In 1937, in Chicago, he said, "Let no one imagine that America will escape, that it may expect mercy, that this Western Hemisphere will not be attacked. * * * The peace, the freedom, and the security of 90 percent of the population of the world is being jeopardized by the remaining 10 percent."

It is well to remind my audience that Dewey was most vociferous in denouncing Roosevelt for his espousal of the cause of Russia. Dewey branded the recognition of Soviet Russia as "most unfortunate." He branded lend-lease to Russia as "fuzzy minded."

Reading all of Dewey's speeches now, and his speeches on the other occasion when he sought the Presidency, one gets the feeling of "confusion worse confounded." They abound in contradictions and reversals. His views are as brittle as glass.

He scoffed at Roosevelt's appeal for the production of 50,000 airplanes. He said the figure was fantastic and that we could not possibly produce that many airplanes. "It will take a plant about four and one-half times as large as our present plant. * * * It would take at least 4 years to accomplish this."

He had a rather Lilliputian idea of what American ingenuity and brains and brawn could accomplish. If he had such little faith in America, concomitantly we must have little faith in him.

Today Roosevelt leads a country to victory. A country was converted into an arsenal of democracy. The economy of the Nation that could so easily break in the emergency was preserved. Roosevelt has captured the imagination of all free-thinking peoples abroad. He is not overshadowed in the council of mighty men like Churchill, Stalin, Chiang Kai-shek.

These are the two men. History has already marked one for its pages. The other has chosen to be compared with him. It is not a happy comparison for Governor Dewey. The job of President demands the stature of a Roosevelt. A Dewey will not do.

Continuance of Lend-Lease Aid

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following United Press release:

F. D. WANTS LEND-LEASE AID CONTINUED AFTER NAZIS' DEFEAT

President Roosevelt informed Congress today that lend-lease shipments to the Allies reached a total of $28,270,000,000 on July 1 and urged that the program be continued after the defeat of Germany to insure a speedier victory over Japan.

Mr. Roosevelt's report referred significantly to the "ultimate" accounting of lend-lease and—taking a slant absent from previous reports—stressed that the program's value never could be measured "in any dollar figures." It can be measured "only in terms of the battles won, the millions of enemy troops killed and captured, and the hundreds of thousands of lives saved," the report said.

SAYS SUCCESSES DUE TO AID

In apparent reference to recent discussions on whether lend-lease could not be halted after the war in Europe ends, Mr. Roosevelt warned in his sixteenth report to Congress:

"We should not permit any weakening of this system of combined war supply to delay final victory a single day or to cost unnecessarily the life of one American boy."

Lend-lease has helped raise the prospect of complete victory "sooner than we had hoped," the Chief Executive said, pointing out that the $28,270,000,000 cost of the program thus far represented but 15 percent of all United States war spending.

"Until the unconditional surrender of both Japan and Germany," he said, "we should continue the lend-lease program on whatever scale is necessary to make the combined striking power of all the United Nations against our enemies as overwhelming and as effective as we can make it."

The present lend-lease law expires June 30, 1945, unless terminated sooner by Congress.

AMOUNTS LISTED

Mr. Roosevelt's report listed these principal recipients of lend-lease aid: Great Britain, $9,321,549,000; Russia, $5,931,944,000; Mediterranean theater (Italy and southern France), $3,070,829,000; India and China, $1,402,426,000; Australia and New Zealand, $1,011,885,000, and Latin-American countries, $171,970,000.

Actual lend-lease shipments, including some others to other countries, totaled $21,534,870,000 on July 1, the President reported, but this did not include other goods or services in transit or awaiting shipment under lend-lease.

Mr. Roosevelt again stressed that lend-lease is not a one-way proposition. Not only have the Allies supplied about $3,000,000,000 in reverse aid, he said, but they "have been called upon to give more in lives, in destruction to their homelands, and in the suffering of their people."

His report showed that United States lend-lease aid through the 3 months ending June 30 totaled $4,045,000,000, thus falling slightly below the record of $4,239,000,000 in the first 3 months of this year.

Shipments to the principal war theaters have included:

United Kingdom: Over 6,000 planes and over 9,900 tanks.

Mediterranean: 4,800 planes, 5,100 tanks and 73,000 trucks and other motor vehicles.

The eastern front: More than 11,000 planes, 300,000 trucks and other military motor vehicles, 339 locomotives, 1,640 flatcars, 934,000 miles of field telephone wire, and 325,000 field telephones.

Southwest Pacific: Almost 5,000 planes and almost 3,000 tanks.

Statement by Under Secretary of State Edward R. Stettinius, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement issued by the Honorable Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., Under Secretary of State and chairman of the United States representatives, at the informal conversations at Dumbarton Oaks on the general nature of an international organization for the maintenance of peace and security:

There has been some misunderstanding about the reasons for reticence in regard to our joint discussions at Dumbarton Oaks concerning an international organization to prevent war and secure peace.

The preliminary discussions which are now taking place there are exploratory and designed to reach a common understanding. Embarrassment would ensue to the conferring governments if piecemeal reports of expressions of views advanced from day to day were construed as representing unalterable positions or as having a binding effect. I am sure that anyone who gives the subject careful consideration will understand this.

It has always been recognized, throughout the whole history of the United States, that an expression of opinions in confidence is an indispensable prerequisite to successful procedure in the preliminary work involved in reaching agreements.

From the time of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 right down to the present, private discussions have always preceded public announcements.

In our national political conventions the committees hold public hearings but they go into executive sessions to draft the platforms of the parties.

In the halls of the Congress matters are referred to committees which hold public hearings and obtain the views of various elements, but the committees then go into executive session and draft documents which are submitted to the appropriate house of Congress. Such is the practice of the Foreign Relations Committee, of the Foreign Affairs Committee, of the Appropriations Committee, of the Ways and Means Committee, and of all the committees of each house of Congress.

The object of this procedure is to obtain a calm exchange of views as a contributing factor to eventual agreement expressive of the ideas upon which those responsible have been able to formulate a concurrence.

The conversations at Dumbarton Oaks are no different in this respect from any other conference except that in this instance it is a matter of international as well as of domestic concern.

The representatives of the other agencies of our government invested by this Constitution with authority over these matters have been and are being consulted and kept thoroughly informed of developments.

It has been agreed that the heads of the three delegations will join in issuing statements which will carry information about the progress of the discussions. These statements will necessarily be general in form. To go beyond this and describe the discussions in detail would be not only discourteous but improper in view of the fact that the representatives of other governments represented at the Conference must enjoy the opportunity to consult their own governments before "meetings of minds" can be arrived at.

It needs to be kept in mind that there remain to be held the impending conversations with the Chinese. It should be obvious that toward giving full consideration to all suggestions which may be advanced by the several governments engaged at this stage in the formulating of common proposals the participants in the present conversations should continue to maintain open minds as regards a common progress until opportunity has developed to discuss with the Chinese delegation the approach of their Government to the subject and to bring the views of all the delegations into a common alinement.

Before any binding commitments are made there will be full opportunity for public discussion. As Secretary of State Cordell Hull said so well at the opening of the conversations:

"It is the intention of the Government of the United States that after similar consultations with the Government of China the conclusions reached will be communicated to the Governments of all the United Nations and of other peace-loving nations.

"It is our further thought that as soon as practicable these conclusions will be made available to the peoples of our countries and of all countries for public study and debate."

Show-Down on the Home Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article written by myself which appeared in the Progressive of Madison, Wis., on Monday, August 7, 1944:

SHOW-DOWN ON THE HOME FRONT

(By JERRY VOORHIS)

We know now that when the Armistice was signed at the conclusion of World War No. 1 Germany did not recognize that she had been defeated. There were good reasons for this. Whatever the military situation may have been, the Germans knew that their great monopoly industries were in as strong a position as ever. They knew the methods that they proposed to use to form cartels with French, British, and American firms would be successful in throttling production in the other nations and could be employed by these powerful German corporations in preparation for the next war.

We also know, or ought to know by this time, that during the present war these same German forces have not been idle. We know that there are those people in America who will say—off the record at least—that "after all, Hjalmar Schacht is not such a bad fellow." We know Schacht has been spending a great deal of time in Switzerland and is very close to the so-called Bank of International Settlements. We know that the report of that Bank of International Settlements on post-war arrangements in Europe was hailed with joy all through Germany, but was very coldly received in the democratic countries.

To a great extent, then, the question as to whether America and her allies will really win the war or not depends upon what their policy is with regard to the great economic problems, especially in regard to monopolies and cartels. We are now fashioning the molds into which the world of the days after this war will be poured. The policies we allow to come into being now while the war is still in progress will inevitably have far-reaching influence in shaping the kind of world in which our children will live. There are many things which in the nature of the present circumstances we cannot do.

A MAJOR CAUSE OF WAR

For one thing, we cannot interfere with maximum production for the war. On the contrary, whatever is necessary to be sacrificed for that purpose must be done. But the time is already long overdue when we should most seriously consider the increasing power of domestic monopoly and even of international cartels in the economic structure.

There are two reasons for this. The first is that monopoly has proven a far more serious obstacle to all-out war production than any, except those in the very inner circle of the war program, realize. True, progress has been made and bottlenecks have been broken—in some instances, be it said to their credit, by men who have come into Government service straight out of some of the biggest monopoly corporations in the country. On the other hand, the power of monopoly not only remains, but has unquestionably been greatly strengthened as a result of war conditions and the necessities of war production.

Therefore it is imperative that we chart our present and post-war course with a view to avoiding that greatest of all dangers to free democratic institutions, namely, closely held, private monopoly power. Throughout the years America has prided herself on being a land of opportunity, a land of enterprise, a land where men with ideas could put those ideas into effect, build prosperous businesses, both large and small, increase the supply of available goods and benefit their country thereby.

The growth of monopoly power, particularly if it has international connections, spells the doom of such an America. I say these things because the whole purpose of monopoly is to gain a sufficiently great degree of control over production to control the output and the supply of a product. The purpose of such control in turn is to maintain artificial price levels.

The philosophy of scarcity which is inherent in monopoly can have only one result in the long run—impoverishment of the Nation. For full and unlimited production is the only means of increasing real wealth. Indeed international monopoly power was directly responsible for the scarcities which have caused us so much difficulty with regard to rubber, tin, steel, copper, and aluminum.

I could go further and show how it was that this philosophy of scarcity, restricting production in nation after nation, insisting upon the levying of higher and higher tariff barriers, parceling out world trade and carving up world markets into preserves which were closed to competitors—how these developments in the period after World War No. 1 laid the groundwork for the present war and were, along with the aggression of the Fascist countries, the cause of this conflict.

The effects of monopoly fall with especial force upon the farm population of our country. For years Americans have wondered why it was that agriculture received such an unjustly small proportion of the national income. But the reason has never been far to seek. Through the years agriculture has remained predominantly a competitive industry. By and large, only through the formation of cooperatives have farmers been able to protect themselves against serious declines in prices for their crops at every period of harvest.

SQUEEZING THE FARMERS

This has been true because thousands, sometimes millions, of farmers have been marketing the same crop at the same time, and because purchasers were therefore in a position to compel farmers to compete with one another in the sale of those crops for lower and lower prices.

Meanwhile, item after item which the farmers had to buy—tractors, farm machinery, fertilizer, feed, seed, even processed food products themselves—have had to be paid for at prices fixed by monopolistic control of the market. But for governmental regulation, the same thing would have been true of charges for railroad transportation. But for governmental yardsticks, the price of electricity to the farmer would have been an exorbitant cost exacted from him by the monopolistic power of private utilities.

Selling in a market, therefore, dominated by monopolistic buyers able to force the price of his crops far below even the farmer's cost of production, and buying in a market at prices controlled by the seller, again without regard to real values, it has been inevitable that the farmers of America have failed to obtain their fair share of national income throughout the years. This is the basic reason why farm tenancy has increased as much as it has in America, the basic reason why Congress attempts from time to time to wrestle with the agricultural problem without more definite long-run success.

It is perhaps significant that the very financial agencies—the huge banks and insurance companies—which are the centers of monopoly power in America, are most frequently the landlords of the farmers who have lost ownership of their land through the operation of monopoly in our American economy.

PUBLIC YARDSTICKS NEEDED

In his very able report to the Special Committee on Post-War Economic Policy and Planning of the Senate which is known as Senate Document 106, Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, includes a table which compares the total assessed valuation of the 48 States of the Union with the total assets of 34 corporations in this country having assets of a billion dollars or more.

It is interesting to note that the total assessed property valuation of the various States amounts altogether to $143,000,000,000 and the total assets of these corporations to more than half that sum, namely, $73,000,000,000. There are only six States in the Union which have assessed valuation greater than the total assets of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., which amount to $6,000,000,000.

Only 10 States have assets greater than the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the Chase National Bank, or the Prudential Life Insurance Co., all of which corporations have assets between $4,500,000,000 and $5,000,000,000.

The greatest nonfinancial corporation in the country, second only to the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., is the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, controlling assets of almost every conceivable sort, amounting in all to $2,200,000,000. The United States Steel Corporation is close behind with $2,120,000,000. The total combined assessed valuation of the States of Arizona, Idaho, Vermont, Wyoming, Delaware, Montana, and New Mexico fails to equal the assets of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, or the United States Steel Corporation.

I know about those soothing sentences which tell us that after all bigness is no crime, that huge corporations have been responsible for much of the industrial advance which has been made in recent years, that the management of these corporations is becoming more enlightened as time goes on. These ideas have lulled America into inaction long enough We are right up against the decision which will determine the future course of our country for centuries to come.

Either we are going to hug monopoly to our bosom and run up the white flag and say that the public interest has to be protected in some other way than by the free activity of truly competitive business, or else we have to face this problem and do something about it.

There are fields of business where monopoly is inevitable, indeed where it is the only sensible form of organization. These are the fields of public utilities, communications, and to some extent transportation. There is only one answer here, only one way in which the public interest can ultimately be served. That answer is the publicly owned yardstick.

Regulation has been tried and found wanting. And while I do not advocate that public agencies, Federal, State, or local, immediately take over the entire business in these fields of natural monopoly, I certainly do advocate that enough of them be owned and operated by public bodies to inject into the business the elements of true competition and of abundant supply at the lowest economically sound cost.

There are other fields in which monopoly has already grown so great that one finds it hard to believe that any agency other than the Government of the United States can be powerful enough to cope with the situation. One of these industries is oil, about which I have on numerous occasions addressed the House of Representatives at great length, but I wish to reemphasize the absolute necessity of action which can be effective in either protecting the opportunity of truly independent corporations to exist in the oil industry, or else can protect the public interest through government itself—by means of public ownership of pipe lines, for example.

THE BASIC DECISION

The record of the Congress so far on this matter is not one from which we can take much encouragement. Indeed, one of the last acts of the House before it recessed June 23 was to pass a bill completely exempting the huge business of insurance from all the antitrust laws. This bill was excused on the ground that the Supreme Court decision declaring insurance to be interstate commerce created a serious problem in the industry. But there were many other ways that this problem could have been met and solved, several of which were offered in the nature of amendments to the bill when it went through the House. These methods would not have had the effect of exempting insurance from all the antitrust laws.

True, the Smaller War Plants Corporation has been created by Congress and is now under Maury Maverick doing excellent work. But on the whole Congress has shied away from any of its forthright action which is required to reduce the power of monopoly. It has not authorized a real investigation of monopoly in the petroleum industry. It has let governmental policy through the Petroleum Administration for War be dictated by the major oil companies. It has not passed a resolution introduced by myself to make a thorough inquiry into this entire problem of the power of the major oil companies.

Even the question of pipeline ownership, a key to major oil company control, has been pretty much left alone. We have witnessed the war program build up the power of monopoly more than ever and we are now witnessing a situation where unless present tendencies are sharply changed, there will be nothing in the congressional program for the reconversion period which will be calculated to protect small enterprise and pull the teeth of monopoly and cartels.

PENDING LEGISLATION

Senator O'MAHONEY and myself have introduced legislation to require registration of all cartel agreements entered into by any American corporation. This has not been passed. Neither has my bill to make it illegal and an action in restraint of trade for the owner of a patent to refuse a reasonable offer for its use or to enter into a patent agreement which restricts production.

With regard to the disposal of surplus property, particularly property in Government-owned plants, the program so far has been to leave in the hands of Mr. William Clayton, a former Liberty Leaguer, almost complete discriminatory power to do as he sees fit. I have introduced two bills on this subject, portions of which I should like to quote to readers of the Progressive. One is H. R. 5082, which lays down a policy for disposal of surplus property in the following language:

"SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to dispose of all surplus governmental property in such manner as—

"(a) to secure for the Government and its taxpayers the maximum practical return from the sale of such property;

"(b) to cause such property to be of the greatest possible benefit to the greatest practicable number of citizens of the United States;

"(c) to prevent any such property being employed as an opportunity for profiteering by anyone;

"(d) to offer such property for sale, wherever practicable, in small enough quantities or lots to enable veterans, small business, farmers, and similar purchasers to have full opportunity to purchase portions of it.

"SEC. 3. All property having been declared to be in surplus shall at regular intervals be catalogued by the Director with the advice and assistance of the Board and suitable arrangements shall be made to disseminate such information in the widest possible manner throughout the country. Such catalogue shall contain as accurate information as possible concerning each item together with the price at which such item is to be sold to direct purchasers from the Government and the allowable mark-up for resale. It shall be unlawful to resell surplus property for any price in excess of the allowable mark-up."

I also have another bill, of which mention has briefly been made in the columns of the Progressive, which would require that before Government-owned plants could be sold, the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice would have to make certain that its sale did not further a monopolistic situation and under which the Smaller War Plants Corporation would likewise have veto power over such sales if in its opinion they would contribute to increasing monopoly power.

This bill provides that where a Government-owned plant cannot be sold without increasing monopoly power, it is to be leased for private operation on condition that its capacity must be used at least up to 75 percent thereof. I mention this legislation only to show two things—first, that there is before Congress a considerable body of legislation that would effectively combat monopoly power and that, second, Congress so far has not taken action in such legislation.

VIGILANCE IS VITAL

In my judgment, if we are really to win this war for freedom, this battle against monopoly and cartels must be won at the same time. Otherwise the world will drift into the kind of artificial scarcity economy which, in the period between the First and Second World Wars, condemned it to another blood bath.

We must not deceive ourselves. Already literature is being sent to Members of Congress urging modification or even outright repeal of the antitrust laws of the United States. The very people who talk about the preservation of private enterprise and free economy are demonstrating at this very moment that what they really mean by these phrases is the further freedom of a few monopolists to exploit the people and deny them full production, and to block the chance of any small business men to enter certain fields of industry.

Every true American must be vigilant not only in supporting the war with every ounce of his energy, but also in fighting this all-important home-front battle against monopoly and cartels.

Strange Change

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank C. Waldrop, from the Washington Times-Herald of August 14, 1944:

STRANGE CHANGE

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Most remarkable fact about the President's Saturday night speech from Seattle, insofar as Washington listeners were concerned, was not what he said, but how he said it.

The voice was still the voice of F. D. R.—but how changed. Gone was the old style silvery smoothness and easy flowing delivery. Instead, there was noted a slow, careful, and several times actually stumbling delivery that lacked punch and precision.

Sunday morning found this city a-buzz with curiosity as to what has happened to the gifted orator who once made his promises sound so good, so true, and so beautiful on the Nation-wide hook-up.

As to the content of the speech, the most significant passage seemed to be the revelation that insofar as F. D. R. is concerned, the American soldiers and sailors are fighting across the Pacific to restore intact to the other nations of the world the colonies they have lost to the Japanese piecemeal throughout this century.

There was also considerable curiosity as to what the President meant by his remark that "We were not allowed to fortify Guam" in the years preceding Pearl Harbor.

The official record as to Guam is set forth in full detail in Senate Document No. 202 of the Seventy-eighth Congress, second session. This publication, entitled "The Decline and Renaissance of the Navy, 1942–44," was prepared by Senator DAVID I. WALSH, Democrat, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs.

In that, on pages 4 to 8, the whole story of Guam unfolds. It is:

1. On December 18, 1919, the Joint Army and Navy Board recommended that Guam be "fortified and garrisoned adequate to its defense against any force that could be brought against it," but the Washington Naval Treaty of 1922 put an end to that idea.

2. On December 27, 1938, a naval survey board headed by Rear Admiral Richard Hepburn submitted to the Speaker of the House a long list of recommendations for naval development from Alaska to Guam to Florida. The terms of the 1922 treaty were by then far out of date, and, in fact, Japan had denounced the 1930 London treaty that followed it.

We were free to do anything we wished insofar as treaties were concerned.

3. As to Guam, the Hepburn report recommended $5,000,000 be spent not for fortification, but simply for harbor dredging and erection of a breakwater. Admiral William Leahy, then chief of naval operations, said that actual fortification of Guam to repel a major attack would cost $200,000,000 and nothing like that was in anybody's mind.

4. The House Naval Affairs Committee recommended the $5,000,000 Guam Harbor development, but on February 23, 1939, it was stricken from the list by a vote of 205 to 168 of the whole House.

The House was then overwhelmingly Democratic, of course, and if the Roosevelt administration had wanted anything done about Guam, it could have held the line.

But, discloses the WALSH report:

"After consulting with the President on this item, the House action was not changed by the Senate."

In other words, if F. D. R. wanted anything done about Guam, he didn't ever say so, and in fact, gave the Senate the nod to leave things alone.

Heroic Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article entitled "Heroic Poland," which appeared in the Boston Daily Record, Boston, Mass., August 29, 1944:

HEROIC POLAND

September 1 will be the anniversary of one of the most momentous and tragic days in the thousand-year history of Poland.

For it was on that date in 1939 when Poland, as the first nation to defy the aggressions of Adolf Hitler, was attacked by the Nazi hordes.

The Polish Government had rejected Hitler's proposal for a joint attack on Soviet Russia, and so World War No. 2 began.

Now, at the beginning of the sixth year of the war, Poland still fights on and the brave hearts of her patriots are cheered by the approaching victory of the Allies.

Much of Poland's war has not been fought in Poland.

Polish soldiers—refugees from Poland and others—have been trained in Russia, in the Middle East, and in Britain.

Germans, as the Polish Telegraph Agency notes, "are surrendering to Poles on every front."

There were Poles in Africa with General Montgomery.

Monte Cassino was taken by Poles, who are helping to drive the enemy up the Italian coasts.

Poles form a part of the Allied armies that are fighting the great battle of France.

The Polish Air Force, composed of 14,000 men in 14 squadrons, is fourth in size among the United Nations, and Polish fliers have shot down 1,500 German planes during the war.

Likewise, the Polish Navy has kept the seas and is larger than ever, with a cruiser, six destroyers, three submarines, coastal vessels, and a merchant marine.

And in Poland itself, where the struggle has never ceased, Polish guerrillas have been fighting steadily with sabotage, bombings, and wreckings; a home army which has replaced the original forces, trained and bivouacked in forests, has met the invaders in pitched engagements, and lately Polish defenders have risen up again within the walls of Warsaw.

With more than 500,000 in the resistance forces in the homeland, the Nazis have been compelled to keep three-fourths of a million troops immobilized in Poland, while on the other hand much aid has been given to the advancing Russian armies.

Moreover, there is an underground government in Poland—a shadow state with courts of law, industrial and agricultural departments, a parliament, and 30,000 civil service workers.

But Poland has suffered terrible penalties, too.

Approximately 5,700,000 of her people have been exterminated—2,500,000 of them Jews, thousands of them Catholic priests.

Polish lads have been executed for the crime of belonging to the Polish Boy Scouts.

Farms have been looted and the buildings burned, and all cultural institutions have been closed by the Germans—all colleges, high schools, and professional schools.

And, of course, the Polish press was extinguished long ago.

The services and sacrifices of the Polish people should be gratefully remembered on September 1 in all of the United Nations.

Even more should they be remembered at Dumbarton Oaks, where the great powers are in conference, and at the tables of the peacemakers when the last shots of battle have been fired.

What Do They Seek?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE W. ANDREWS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. ANDREWS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Dothan (Ala.) Eagle of August 25, 1944:

WHAT DO THEY SEEK

Somewhere in Washington there is an individual or group so ignorant or idealistic as to believe that the war emergency can be used to force the South to accept social equality and abandon its segregation laws and customs. This conclusion is justified by the recent War Department directive ordering abolishment of segregation rules and practices which heretofore have been observed in military camps of the South.

The new order already has gone into effect at Maxwell Field and, presumably, at Napier Field and Camp Rucker.

In simple language, enforcement of the edict means that white soldiers and Negro soldiers, white civilian employees and Negro civilian employees will be served from the same soda fountains, from the same restaurant tables, will share the same seats in motion-picture theaters, and will be forced whether they like it or not, to mix and mingle on a basis of social equality.

It is a dangerous order, enforcement of which is certain to lead to friction between the two races and destroy much of the progress the South has made in the promotion of racial harmony and understanding.

Even Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt concede that the war is in its last stages. Then why, at this late hour, should the War Department undertake to set aside social customs and traditions which the South has learned through experience are essential to racial harmony?

Does this order mean that the War Department has become a political tool of administration radicals who are concerned over reported Negro defections to the Republican Party?

Does it mean that agitators and meddlers are determined to stir up racial strife in the South at a time when this region is doing its patriotic best to fight this war to a victorious conclusion?

Or does it mean that this Nation's leaders are more concerned with bringing about a social revolution than with prosecuting the war?

We acknowledge that we do not know. But we do know that the South will not take this slap in the face without protest.

Benefits Available to Dependents of Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, a generous Government has sought to lighten the burden of the dependents left at home by the millions of men now defending in all parts of the world the principles for which we stand, and it is my purpose here to brief for the information of those dependents the provisions of the statutes which have been enacted. I shall treat of other benefits available to those dependents for whom the future has been darkened by the black shadow of death in a subsequent analysis.

SERVICEMEN'S DEPENDENTS' ALLOWANCE

This benefit is of especial interest to the wives, families, and other dependents of men and women serving in the armed forces and is available to a dependent of any enlisted man, for easy determination, any person serving in the armed forces receiving a base pay of $138 per month or less.

The law recognizes these three classes of dependents:

Class A. The wife, the child, or the former wife, divorced, of the enlisted man. Under this class, the monthly allowances are:

First. For a wife only, $50; for a wife and one child, $80; and an additional $20 for each additional child.

Second. For one child and no wife, $42; and an additional $20 for each additional child.

Third. For a divorced former wife, or wife living separate and apart from the enlisted man under a court order or a written agreement, the allowance shall not exceed the amount fixed by the court order, decree, or written agreement.

Class B. A parent, a brother, or a sister found to be dependent upon the enlisted man for a substantial portion of his support—less than 50 percent of his support. The allowance under this class is $37 per month, whether for one or more dependents, and is payable only if there is no allowance to a class B–1 dependent.

Class B–1. A parent, a brother or a sister found to be dependent upon the enlisted man for the chief portion of his support—more than 50 percent of his support. The monthly allowances are:

First. For one parent, $50; for one parent and one brother or sister, $68; and an additional $11 for each additional brother or sister.

Second. For two parents, $68; and an additional $11 for each brother or sister.

Third. For a brother or a sister and no parents, $42; and an additional $11 for each additional brother or sister.

The allowance for a parent is also available to the parent of the serviceman's wife, if such parent is actually dependent upon the serviceman.

The enlisted man's pay will be reduced by or charged with $22 per month if payments are made to but one class of dependents, and with $5 additional if payments are to be made to more than one class of dependents; but, if a written application for the family allowance is made by the enlisted man within 15 days after his entry into active duty in a pay status, the Government will pay an initial family allowance for the first month without a deduction from his pay.

Blanks on which to apply for family allowance may be obtained from the man's commanding officer. He should fill it out immediately upon induction, be especially careful to furnish all the information requested, and be particularly careful to see that all names and addresses are correct and legible (printed). Where the enlisted man fails to make an application the class A dependent may make the application instead, but he cannot be required to apply for allowances for class B or B–1 dependents unless it is his wish that the allowance be paid dependents in these classes.

CONTINUANCE OF BENEFITS WHEN SERVICEMEN ARE MISSING IN ACTION, INTERNED IN NEUTRAL COUNTRY, CAPTURED BY ENEMY

The pay of a member of the armed forces, officially reported absent for the reasons indicated above, will be credited to his account awaiting his return. Any allotments he may have made for dependents or for the payment of insurance premiums will be automatically continued for a period of 12 months, or until such person returns, or it is officially determined that such person is dead. If allotments had not been made, or if allotments made were inadequate for reasonable support of dependents and payment of insurance premiums, payments may be provided in sums not to exceed the amount the missing person would be entitled to allot to pay premiums or for the benefit of recognized dependents.

Dependents, upon receiving information from the War or the Navy Department that a person in the armed forces is missing, or has been captured, should immediately write to the office listed below for the branch of the armed service in which the man was serving—Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, as the case may be—giving name, rank, organization, and serial number; also setting forth the need for financial assistance, and whether or not the missing or captured person had previously made an allotment. If there is an allotment, give the number of the account:

For the Army: Office of Dependency Benefits, War Department, Newark, N. J.

For the Navy: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Dependents Benefit Unit, Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

For the Marine Corps: Commandant, United States Marine Corps, Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

For the Coast Guard: Military Morale Section, United States Coast Guard Headquarters, Washington, D. C.

The allowances stop when it has been determined that the missing or captured serviceman has died, or it is declared by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, that the serviceman is considered officially dead. Any benefits after that would be in the form of pensions, for which application would be made to the Veterans' Administration.

Assistance in claiming these benefits may be obtained from veterans' service organizations, the American Red Cross, or by writing to Congressman ERRETT P. SCRIVNER, 316 Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Outstanding Record in War Bond Sales Made by Junior Chamber of Commerce of San Dimas, Calif.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincere pride that I ask consent to include with my remarks in the RECORD a brief account of the work of the San Dimas Junior Chamber of Commerce in its sponsorship of the Third and Fourth War bond drives in San Dimas, Calif.

It will be noted that this little city was the first city in Los Angeles County to exceed its quota in the Third War Loan drive and the third community in the State of California to accomplish this purpose, whereas in the Fourth War Loan drive it was once again the first community in Los Angeles County to exceed its quota and was this time the second one in the State to do so.

The account which I am asking to include does not cover the Fifth War Loan drive, but in that case San Dimas had a quota of $100,000, but actually purchased $185,367 of bonds. This, too, was under the sponsorship of the junior chamber of commerce. Therefore I wish to include the following brief account of the work done by the junior chamber and to express my personal deep appreciation of this splendid service:

SAN DIMAS JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
San Dimas, Calif.

The San Dimas Junior Chamber of Commerce has just concluded an extremely successful year in sponsoring bond drives in that community. The junior chamber was the role sponsorer of the Third War Loan Bond drive, the Fourth War Loan drive, and are now formulating plans for the Fifth War Loan drive. The junior chamber was requested by the local War Finance Committee to sponsor these drives in San Dimas and by unanimous vote of the entire organization it was agreed not only to sponsor these particular drives, but all bond drives for the duration of the war. We feel that the least we can do to assist our fellow Jaycee members, friends, and relatives, who are sacrificing their lives for their country, is to assist in the war effort in every possible way. By our participation in bond drives, we feel that the organization is assisting in getting the much-needed materials to the fighting forces, and we are going to continue to assist in this worth-while effort in every way possible.

The committee to handle this work was set up early in the year and consisted of one general chairman, vice chairman, and subchairmen in charge of publicity, special events, and house-to-house canvass. Each subchairman had several members working under him and the committee structure proved to be highly successful.

Third War Loan drive: The Third War Loan drive in San Dimas was sponsored in its entirety by the junior chamber of commerce. The quota set for this community was $100,000. Breaking this figure down according to population, we find that this amounts to $37 per every man, woman, and child in the area. When we analyze the town of San Dimas we find that there are no industries in this area except the orange and lemon packing houses. This situation threw the bulk of the purchasing on individuals. San Dimas, under the sponsorship of the junior chamber of commerce, went over the top on their quota on September 22, or just 13½ days from the opening of the drive. Our efforts did not cease there, however, and we continued to actively campaign for the sale of bonds until the end of the drive. At that time, we found that we had sold a total of $137,828.50 or 37.8 percent over our quota. According to the records of the Los Angeles County War Finance Committee, San Dimas was the first city in the county to exceed their quota and the third community in the State of California to accomplish this achievement.

The following are the methods used in the Third War Loan bond drive:

1. Letters were sent to all orange and lemon growers in the area, urging them to buy War bonds. These letters were sent out to the growers accompanying their checks from the fruit exchange for their crops.

2. Letters were sent to all utility companies servicing this area, as well as chain stores, mortuaries, Los Angeles County, and individuals, urging the purchase of War bonds and a portion of their purchases being credited to San Dimas.

3. Personal contact was made with individuals listed by the United States Treasury Department as possible large purchasers.

4. The chairman of publicity kept in constant contact with the local newspaper and saw to it that suitable articles and advertising was placed in each issue of the paper.

5. Arrangements were made with the local Boy Scout troop to distribute Third War Loan pamphlets to every house in the area.

6. The distribution of this material was followed up by a complete house-to-house canvass of each home in the town by the local air-raid wardens, aided by Jaycee members who solicited orders for War bonds.

7. A talk was given at the San Dimas Service Club on the opening day of the drive by the general chairman of the Jaycee committee, who urged the whole-hearted cooperation of all San Dimas citizens.

8. A circular was prepared, with the names of all San Dimas men serving in the armed forces listed and with a message from the junior chamber urging the cooperation of everyone in the Third War Loan drive. This was mailed to all box holders in the area and was the subject of much favorable comment.

9. Personal contact of all business houses in town urging their participation in the drive.

10. Notices were printed in church bulletins urging cooperation in the bond drive.

11. Conducted a contest in the San Dimas Grammar School and awarded prizes of War stamps to the room selling the largest amount of War stamps and bonds.

12. Built a bondometer and placed it in a prominent place in town and kept it up to date, showing the amounts purchased.

13. Arranged for parade of Army motorized equipment, accompanied by Army band, from Pomona ordnance base. This equipment was on display in town for 1 hour and gave the citizens a chance to see what was being bought with their bond money. Much favorable comment was received from this parade and display.

14. Window displays were arranged in store windows and War bond posters were plastered all over the town.

Fourth War Loan Drive: The Fourth War Loan Drive was also under the sponsorship of the San Dimas Junior Chamber of Commerce. In this drive the quota was set at $75,000 by the State War Finance Committee. San Dimas went over the top on this quota on February 1, just 15 days after the opening of the drive. Once again San Dimas was the first community in Los Angeles County to exceed their quota, and this time was second in the State. We continued to campaign for bond sales and at the conclusion of the drive we had sold a total of $125,848.50. This total figure was 67.7 percent over the quota allotted us. This made the second time in succession that the little town of San Dimas had been the first community in Los Angeles County to exceed their quota. When we realize that Los Angeles County has a larger population than 36 States, then we begin to realize the tremendous importance of this record made by a town of some 2,700 population.

Methods used during this drive were the same as the preceeding one but with the following additions:

1. All local merchants were solicited by the Jaycee and an advertising fund was set up for suitable bond-drive advertising.

2. This time the house-to-house canvass of all homes in the area was conducted entirely by the junior chamber members.

3. Arrangements were made to have a Treasury Department official speak at the annual meetings of the Orange and Lemon Growers Associations.

4. A War bond show was sponsored by the junior chamber and proved to be highly successful. At this meeting we had the first Coast Guard man to return to the United States from the Battle of Tarawa, as guest speaker.

5. At our distinguished service award banquet, we sold War bonds totaling $7,000.

6. Placed War bond posters on all lamposts in business area.

7. Articles were placed in the Pomona Progress Bulletin and the Los Angeles Times, telling of the bond drive in San Dimas.

In addition to these activities, the San Dimas Jaycee urgently requested the purchase of bonds on December 7 Avenge Pearl Harbor Day and a sizable amount was sold.

We feel that through our efforts in these bond drives, we have aided the citizens of our community in realizing the importance of purchasing bonds and have also done our part to assist in the war effort. The community has gained Nation-wide publicity because of the records established during the Third and Fourth War Loan drives.

When we stop to analyze the importance of this project, to the San Dimas Junior Chamber of Commerce and its members, we can definitely see where it has molded us together into a bigger and better organization. New members served as many of the committeemen and as a result are now firmly established in the organization. A total of 42 members assisted in these activities and aside from the valuable experience gained, much personal satisfaction was derived in helping our county to sell War bonds. We have been asked to sponsor the Fifth War Loan drive and are now working out plans for that event. We intend to continue our efforts in stimulating the sale of War bonds just as long as our Government needs to sell them.

Respectfully submitted.

D. F. HOOPER,
General Chairman, War Bond Drive Committee.

Editorials From the Daily Oklahoman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROSS RIZLEY
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include two very timely editorials appearing in a recent edition of the Daily Oklahoman:

THEIR LEADER'S WARNING

These loyal supporters of Mr. Roosevelt who disparaged the St. Louis conference of Governors and denied that there was any necessity for such a conference and chided Governor Dewey for calling such a conference, are the very ones who ought to be approving the conference, if they sincerely believe what their own leader has told them. For it was Mr. Roosevelt and not Governor Dewey who voiced these grave words:

"To bring about government by oligarchy, masquerading as democracy, it is fundamentally essential that practically all authority and control be centralized in our National Government. We are safe from the dangers of any such departure from the principles on which this country was founded just so long as the individual home rule of the States is scrupulously preserved and fought for whenever they are in danger."

Those grave words of warning are the words of Mr. Roosevelt. To establish government by oligarchy it is necessary to centralize all authority in Washington. We are safe from oligarchy so long as government is not centralized. And government never can be centralized so long as the individual home rule of the States is preserved. Those are not the primary teachings of Governor Dewey and the St. Louis conference. They are the teachings of Mr. Roosevelt himself.

And since speaking those grave words Mr. Roosevelt has seen the Federal Government become more centralized than ever before in its history. He has seen Washington seize power after power that formerly reposed in the States. He has seen the States deprived of many of their most cherished rights. If centralization was a dangerous threat when he voiced that warning, it is an infinitely more dangerous threat today.

It is not necessary to mention the rights of States that have been taken away in the name of war emergencies. Even before a shot was fired the process of centralization was far advanced and sweeping onward. Long before Pearl Harbor and even before the sack of Poland Washington was telling the people of the different States whom they should elect to Congress and who should become their Governors. The war had nothing in the world to do with the action of servile Oklahomans in practically crawling to Washington to beg humbly for permission to run for Governor of their State.

If the supporters of the President really believe that he spoke the truth when he warned his countrymen of the threat to their liberties that derive from centralized Federal authority, they will refrain from disparaging Governor Dewey's effort to preserve the sovereignty of the States. Instead of criticizing him they will join in the effort to preserve this indestructible union of indestructible States.

TAKING OVER ALL PARTIES

While partisan Democrats deny vociferously that their party has been taken over by Sidney Hillman and his well-financed C. I. O.-P. A. C. evidence is multiplying every day that the Hannegan wing of the New Deal army is being completely submerged and supplanted in its campaign activities by the Hillman contingent.

Nor is that the whole of the picture. While the C. I. O. P. A. C. is issuing its orders to the Democratic organizations everywhere and leading the fight for the Roosevelt-Truman ticket, it is practically conducting the campaign for the election of the Republican senatorial nominee in Oregon and moving the seven heavens to bring about the reelection of Representative MARCANTONIO in New York. While MARCANTONIO may not be a Communist, he is universally admitted to be the nearest thing to a blood-red Communist that ever sat in Congress.

Certainly the C. I. O. P. A. C. is not a Republican organization, and possibly it is not as communistic as it has been charged with being. But who will say that it is Democratic? Nevertheless, it is making desperate efforts to select Democratic nominees all over the country, and it is issuing its orders to old-line Democrats by the hundreds of thousands. It has converted the Democratic National Committee into a political side show. It is making Chairman Hannegan an outcast in the very thick of a national campaign. And it is frightening scores of Democratic Congressmen out of their wits.

While belonging completely to no party, the C. I. O. P. A. C. is trying determinedly to control all parties, and insofar as the Democratic Party is concerned its control is hard to deny. Its real objective, of course, is control of the United States Government.

A Soldier's Letter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER E. BREHM
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, we have heard much talk regarding our 19-year-old fighting men and what they are thinking. I desire to quote from a letter from a private in the Infantry who has just returned from the battlefront to a rest camp and who had been previously reported missing in action. This message should spur each and every one of us to renew our oath of allegiance and fidelity to both God and man:

AUGUST 10, 1944.

DEAR MOM AND DAD: I haven't been able to write for awhile because we were at the front all the time. We're getting a short rest at present and it certainly feels good to have the tension relieved.

I can't really say much about it; I've had some close calls and I'm very thankful to have come through without a scratch. I pray several times a day and have all my trust and faith in God. The Ninety-first Psalm is my creed and I know that I have all the faith to protect me. If anything should happen to me, it would be His will, and not because I have not trusted in Him.

I was able to attend church this morning and I shall take communion this evening.

I am thinking of you all the time and try to guess about what you are doing. I hope that we can all be together again very soon. Maybe Germany will collapse when the Russians hit the border; I don't believe the war can last much longer but I may be mistaken.

I talked to some prisoners we captured the other night and found three of them were from Wien. They seemed almost like pretty nice guys and we talked quite a bit about music. That is we mumbled back and forth with the little German and French I know.

* * * * *

I still haven't had any mail but I think I shall get some in a week or so, anyhow. I'll write all I can and keep you informed as much as possible.

Don't worry about me but just pray for me and maybe this whole foolish mess will end soon. Sherman's famous words were certainly an understatement in my opinion. When I get home I'll tell you about it once and then try to forget the whole thing.

* * * * *

Naturally, I'm hoping that everyone there is feeling well and that we'll all celebrate Christmas or even Thanksgiving together.

Lots and lots of love,

I. W. C.

Segregation of Races at Military Posts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. NEWSOME
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. NEWSOME. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram:

MONTGOMERY, ALA., August 28, 1944.

Hon. JOHN P. NEWSOME,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

I am releasing to the press today the following statement:

"So far, I have had no answer from the President of the United States to my telegram of August 24, last, in which I protested an order of the War Department terminating segregation of races at a military post here. This I regret. The question raised is of such vital importance to the State of Alabama, it deserves immediate attention.

I made no reference in my telegram to any political implication, because I deemed such wholly unworthy of our Democratic Party. It is certainly to be hoped no political implications were intended by such an order. If there are such implications, then we of the South will find it difficult to hold the South within its traditional Democratic allegiance in the years to come."

CHAUNCEY SPARKS,
Governor of Alabama.

Truman Article Seen as Service to Nation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence:

TRUMAN ARTICLE SEEN AS SERVICE TO NATION—PUBLIC SHOULD KNOW ALL FACTS ON PEARL HARBOR, SAYS WRITER

(By David Lawrence)

Maybe Senator HARRY TRUMAN, Democratic Vice Presidential nominee, has unwittingly done the Nation a service by bringing on at this time a discussion of the true responsibility for the tragedy of Pearl Harbor—something that has been concealed from the public now for more than 2½ years.

When Senator TRUMAN wrote his article for an issue of Collier's Weekly magazine—published in the last few days—and made certain charges against Admiral Kimmel and General Short, he was obviously speaking with a background of confidential information obtained in his position as a member of the Senate committee investigating the war effort. Admiral Kimmel has indignantly denied the charges and innuendoes in a public letter, but the Missouri Senator insists that when the court-martial proceedings are held his charges in the article will be proved correct.

This raises at once the question of why the court martial has been delayed and what reason Senator TRUMAN had for taking the initiative in airing in a magazine article something that the Roosevelt administration has thus far so effectively kept from the public by postponing the court-martial proceedings again and again.

The official reason given for the delay is that it would be prejudicial to the war effort to try the case now. But the Republicans in the Senate also have been in possession of certain information about it and succeeded recently in forcing an Army-Navy board to begin an inquiry on what happened at Pearl Harbor. These proceedings, however, are secret and conclusions reached will not be available till after the Presidential campaign is over.

DEWEY HAS BEEN GIVEN CUE

Meanwhile, Governor Dewey, who has a bit of experience in prosecutions, might decide to try the Pearl Harbor case in public. Certainly Senator TRUMAN has given him the cue. For a long time Army and Navy officers, retired and otherwise, have been gossiping about the Pearl Harbor tragedy and have been asking many questions, as for instance:

1. Why were all our battleships in the harbor of Hawaii on December 7, 1941, instead of out at sea, and who in Washington gave the orders to keep them there, especially at a time of tension in the relations between Japan and the United States?

2. What admiral recommended that the ships be sent from Hawaii and what happened to the admiral who made such a recommendation, and was he relieved of his command at his own request or through the initiative of someone higher up?

3. Why, in view of the tense relations between Japan and the United States after the November 26 note was sent to Japan by the State Department and prior to December 7, were no mobilization orders sent to the fleet by Admiral Stark, then chief of naval operations, thus putting the fleet on a war basis?

4. Why was the report of Justice Roberts confined wholly and specifically to circumstances and events happening in Hawaii, and why were the official acts of commission or omission at Washington in the War and Navy Departments, respectively, excluded from the scope of the Roberts inquiry so that the public got only part of the story?

COLLATERAL QUESTIONS

There are many other collateral questions which a Congressional inquiry rather than a court martial could get at.

Inasmuch as President Roosevelt is running for re-election on the argument that he has been Commander in Chief of the armed services "for more than 11 years," as he expressed it in his letter to chairman Hannegan of the Democratic National Committee, the Republicans feel that they have a right to pin the responsibility for Pearl Harbor on the Commander in Chief who knew all the facts about our relations with Japan and was in a position to order the mobilization of the fleet or else to send it away from Pearl Harbor.

The American people, including the mothers and fathers of the more than 3,000 boys who were killed at Pearl Harbor, are entitled now to all the facts that Senator Truman had when he wrote his magazine article and to all other facts that bear on the tragedy.

Wings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. GRANT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. GRANT of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I take pleasure in inserting a poem which was recently published in the New York Times by J. Mitchell Pilcher, field clerk at Maxwell Field, Ala., who served with the A. E. F. in France, 1918, and the First Army Corps, attached to the Seventeenth French Army Corps, and who was awarded the Medaille de Verdun by the French Government:

WINGS

(By Mitchell Pilcher)

As fliers conquer space—the prophet's dream
Of travel through the air, living in time
Beyond world fringe—man courses "on the beam"
And climbs the clouds in cold and sultry clime.
Though sky be dark and earth deep drenched with rain,
He seeks the heights and races with the gale,
And rides the storm (fearless of death or pain),
While dark shores roll below sun-vapored vale.
The peaks attained by man's immortal soul,
Are reached by thoughts that mount with eagle wings,
Born of high dreams and living that is whole.
Girded with truth, freed from all sordid things,
On wings of Spirit man achieves the goal:
Forgetting self with Faith at the control.

Political Action Committee Versus Americans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD W. LANDIS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, it is our duty to protect that precious American heritage of liberty and opportunity created by the fathers of those men who now so valiantly fight for its preservation. In the coming election the American voters will have to make their choice between a New Deal party dominated by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee or a true American party. This C. I. O. Political Action Committee is dominated by Sidney Hillman, Harry Bridges and Earl Browder. I am sure the American people will not follow such leadership.

Because of the public resentment aroused by the partisan activities of this committee, I believe President Roosevelt will repudiate the action of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee before the election, but with the understanding that they will receive his blessings after the election. Others believe that in order to fool the voters the President and the "palace guard" of the White House will inform the public that they will repudiate Sidney Hillman and the P. A. C. after the election. This outfit has been repudiated within the ranks of labor—an article written by Philip Pearl in the American Federation of Labor News labels the C. I. O. as the strongest antilabor force in America today.

The P. A. C. is not going to convert politically the members of the American Federation of Labor, Railroad Brotherhoods, United Mine Workers, and other labor unions of America. The C. I. O. Political Action Committee cannot even keep the members of the C. I. O. in line to support such an un-American program. It is reported that Gary, Ind., C. I. O. steel workers local tabled a slush fund resolution because they decided to keep politics out of their local. Two C. I. O. locals in Utah quit the P. A. C. when they discovered that they were supposed to back New Deal candidates without listening to the pleas for support by Republican candidates. They did not believe in being told how to vote by anyone.

I was surprised to know that 28 union officials affiliated with the C. I. O. publicly supported Israel Amter who ran for Governor of New York on the Communist Party ticket in the 1942 elections. According to the report of the investigation of un-American activities, Israel

Amter is one of the original American Communists. His brand of Americanism is reflected in the following excerpt from a transcript of his testimony before a congressional committee:

Mr. BACHMANN. Briefly, tell the committee what you are going to do with the real estate and property, banks and churches, in this country when you take over?

Mr. AMTER. I think that should be clear from Mr. Foster's answer, that it is necessary to wreck them.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you owe any allegiance to the American flag?

Mr. AMTER. We regard the American flag as the British worker must regard the British flag—as a flag of the capitalist class of oppression.

Can you imagine these P. A. C. radicals getting control of our Government and wrecking the churches, banks, and property in America? One fact is certain, as long as I am a Member of Congress I shall continue to battle these forces which are trying to bore from within and from without in an effort to destroy the Constitution of the United States. No real American could do more; no real American should do less.

According to the latest report from investigation of un-American activities, Walter Frisbie, secretary-treasurer, Indiana State Industrial Union Council, has been affiliated with the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, a front organization for the Communist Party.

Powers Hapgood, another Indiana labor leader and a Democratic State committee labor adviser who is taking an active part in the Political Action Committee, was a member of the Communist Party, according to testimony given before the investigating committee of un-American activities, Friday, October 13, 1939, volume 9.

No; I do not believe the rank and file of labor in Indiana will follow the leadership of Hapgood and Frisbie at the polls in November. I do not believe the rank and file of labor wants to see Sidney Hillman an acting assistant President of the United States or Secretary of Labor.

This C. I. O. Political Action Committee will not only prove a boomerang for the C. I. O. but it will do harm to the entire labor movement in America. It is up to the rank and file of labor to repudiate this committee at the polls in November to protect and preserve the American way of life and posterity of our fighting forces when they return.

The Bridge of Hands to Victory—Pay-off

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARLE D. WILLEY

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an advertisement appearing in the Washington Post of August 28, 1944. The article was inserted as a paid ad as a public service by the International Latex Corporation, operating at Dover, Del., where material in aid of our war effort has been produced, and where the company has the reputation of providing good working conditions for its employees. The advertisement is as follows:

THE BRIDGE OF HANDS TO VICTORY—PAY-OFF

(By A. N. Spanel, president of International Latex Corporation)

The war of blood and roaring guns will soon be over and 9,000,000 fighting men will return to the ways of civilian life. They are the ones who sacrificed so much to preserve for us our freedom and our dignity as human beings.

Many of them will be as unprepared for peace as they were for war when war called them to the colors, but not for long.

Some of them are coming back with an unhappy estimate of the real contribution made by industry's labor in this global war and victory; but not for long. Every strike, every work stoppage had been vividly played up to them as planned sabotage, by the printed word, by official public utterance, and by the enemy.

It is the way of half-truths and propaganda that men's minds often hold false pictures while their very hands and bodies touch the demonstrable evidence of real accomplishment * * * the guns, the planes, the tanks, the ships * * * the very tools that help spell victory.

And what is the whole truth? There never was produced such a rushing, surging stream of weapons of war * * * never in the history of man. Every known science and every technology was harnessed by American industry to produce enough and on time.

Yes, American industry at war whose fabric is management and labor * * * with 25,000,000 laboring men and women * * * organized and unorganized * * * drawn like our fighting men, from every walk of life, gave of themselves in work, in sweat and in blood to make enough and on time a reality, and not an empty promise.

There have been deplorable stoppages and strikes, far too many of them with America at war. It has even been necessary, at times, for our Government to take over some war factories because their owners forgot our great and dire needs. At other times, workers, blind to our necessity, had to be pressed back to work. Inexperience, ignorance, illiteracy, greed. Neither industry nor labor were ever free from these. Nor mankind. Yet the American arsenal of democracy, with its 25,000,000 free men and women produced by day and by night so that our heroic fighters might have enough and on time.

Significantly, there have been fewer man-hours lost by war workers than by equal numbers of workers previously engaged in civilian production.

Enough and on time took on new meaning for industry and its labor in the global war. * * * for now the task meant supplying the weapons not only to our fighting men, but to our allies as well. England, Russia, China, France.

The guns, the planes, the tanks, the ships and the food * * * all these were made by industry and with free American labor that produced on rationed time * * * and in astronomical quantities. In freedom's cause, this was the great pay-off.

The price was not in profits earned or in wages paid. Nor in sweat or blood alone. Since Pearl Harbor nearly 50,000 workers died through accidents in the rush of speeding war work; the unsung, of the battle for production * * * 50,000 laboring men and women whose labors ended in eternity. They sacrified no less than their sons, brothers, and husbands, who fought and died on the battlefields of a tortured world.

As if this were not enough, and it wasn't enough, American labor was called upon to man a merchant marine * * * the ships that made a bridge of ships for us and for the whole free world. They were asked to deliver and they delivered, the guns, tanks, planes, and food * * * through oceans keyed with sudden death * * * through raging seas alive with the waiting enemy below and their death-pouring planes above. Clay pigeons were never more assailable than these human beings.

Little do we realize when we read it in our papers that when 4,000 ships roar out to invade our enemies, 3,500 of them are merchant ships manned by merchant seamen.

Since Pearl Harbor 6,000 of these brave men, they who manned our bridge of ships, these deliverers in more ways than one, are known to have died * * * 6,000 free, American workers, who, too, loved life. Compared to their numbers, more merchant seamen have given their lives in this struggle than any of our armed services have been called upon to sacrifice.

They also, are among the unsung. No color ads, to blaze their glory; only their deeds.

History will record that enough and on time became for American war industry and its 25,000,000 laboring men and women, a direction and a goal, world freedom through world victory * * * victory quickened by the stupendous production they were called upon to give. And they gave.

Every tool, every weapon of war supplied to our brave fighters is the concrete evidence and the steel-clad proof of the full contribution made by free American labor and industry in helping to destroy the Nazi-Fascist enemies of the free people of this earth.

In our great sacrifice for victory, let us never forget.

As a public service we give this answer to the disgruntled who would detract from the unprecedented performance of free American industry and labor in this war for human freedom.

Hopkins Again in the Saddle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, Harry Hopkins is again Roosevelt's right hand man; is again at the White House; and is today more influential with the President than Jimmy Byrnes. It is common talk on the Hill that Hopkins is the man that manipulated Donald Nelson's mission to China, and was also behind Wilson's resignation from the War Production Board. It is also freely predicted that he will soon force Will Clayton to leave his post of administrator of the War Surplus Property Act. Hopkins is opposed to the program for reconversion as outlined in the Baruch-Hancock report and adopted by Donald Nelson. Hopkins wants both reconversion and the disposal of surplus war property to be administered in line with New Deal principles; namely, "planning human rights above property rights." In plain English this means that Hopkins wants his own social theories to govern the post-war program, and to be the controlling factor in all plans for reconversion and the disposal of surplus property. Hopkins is again in the saddle.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of my colleagues, I include as a part of my remarks the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune of August 28, 1944:

THE NEW DEAL CLIMBS BACK IN THE SADDLE

Mr. Roosevelt has turned the war production board over to his New Deal schemers. J. A. Krug, age 36, who has had a Government job from the day he got out of college, except for the year and a half in a telephone office, has been given the world's biggest business job, the management of American war supply.

To give this job to one of his radicals, the President has ordered Donald Nelson, Chairman of War Production, to go to the farthest corner of the earth—China—and has announced that Nelson might be kept there 2 or 3 months. The No. 2 man in W. P. B., C. E. Wilson, who it was thought for a time would succeed Nelson, has made way for the New Dealers by resigning. Mr. Wilson took the occasion to make it known that all had not been peaceful between him and Mr. Nelson. That is typical in Washington under Mr. Roosevelt. The President has repeatedly dealt secretly behind the backs of his principal executives. The row between Nelson and Wilson is just another in a series which F. D. R. created by his poor administrative tactics. The conflict between Nelson and Wilson will not obscure the fact that while they have been in control, munitions have become adequate for carrying on the war successfully.

That Roosevelt should seize the first opportunity to put the New Dealers in is no surprise. From the very beginning he wanted his starry-eyed young men to run the war production. William S. Knudson left the presidency of General Motors to take over this job, he thought. But he found that he was just a member of a board, in which he was outvoted and outshouted by New Dealers. Knudsen told the President that a debating society, composed of five members, several of whom were seeking social changes, couldn't provide for the national defense. The President then cut the number of war production managers from five to two. Knudson, under the new set-up, shares the direction of munitions procurement, not with another manufacturer, but with Sidney Hillman, the labor organizer, who now has created P. A. C. to bring about the election of Roosevelt for a fourth term.

The country stood for all this monkey business until Pearl Harbor. The shock of the greatest disaster the country ever experienced, and the prospect of defeat in the war, forced the President to kick out the New Dealers and turn war production over to businessmen. The new set-up was proclaimed on January 16, 1942. Donald Nelson became the Chairman of the War Production Board, and he has continued in office ever since, despite efforts of New Dealers with high support from the Army and the Navy to dislodge him.

Now that the Army thinks that the war in Europe will be over in October, Mr. Roosevelt thinks that it is time to hand the biggest of the war agencies over to his New Dealers. Nelson wanted to demobilize the organization promptly and start up peacetime production as fast as facilities became available. A man with ideas like that in an important position imperils the program of the radicals to perpetuate as much as possible of the wartime set-up. Krug, whose principal job under the New Deal has been helping David Lilienthal run the Communist experiment in the T. V. A., is an ideal man for the new job, especially since Hillman, who was Roosevelt's choice earlier, is busy with the P. A. C.

Members of Congress who have said that the war emergency must not be seized as an opportunity to further the social revolution, which was well started when the war broke out, must not allow the seizure of authority in W. P. B. to go unnoticed. They won't if they read statements by Representative THOMAS R. WINTER, of Kansas, who questioned Krug in connection with the investigation of the Rural Electrification Authority. Of Krug and his associates, Representative WINTER said:

"If I were to sum up in a few words the revealed attitude of this gang of fellow travelers who are bent upon prostituting to their own ends America's idealism and patriotism, to make America over during her hour of travail, I would say this is their arrogant attitude: 'To hell with the taxpayers, and the public be damned. To hell with the farmers, and let the Army and Navy play second fiddle; we come first. Up with communism and down with democracy, and let the war go hang. We'll win the peace, if we lose the war.'"

Libertys Played Big Invasion Role

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD I include an article which appeared recently in the New York Journal of Commerce on the part the Liberty ship played in the big invasion role. The article is as follows:

LIBERTYS PLAYED BIG INVASION ROLE—THEY COMPRISED 95 PERCENT OF UNITED STATES FREIGHTERS IN SOUTHERN BEACH ACTION

An armada of 641 American-flag vessels took part in the invasion of the French Mediterranean coast, it was announced yesterday by the Navy through the War Shipping Administration. Hundreds of American freighters, of which 95 percent were Liberty ships, were included in the fleet which did a combined job of delivering not only the invasion forces but supplies of every description to the beachheads.

It was also revealed by the W. S. A. that during the early days of the Normandy invasion more than 150 American merchant ships, averaging about 10,000 deadweight tons each and largely made up of Libertys, carried men and matériel to the beachhead. With them were nearly 120 British merchant ships of similar capacity and a large number of smaller British craft. American and British sea-going tugs played an important part in the invasion effort.

Despite heavy enemy fire, the volunteer civilian crews of the American merchant marine took their ships in, it was revealed. They worked long hours operating deck machinery to unload cargo and delivered the goods and troops to hold the established beachheads. The difficulty and dangers of their task were reflected in letters to the crews by Admiral Sir Bertram H. Ramsay, Allied Naval Commander in Chief, Invasion Forces, and Vice Admiral E. S. Land, United States Navy (retired), War Shipping Administrator, commenting on a job well done and successfully completed in support of our armed services.

Many of the ships have continued to operate shuttle service across the channel, and the supplies and men they carry have been largely responsible for the sustained speed toward the liberation of Paris. Large numbers of ships have left Atlantic coast ports to unload their cargoes on the shores of France. Three-fourths of a recent large convoy was flying the American flag, in contrast to the last war when the greater part of American men and supplies was carried on foreign-flag ships.

G. I. Joe's Future Depends on a Dewey-Bricker Victory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD BUFFETT

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, this Congress appropriately has passed many measures designed to provide for the post-war welfare of the veterans of World War No. 2.

This fall the people should elect officials whose performance will make good on these promises. Will these promises be forgotten like the 1932 New Deal platform? Will these pledges be evaded like the 1936 New Deal covenants? Or will these obligations go unfulfilled like the promise in 1940 not to send our boys abroad? Let us soberly review the prospects.

For almost 12 years the New Deal has been recklessly borrowing and spending the frugal savings of the American people.

As long as the victims of this inflationary and wasteful extravagance were just American citizens at home, no one could complain too much. The people could stop this riotous throwing away of their savings any time they woke up to its dangers.

Today the situation is different. Today the most unfortunate victims of New Deal spending-to-bankruptcy are the far-scattered veterans of World War No. 2. They must rely on us at home to be faithful trustees of their heritage. All will agree that the disabled veteran and the widow and orphan of the fallen hero have a first and prior claim against the Treasury of the United States. That claim comes ahead of all the U. N. R. R. A., world banks, and vote-buying handouts of the fourth-term machine.

Yet when the broken soldier or his fatherless family come up to the Treasury a few years hence, they will find it empty—unless the American people call a halt by a change in leadership on November 7.

Otherwise, the old rhyme of "Old Mother Hubbard who went to the cupboard and when she got there the cupboard was bare" will come to pass. The G. I. Joe for whom the politicians are piously beating their breasts today will be the victim. His heritage at home will have been dissipated while he was abroad supposedly defending it.

Is this to be the pay-off for boys who have been sent further to fight to protect their homeland than any army in history?

The American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the War Dads, and all the great organizations whose aim and purpose is to protect the veterans should carefully study the nonpolitical arithmetic of this situation.

The promises of the G. I. bill and other veterans' benefit measures can be made good only if the post-war budget is balanced. That fact is of supreme importance to those who make the sacrifices of this war. Of equal significance is that the New Deal has failed its every pledge to balance our budget.

Moreover, the New Deal could not balance the budget during years when both our debt and annual expenses were only a fraction of what they are today. Here is the practical yardstick by which you can measure the New Deal's ability to provide for the veteran.

A check against a busted bank is of little or no value; a pension claim against a bankrupt concern is of little or no value; and a claim against a government that has exhausted the resources of its people is of little or no value. The wasteful spending of the New Deal, now extending all over the world, must be stopped—now.

Otherwise you can expect here the tragedy that happened in Europe after the last war—when veterans sold their medals and the gold braid off their uniforms to get something to eat. Their pensions and government veterans' payments were paid in paper money which was almost worthless.

Those "liberal governments were wrecked," said Candidate Roosevelt in 1932, "on the shoals of loose fiscal policy." Our 1944 deficit is about a billion dollars a week.

Is the foregoing appraisal too pessimistic? Not if the studies of the president of that great nonpartisan scientific organization, the Brookings Institution, are correct. Harold G. Moulton concludes a recent study of the public debt and inflation with this warning:

> It will be necessary to make a choice. With unlimited debt expansion we cannot prevent inflation without the use of totalitarian methods of control. No compromise or halfway measures can adjust the difficulties. The choice is between regimentation and inflation.
> The foregoing analysis serves to disclose the gravest danger with which the United States is now confronted. Unable or unwilling to perceive basic inconsistencies, or to choose between clear-cut alternatives, we drift toward the deep financial waters from which there is no return other than through repudiation in one form or another.

The American people must face this "gravest danger" honestly and realistically. As they do, they will realize that the future of G. I. Joe depends on the election of Dewey and Bricker.

Dewey and Bricker have performed what they have promised; they have balanced their State budgets, they have kept the faith. To keep faith with G. I. Joe, his friends at home must elect Dewey and Bricker.

C. I. O. Political Activities in Nebraska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska, Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial by Glenn E. Bunnell, the editor of the Stuart Advocate, of Stuart, Nebr.

Mr. Bunnell has been writing some excellent editorials. He is far enough away from Washington to do some clear, straight, honest writing. His editorials represent the thinking of the people in Nebraska.

It is quite evident that the C. I. O. is determined, if possible, to defeat the four Congressmen in Nebraska. The Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. will spend huge sums of money in various ways. They are very adroit in circumventing the law. They propose to collect money from every member of their union. The fund will be six million or more dollars. The union member must contribute or he may lose his job. The union member may believe in the election of Dewey and Republican members to Congress but nevertheless must contribute to the racketeer who holds the laboring man in the hollow of his hand and is pledged to work for Roosevelt's election.

Mr. Bunnell recognizes that the National Citizens Political Action Committee will do everything possible to defeat Mr. Dewey and the Republican candidate to Congress.

Mr. Bunnell's reference to Senator Truman trying to build himself up by stepping on Admiral Kimmel and General Short is worth careful consideration by thoughtful individuals.

The editorial follows:

THE EDITOR'S COLUMN

(By Glenn E. Bunnell)

The National Citizens Political Action Committee charges in its latest bulletin that Thomas E. Dewey lacks the necessary experience in foreign affairs to make a good President in these times. This bulletin says, "Since Dewey has had no experience in foreign affairs, what he would have done and what he may be expected to do, if elected, have to be figured out entirely from his public utterances."

It is evident from this statement that they do not know what Dewey's foreign policy will be, but because he is the Republican candidate, they do not approve of his foreign policy, whatever it is. Their's is a willfully blind support of Roosevelt for reasons best known to the C. I. O., brains of the C. N. P. A. C.

No one man can be an authority on foreign affairs, domestic economy, military affairs and all of the other phases of Government. He must select men who are specialists in the various fields of Government to be his advisors. President Roosevelt has done this to a greater extent than any other President. The wisdom with which these advisors are selected, is what makes or breaks a President.

Mr. Dewey's selection of John Foster Dulles as his advisor on foreign affairs should set at rest the minds of all fair-thinking citizens, as regards Dewey's wisdom in selecting his advisors. Mr. Dulles is a recognized authority on international law, and the author of several books on the subject. He has been a student of foreign affairs for more than 40 years, and has been secretary to a number of international peace conferences. Mr. Dulles is more able in his field than any man on President Roosevelt's "brain" staff. Such is the caliber of the men Thomas E. Dewey has picked to advise him.

Don't be misled by the C. I. O. or its campaign organization, the National Citizens Political Action Committee.

Senator TRUMAN is trying to build himself up by stepping on Admiral Kimmel and General Short, who were, and are, blamed for the disaster at Pearl Harbor. He has made charges against these men in a magazine article, before these men have been given the benefit of a hearing and an opportunity to clear themselves. Even if the charges are true, it is mighty small of Senator TRUMAN to publish his charges until the men have been given a hearing.

These two men have asked for a trial or hearing, but so far, they have been unable to get it. They are in disgrace, and if all the charges are true, they should be, but why not hold a court martial and get at the real truth of the charges, which for the most part, have never been made public. It may well be that the skirts of the administration are not too clean. Since, by official action a public hearing has not been held, it could be that the statesmen and diplomats of the present administration are as much or more to blame than are the two men now charged.

TRUMAN'S use of these unproven charges for a political toehold does not put him in the class from which I would care to see our Vice President elected.

Now that TRUMAN has aired these charges in a national magazine, during a campaign, I will raise my small voice to demand a hearing for Admiral Kimmel and General Short before election. The powers that be should no longer be permitted to hide behind the national security gag.

If We Had Fortified Guam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. HESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1944

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Cincinnati Times-Star of August 22, 1944:

IF WE HAD FORTIFIED GUAM

The recapture of Guam throws a rather ludicrous light on the excitement of some American politicians who tried to picture the failure of Congress to provide fortifications for that island as an outrageous and unpatriotic performance.

As a matter of fact, nobody proposed that we fortify Guam. The only point at issue was whether we should dredge the harbor. Neither the Army nor the Navy asked for more than that.

The recent history of the southwest Pacific has shown clearly enough that it would have made no difference in the long run whether we had fortified Guam or not. Tarawa, Saipan, and finally Guam itself demonstrated that air bases are of little value so long as they occupy only a small territory and are not backed up by control of the sea and the air. When the Japs had control of the sea and the air, their successes in the Philippines, in Malaya, and in hundreds of smaller islands in the southwest Pacific were in the long range view of history little more than mopping-up operations. While the Japs had control of the sea and the air, they built up a great island empire. When the balance of sea and air power swung over to our side, Japanese schemes of further conquest came to a sudden, jolting halt.

Probably it will be more difficult to put the Japanese out of larger land masses like the Philippines and Java. However, the general rule will probably hold for the large island as it does for the small one.

We lost several hundred Americans when the Japs took over Guam after Pearl Harbor. If we had had a garrison of 10,000 men there, and elaborate fortifications, we would have lost them just the same.

Naval and air bases are very important when they support dominant sea and air power. Their use is slight and usually temporary when control of the sea and the air has passed for some considerable time into the hands of a hostile power.

The Truth About Guam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from Newsweek for August 28, 1944:

THE TRUTH ABOUT GUAM—A SEARCH OF THE RECORDS

The question of whether the administration sought fortification of Guam in 1939 and was voted down by Congress is being injected into the 1944 political campaign. Several organizations are distributing pamphlets and other campaign literature blacklisting Members of Congress involved. Two weeks ago President Roosevelt, at Bremerton, Wash., said: "We were not allowed to fortify Guam * * *." Last April 23 Admiral Ernest J. King, in an official report on the war, wrote: "Proposal was made to proceed with the fortification of Guam, but after considerable debate in Congress it was rejected." Other high officials have joined in the controversy.

To ascertain the facts, the editors of Newsweek last week went back to the official records of 1939. Because they discovered much data that has not hitherto been published, a chronology and excerpts from the records, together with citations, follow:

On March 15, 1937, Rear Admiral Arthur B. Cook, chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, in a letter to Admiral William D. Leahy, chief of naval operations (now President Roosevelt's chief of staff), recommended that Guam harbor be deepened for better seaplane facilities. (Letter printed p. 220, official hearings on H. R. 2880, House Naval Affairs Committee, January 25 to February 17, 1939.)

In the Naval Expansion Act of May 17, 1938, the House Naval Affairs Committee, "of its own volition and without any request from the Navy," inserted a provision directing the Navy to set up a board to determine the need for additional bases. The board, headed by Rear Admiral A. J. Hepburn, on December 27, 1938, recommended a $326,216,000 program for new bases, including an $80,000,000 aviation and submarine base at Guam. (Pp. 4, 6, S. Doc. No. 202, 78th Cong., 2d sess., titled "The Decline and Renaissance of the Navy.")

In its budget requests for 1939 to the President and the Bureau of the Budget, the Navy asked for an appropriation of $94,000,000 to commence the Hepburn Board program which it had approved. (Admiral Cook, p. 134, House Naval Affairs Committee hearings.)

Although the Hepburn Board program called for development of 25 air bases, they were reduced to 12 "because of budgetary limitations," and the bill, as finally approved by the President and the Budget Bureau and sent to Congress, limited the program to $65,000,000. (Admiral Leahy, p. 7, S. Doc. 202.)

A proposal for $5,000,000 in harbor improvements, embodied in the 1937 recommendation of Admiral Cook, was substituted for the Hepburn Board proposal for fortification of Guam at a cost of $80,000,000. (Admiral Cook, p. 223, Assistant Secretary of Navy Charles Edison, pp. 189, 214–215, 220–221, House Naval Affairs Committee hearings.)

"The President," testified Rear Admiral Ben Moreell later, "stated that we could not have the $94,000,000. We could only have $65,000,000, so we reduced the facilities at each of these 12 stations so as to come within the $65,000,000." (P. 8, S. Doc. 202.)

FORTIFICATION?

The first witness before the House committee was Admiral Leahy. He was asked if the Navy was recommending the fortification of Guam. "We are not asking for authority to fortify the island," he replied. "There is no proposal in the bill before the committee to fortify the island. The proposal is that we improve the existing airplane facilities in the harbor of Guam. They are now unsatisfactory. Some dredging, seawall building, and fuel storage facilities are necessary in order that Guam can be used for handling both commercial and naval planes." (P. 60, House Naval Affairs Committee hearings.)

At twelve other stages in his testimony, Admiral Leahy repeated his assertion that the Navy was not asking to fortify Guam. (Pp. 61, 70, 72, 74, 76, 79, committee hearings.)

Discussing the Hepburn Board recommendation for fortification, Admiral Leahy was emphatic that it "would add greatly to the defensive power of the fleet in the Pacific," but he twice refused to recommend it, saying: "I did not say that I think it ought to be fortified" (p. 75, 76, committee hearings).

Admiral Cook, in his testimony, said the $5,000,000 project would enable Navy patrol planes to use the harbor more safely. Asked by Committee Chairman CARL VINSON if the Navy contemplated "maintaining any air unit there," Admiral Cook replied: "No, sir, you couldn't. I cannot see how anyone can connect it with fortification. It is just landing and take-off facilities for patrol planes and anchorage area for seaplane tenders." (P. 163, committee hearings.)

ONE DAY

At another point, Admiral Cook noted estimates it would take the enemy 30 days to reduce the aviation-submarine base proposed by the Hepburn Board. Under the proposal in the bill, he estimated Guam could not hold out more than a day, asserting: "Guam as it stands now could not be held a day against any appreciable enemy force. These improvements will have no literal defensive value for Guam itself." (P. 499, committee hearings.)

To make certain it knew the Navy's official policy on fortifying Guam, the committee summoned Charles Edison, Assistant Secretary of the Navy. He, too, insisted that fortification was not being sought, describing the project in these words: "The development of the harbor of Guam is a matter of, more properly speaking, civil development, much as you develop highways, schools, and other harbor improvements elsewhere." (P. 193, committee hearings.)

On the House floor in February 1939, four veterans of the last war, Representatives Sutphin, of New Jersey, Richards, of South Carolina, Colmer, of Mississippi, and Nichols, of Oklahoma, all Democrats, led a successful fight against the Guam proposal, contending it would jeopardize Jap-American relations. Sixty-four Democrats joined 138 Republicans to eliminate it 205 to 168. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 21, 22, 23, 1939.)

When the bill reached the Senate, no effort was made to restore the eliminated provision.

In February 1941, 10 months before Pearl Harbor, Congress voted $4,700,000 for the harbor improvements originally requested. In contrast to 1939, the appropriation met next to no opposition. Work was just getting under way when Pearl Harbor came. As Admiral Cook predicted, Guam, attacked in force on December 11, had fallen the following day.

Information for Servicemen, Veterans, and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN B. BENNETT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to serve as a member of the World War Veterans' Legislative Committee, one of the most important committees in the House of Representatives. It is this committee that is charged with the responsibility of preparing legislation for the benefit of the veterans of the present war as well as those of World War No. 1. This Congress has adopted the policy of enacting veterans' legislation during the war instead of after, in order that the machinery for assisting in the readjustment of veterans to civilian life may be completed to adequately and promptly take care of the large demobilization of our armed forces which will commence as soon as the war is over.

People everywhere are vitally interested in this legislation because almost every family has someone in the services. I find, too, that there are a great many in the service, as well as their dependents, who frequently do not get all the benefits to which they are entitled simply because they do not know about them. This is perfectly understandable. There has been so much legislation on this general subject in the last few years that it is difficult for the average person busy with other matters to keep fully informed. I have had hundreds of inquiries from my district asking for an outline of the benefits which Congress has made available for servicemen, veterans, and their dependents. I have prepared, in cooperation with the Veterans' Administration, an outline of information concerning the kind and amount of benefits currently available under Federal law, the qualifications therefor, and how to proceed to get them. In this outline monetary benefits based upon service-connected disability or death are referred to as compensation and pension. The reason for the use of both terms is that, under existing laws, the service-connected monetary benefits for World War No. 1 veterans and their dependents are termed "Compensation," while World War No. 2 service-connected benefits are termed "Pension."

Naturally, the summary given here is only an outline. Any citizen can get more detailed information from the Veterans' Administration or from his Congressman about these benefits. The citizens of the Twelfth Michigan Congressional District, which I represent, can continue to get help on their individual problems by addressing their inquiries to me as follows: Congressman JOHN B. BENNETT, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. Assistance can also be obtained in matters of this kind by contacting the local Red Cross, the American Legion or auxiliary, the V. F. W., or similar responsible organizations.

While Public Law 346, popularly referred to as the G. I. bill of rights, has gone a long way toward creating readjustment benefits for returning servicemen, there are still many things left to be done if we are to give the veteran the full and fair consideration he deserves. Some months ago I introduced a bill which is designed to give returning servicemen priority rights in securing surplus war property such as jeeps, trucks, tractors, bulldozers, and other similar equipment. It is provided that each serviceman be given a credit of $40 per month for each month of service in this country and $60 for each month of service outside the continental limits of the United States. The maximum credit in any case to be $1,500.

Heretofore, it has been the policy of our Government to dispose of such excess supplies in large blocks to commercial bidders and dealers who in turn would peddle it to the public at a tremendous profit. None of us want that situation to develop after this war. The boy who used the jeep in defense of his country should have the first right to acquire it when he returns. That is the basic philosophy of my bill. It is now before the veterans' committee, and I am confident that when it is favorably reported it will pass the House of Representatives without difficulty.

While it is of utmost importance that Congress provide for all these benefits to the servicemen to make readjustment to civilian life easier, it should not be forgotten that the greatest benefit which Congress can guarantee the serviceman is twofold. First, to render every assistance to bring about an early ending of the war and the establishment of a just and permanent peace. And, secondly, to guarantee the preservation of our constitutional form of government—so that the serviceman will return to civilian life under a Government of free enterprise and free opportunity—the same kind of a Government that he has so willingly offered his life to preserve and defend.

OUTLINE OF BENEFITS FOR SERVICEMEN, VETERANS, AND THEIR DEPENDENTS UNDER EXISTING LAW—COMPENSATION AND PENSION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH

SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY

Under the veterans regulations promulgated under the act of March 20, 1933, as amended, honorably discharged veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 are entitled to compensation or pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by such service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10 percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month. While the World War No. 2 veterans were entitled to these rates following the act of December 19, 1941, they were placed on complete parity under the veterans regulations by the act of July 13, 1943, Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, with reference to the requirements governing proof of service connection of disability. The latter act also liberalized the regulation concerning the presumption of soundness upon entry into service. Under Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the monthly rates of compensation or pension payable to veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2, including veterans entitled to wartime rates based upon service on or after September 16, 1940, for service-incurred disability, not including special awards and allowances fixed by law, were increased by 15 percent.

In lieu of such pension or compensation, reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States, meeting the requirements of the Army regulations pertaining to retirement of officers of the Regular Establishment, are retired by the War Department, certified to the Veterans' Administration, and their retired pay equal to 75 percent of their base pay is paid by the Veterans' Administration out of the pension appropriation.

NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY

Under Public Law No. 313, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the rate of pension for permanent and total non-service-connected disability, applicable to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion, the Philippine Insurrection, and World War No. 1, was increased from $40 to $50 per month with an increase to $60 per month where such veterans have been rated permanent and total and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or reach the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. This act also provides that the above pension for non-service-connected disability shall apply to veterans of both World War No. 1 and World War No. 2.

SERVICE-CONNECTED DEATH

The rates of compensation or pension for widows, children, and dependent parents of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans based upon death in service, or service-connected death, are as follows:

Widow, no child	$50
Widow, 1 child (with $13 for each additional child)	65
No widow, but 1 child	25
No widow, but 2 children (with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100)	38
Dependent father and mother:
Each	25
Or 1 only	45

The above rates are contained in Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, July 13, 1943, and constitute a material liberalization of the prior rates.

NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DEATH

The widow, child, or children of any deceased veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 are entitled to the following rates of compensation if the veteran at the time of death from a non-service-connected cause had a disability incurred in or aggravated by such war service:

Widow but no child	$35
Widow and 1 child (with $5 for each additional child)	45
No widow but 1 child	18
No widow but 2 children (equally divided)	27
No widow but 3 children (equally divided)	36

With $4 for each additional child (the total amount to be equally divided).

Payments are limited to an aggregate of $64 in any one case.

Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, act of May 27, 1944, increased the rates to the above amounts and also included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans, the law previously having applied only to World War No. 1 veterans.

Claims and effective date of awards: Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred to a Veterans' Administration facility, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for adjudication, the applicant should file claim on proper form which will be supplied upon inquiry addressed to any Veterans' Administration facility or regional office, or to the local representative of the American Red Cross or of a veterans' service organization.

Upon death in service the service department notifies the Veterans' Administration, and claims forms are sent immediately to all known dependents.

GROUPS POTENTIALLY ELIGIBLE FOR PENSIONS

All members of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, members of the Public Health Service, or of the Coast and Geodetic Survey when ordered to active service with the Army or Navy, or as to United States Public Health Service while serving outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska, and as to Coast and Geodetic Survey when assigned during present war to duty on business of War or Navy Department in areas outside continental United States or in Alaska or coastal areas of the United States as determined by the War and Navy Departments to be of immediate military hazard, are potentially eligible for pensions.

AWARDS TO DATE

Pension payments to veterans of World War No. 2 and their dependents total $37,760,572.78 through March 1944. In addition, retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration to Reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States, totaled $1,020,137.33 from July 1, 1942, through March 31, 1944.

Disbursements for the relief of World War No. 2 veterans and their dependents from 1918 through March 1944 for disability and death compensation or pension, service connected and nonservice connected, totaled $5,007,029,954.54. In addition, disbursements for World War No. 1 emergency officers' retirement pay through March 31, 1944, totaled $84,889,697.63. Our older veterans are not being forgotten just because there is a new and larger crop, as these figures prove.

MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL CARE, PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES, AND DOMICILIARY CARE

Eligibility is extended to any veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2, honorably discharged, having a service-connected disability requiring such care, treatment, or appliance, or one who was discharged for disability and not dishonorably; also one not dishonorably discharged, who is unable to defray his expenses, has tuberculosis or a neuropsychiatric ailment or disability which requires hospital care.

Dependent upon availability of facilities, eligibility includes any veteran of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, and who is in need of such care and is unable to defray the expenses therefor—regardless of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service.

CLAIMS

Any person who is to be discharged from active service and who is in need of and entitled to hospitalization by the Veterans' Administration, is transferred directly to the Veterans' Administration facility designated to receive him. Claim for all benefits, and necessary clinical and service data accompany him, or are filed by the manager if the veteran is insane or incompetent.

All others should file claim for treatment or hospitalization directly with the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office—one, or more, in each State in the Union except Delaware.

Sixty-four thousand nine hundred and eighty-two veterans of World War No. 2 have been hospitalized by the Veterans' Administration through April 30, 1944. On April 30, 1944, there were 44,967 World War No. 1 veterans and 12,866 World War No. 2 veterans receiving hospitalization, and 8,477 World War No. 1 veterans and 196 World War No. 2 veterans receiving domiciliary care from the Veterans' Administration.

While domiciliary care cannot be said to be a part of the rehabilitation process, it is a valuable benefit for those who have reached a permanent state of disability and have no other means of support.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved by the President March 24, 1943, provides—

First, that any person who served in the active military or naval service at any time after December 6, 1941, and prior to the termination of the present war;

Second, and who was honorably discharged;

Third, and who has a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which pension is payable under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay;

Fourth, who is in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability, shall be entitled to such vocational rehabilitation as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit him for employment consistent with the degree of disablement.

The purpose of rehabilitation is to restore employability lost by virtue of a handicap due to service-incurred disability. In performing the functions imposed upon the Administrator by Public Law 16, it will be the purpose of the Veterans' Administration to utilize educational institutions and establishments of recognized standing in the training of these disabled veterans into employment and to train each person as near his home as may be possible. In securing employment, a problem which obviously will be very great after the end of the war and perhaps acute after demobilization has been accomplished, every available Federal and State facility will be utilized. Employment of veterans has been accomplished to a considerable extent through the United States Employment Service. It will be the purpose to correlate these activities to the end that those vocationally trained will be graduated into employment opportunities.

While the disabled veteran is in training his pension, unless it equals or exceeds such amounts, will be increased to $80 per month, if single; $90 per month, if married, with $5 additional for each child, and $10 for each dependent parent. All expenses of training, including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required.

CLAIMS

Those persons discharged from the service directly to the Veterans' Administration facilities for hospitalization will have their claims filed and processed; and the question of need for and entitlement to vocational rehabilitation may be given consideration as soon as the individual's physical and mental condition make training feasible. Any other person honorably discharged from the service may make claims for vocational rehabilitation in the claim for pension which may be filed at the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office.

INSURANCE—NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

National service life insurance was provided under the act of October 8, 1940, Public Law No. 801, Seventy-sixth Congress, and liberalizing amendments thereto were enacted during the Seventy-seventh and Seventy-eighth Congresses. A number of other liberalizing proposals are pending in the present Congress and the Veterans' Administration has submitted certain proposed changes found to be justified by studies conducted. Application may be made for not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 without physical examination prior to the expiration of 120 days from entrance into active service. Thereafter, any such person in the active military or naval service may apply if the application be accompanied by acceptable evidence of good health.

APPLICATIONS

Application forms are supplied the service departments, and may be obtained from the commanding officer or designated insurance officer. The applicant may elect to pay premiums in cash, or by allotment of pay. Policies are not issued during the war, but insurance certificate is mailed to the address designated by applicant.

The insurance is against death only, but includes waiver of premiums during total disability existing for more than 6 months, and commencing prior to insured's sixtieth birthday. The policy is a 5-year level premium term policy with rate based upon the American experience table of mortality and 3 percent interest—the Government assuming the extra hazard of the military and naval service and the administrative expense. The insurance is payable only to a widow (widower), child (including a stepchild or illegitimate child, if designated as beneficiary by the insured), parent (including person in loco parentis), brother and sister of the insured; and is payable only in monthly installments. The insured may change the beneficiary designation at any time.

After the policy has been in effect for at least 1 year, while in force it may be converted to an ordinary life, 20-payment life, or 30-payment life policy upon application to the Veterans' Administration without medical examination.

In cases where the person in service died or became totally disabled, or was captured or isolated by the enemy prior to April 20, 1942, and had less than $5,000 insurance in effect, the law provides that gratuitous insurance to an aggregate of $5,000 shall be deemed in effect. Claims for such gratuitous insurance should be filed as soon as possible, because of limitations. In most of these death cases only a widow, child, or dependent parent can claim such insurance.

As of March 30, 1944, over 14,303,291 applications had been received, representing a total amount of nearly $105,596,766,000 of insurance. The average policy was approximately $7,382.60; the average coverage per life approximately $8,926.74.

The insurance is payable in the event of the death of the insured while the policy is in force to a beneficiary or beneficiaries, which may be designated by the insured, only within the relationship of widow or widower, child, parent, brother, or sister. The proceeds of the policy are payable as an annuity in 240 equal monthly installments of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance to any beneficiary who is under 30 years of age at the time of the death of the insured; otherwise, in continuous monthly installments throughout the lifetime of the beneficiary, with a guaranty of the payment of 120 monthly installments to the surviving relatives of the insured who are within the permitted class of beneficiaries. The amount of the monthly installments under the latter mode of payment is dependent upon the age of the beneficiary at date of death of insured. For example, if the beneficiary is then 40 years old, monthly installment is $4.50 for each $1,000 of insurance; if 50, $5.39; if 60, $6.81; if 70, $8.51.

CLAIMS

All claims for insurance benefits should be addressed to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C., but necessary forms may be secured from the nearest Veterans' Administration facility.

United States Government life (converted) insurance: This insurance can be applied for only by those who served in World War No. 1. No one may have more than $10,000 national service life insurance and Government (converted) insurance combined.

Insurance premiums are guaranteed by Government under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended: Any person in the active service having a commercial life policy or policies meeting the requirements of said law, article IV, may, upon application to the Veterans' Administration on form supplied the Army and Navy, secure guaranty of premiums, on amount of insurance not in excess of $10,000, while he is in the service during the present war. The insurance premiums so guaranteed by the Government constitute a lien against the policy and must be paid by the company out of any settlement thereof. In the event of the insured's discharge from service, he has a period of 2 years within which to pay the premiums with interest so guaranteed; or otherwise such indebtedness constitutes a loan on the policy with interest and if the amount of such indebtedness exceeds the cash surrender value the policy is automatically canceled and the Government pays the insurer the difference between such cash surrender value and the indebtedness. Forms for making application for such insurance protection are supplied to the War and Navy Departments and may be secured in person or from his commanding officer or other designated official.

As of March 31, 1944, 72,204 applications with insurance totaling $178,189,853.21 have been approved and premiums guaranteed.

INSURANCE UNDER OTHER LAWS

Old-age and survivors insurance is administered by the Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; unemployment benefits by Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; retirement by Railroad Retirement Board and Civil Service Commission. Credit for active military or naval service is allowed for civil-service retirement and railroad retirement purposes.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

Mustering-out pay is provided by the act of February 3, 1944, Public Law 225, Seventy-eighth Congress, and is administered by the War and Navy Departments. The amounts are from $100 to $300.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES

Administered by the War and Navy Departments for dependents of those in the service. Your Congressman can supply many details about this subject and help get delayed allotments straightened out for dependents of servicemen.

DOMICILIARY CARE

United States Soldiers' Home, under jurisdiction of the War Department; Naval Home, under jurisdiction of the Navy Department. This is in addition to that provided by the Veterans' Administration.

GUARDIANSHIP

Supervision is maintained in cooperation with the State courts, over payments of any benefits made on account of insane or minor beneficiaries to insure proper application of such benefits.

RETIREMENT PAY

Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard: For officers and enlisted personnel of the Regular Establishment, and reserve components of Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard.

TAXES

Bureau of Internal Revenue: All veteran benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration are exempt from all taxation. Special consideration is shown in the income-tax laws for those in the service.

BURIAL ALLOWANCE

Up to the amount of $100 may be paid for any war veteran, honorably discharged or in receipt of pension or compensation, as to any veteran discharged from the armed forces for disability incurred in line of duty or in receipt of pension for service-connected disability.

A United States flag to drape the casket, subsequently to be turned over to the next of kin, may be furnished as to any veteran, discharged honorably after active service during any war or after serving at least one enlistment or by reason of disability incurred in line of duty. Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, as to his minor children or adult unmarried daughters. The expenses incident to transporting the body of one who has died while in active service, or of a veteran who has died in a Veterans' Administration facility, to the place of burial, are, within limitations, borne by the Government. Headstone or marker—stone or marble—will be furnished for the unmarked grave of any honorably discharged veteran or as to anyone who died while in the active service.

Various benefits, rights, and privileges are also provided as to certain veterans, their dependents, and their organizations under State laws, as per the resumé thereof, as published by the House Committee on Pensions, entitled "State Veterans' Laws."

CIVIL, SPANISH, AND OTHER WARS

Pensions on the basis of age, degree of inability to earn a living, and/or length of service for, first, Civil War veterans in the amount of $75 per month, or $100, if in need of a regular attendant; second, Indian war veterans in amounts ranging from $20 to $60 per month, or $100 if in need of an attendant; and, third, veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion in amounts ranging from $12 to $75 per month, plus varying amounts if in need of a regular attendant, with total not to exceed $100, but only $20 while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by the United States or a political subdivision thereof if the veteran has no dependents, provided that as to those in a soldiers' home continually since on or before July 15, 1943, the pension not to exceed $50 shall be continued.

Pensions at lower rates than above are available to veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion based upon service of 70 days or more, but less than 90 days.

Pension under the Economy Act of March 20, 1933, and the veterans' regulations promulgated thereunder, as amended, of $50 per month for veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, Boxer Rebellion, or World War No. 1, with 90 days or more of honorable service, or if less than 90 days, if discharged for disability incurred in line of duty, who suffer with permanent total disability, regardless of service connection, if not due to misconduct. Only $8 per month is paid to single men, without dependents, while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by a Government agency.

EDUCATION

Congress provided in 1944 that any veteran who served on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and whose education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of his entrance into the service, or who desires a refresher or retraining course, and who served 90 days or more, is entitled to education at public expense. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice up to $500 per year for tuition and books and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if single and $75 if married, not to exceed 4 years. Any person who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service is assumed to have had his education interrupted. Veterans must meet the regular entrance and scholarship requirements.

FARM, HOME, AND SMALL BUSINESS OWNERSHIP

The Federal Government, through the Administrator of Veterans Affairs, will guarantee up to 50 percent and as high as $2,000 of any approved loan secured by a veteran from a private or Govern-
